A GENERAL VIEW OF THE GEOLOGY OF SCRIPTURE.

PREFACE. - - - - - - - - - - 50
INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER. - - - - - - - - 51
CHAP. I.—Our ideas of the real extent of objects on the Earth's Surface often erroneous. True height of Mountains. Depths of the Ocean. Of Mines. Of Volcanic Foci. Eruptions of Mud containing Fish. Volcanoes only in Secondary Formations. True Scale on which to view the Earth. Form of the Earth. Newton's Demonstrations. Gravity and Centrifugal Force. False inferences drawn from Newton's Hypothesis. True Primitive Creations. Density of the Earth. Reflections arising from the Subject The Days of Creation. - - - - - - - - 55
CHAP. II.—The Second Day of the Creation. The Firmament, or Atmosphere. Atmospheric Phenomena. Magnetism, and Electricity. - - - - - - 59
CHAP. III.—The gathering together of the Waters. The Sublimity of this Fiat of the Creator not sufficiently understood. The Transition Rocks. - - 60
CHAP. IV.—Constant Changes in Nature. Origin of Secondary Formations. Primitive Soils, for the Nourishment of a Primitive Vegetation. Constant Circulation in the Fluids of the Earth. Springs, Brooks, and Rivers. The Tides. Their Cause Explained. The Currents of the Ocean, and their present existing System. Effects naturally arising from these powerful Causes. - - - - - - - - - - 61
CHAP. V.—General Nature of the Formations on the Earth. Origin and Progress of Secondary Formations. Causes of Stratification in Secondary Rocks. Such Deposits become gradually Mineralized. Calcareous Formations. Salt Deposits. Proof of Granite not being an Aqueous Deposit. Secondary Formations now in Progress in the bed of the Ocean. - 64
CHAP. VI.—The Deluge. Traditional Evidence of that Event. Erroneous Ideas commonly entertained respecting it. Distinctness of Scripture on the Subject. Evidence from Scripture. Evidence from the Ancient, though Apocryphal, Book of Enoch. Theories of Philosophy on the Subject. The most probable Cause of that Destructive Event. - - - - - 68
CHAP. VII.—Mosaic Account of the Deluge. The Mountains of Ararat. Origin of that remarkable Name. Effects during the Deluge. Action of the Tides and the Currents during the Deluge. Their Effects upon Organic Bodies. Diluvial Strata. Abatement of the Waters. Renewal of the Face of the Earth. - 70
CHAP. VIII.—General View of the existing Surface. Force of the Waves. Principles of Stratification. Cavous Limestone. Gibraltar. The plains of the Earth. Of South America. Of Africa. Of Asia. Of Europe. Result of this View. Chalk Basins. That of Paris, a Guide to all similar Basins. Salt Deposits. Coal Formations. Evidences of Coal being a Marine, and not a Lacustrine Formation. - 73
CHAP. IX.—Organic Remains. Evidences derived from them. Erroneous Theories of Continuous Stratification. Diluvial Fossil Remains. Diluvial Origin of Coal. Unfounded Theories on this Subject. The Belgian Coal Fields. Tropical Productions in Polar Regions. Buffon's Theory. High Importance of the Evidence of Fossils. Natural and unavoidable mode of Transport. Instances in proof. Buoyant nature of Bodies after Death. Rate at which they might have been transported. The thick-skinned Animals floated longest. - - - - - - - - - 80
CHAP. X.—High Importance of the Evidence of Fossils. Siberian Mammoth. The entire Elephant of the Lena. Theories founded on this Specimen, unsupported by facts. Consistent mode of accounting for Tropical Productions in Cold Climates. Unchanged condition of the Climates of the Earth. Italian Deposits. Monte Bolca. Fossils on the Coast of Norfolk. Formations of the South of England. The same View extended to the Continent. - - - - - - 86
CHAP. XI.—The Cave of Kirkdale. Dr. Buckland's Theory founded on its Fossil Remains. Contradictory Nature of this Theory. Fossil Bones from the Hymalaya Glaciers, and from the Heights of South America. Natural mode for accounting for them. The Habits of the Elephant. His most perfect form. His love of the Water, and of a swampy and woody Country. Habits of the Rhinoceros. Cuvier's Opinion of Fossil Remains. Inconsistency of this Opinion. Evidence of Astronomy. Evidence from Fossil Trees. Conclusive Nature of this Evidence. Evidence derived from Peat Moss. Foot-marks of Antediluvian Animals. Scratches occasioned by the Diluvial Action. Formation of Valleys. Scripture alone capable of explaining these Evidences. - - - - - 90
CHAP. XII.—Elephants clothed with Hair and Wool.—Existing Instances of this Variety, even within the Tropics. Probable Identity between the Mammoth and the Asiatic Elephant. Cuvier's Theory on this Subject inconsistent with Facts. More natural Conclusions. Erroneous Theories respecting Fossils.—The Mastodon not confined to the Continents of America, as commonly supposed. Instance of the great Mastodon in England. Form of the Tusks of the Mastodon.—Erroneous Ideas on this subject. - - 98
CHAP. XIII.—Human Fossil Remains. Why they cannot be so numerous as those of other Animals. Limestone Caves and Fissures. An Example in the Cave of Gaylenreuth, with its Fossil Contents. Dr. Buckland's Theory of Caves and Fissures. Human Fossils found at Guadaloupe. Also at Durfort. Great Fossil Deposits in Spain, containing Human bones.—Quarries at Kostritz, containing Human Bones. Natural Conclusions from the above Account. Dr. Buckland's Conclusion respecting Kostritz inconsistent with other parts of his theory. Caves and Fissures in Lime-stone. General spread of Diluvial Effects. - - - - - - - - - - 101

CHAP. XIV.—On the Situation of Paradise; together with Critical and Geological Evidences of the spurious character of that descriptive account of it, found in all modern copies and translations of the Book of Genesis. 109

CHAP. XV.—On the creation of mankind. The Origin of Language. What was the Primitive Language? High Probability in favour of Hebrew. On the Diversity of Colour among Mankind. Testimony of the Jews on this Subject. Origin of the American Indians. Their Traditions and Customs. Their Religious Belief. Religious Rites in the Interior of Africa. On Sacrifice. Traditions and Beliefs in the Friendly Islands. Historical Evidence of a common descent from Noah. On the identity of words among the most distant Nations. On the universal use of a Decimal Gradation. Natural Inference from all these Considerations. - - - - - - - - - 111

Conclusions to which we are naturally led by the general tenour of the foregoing inquiry. - - - - - 116

LECTURES ON PORTIONS OF THE PSALMS.

A PORTRAITURE OF MODERN SCEPTICISM.

CHAP. I.—The Views which Infidels have entertained respecting the moral character of God. - - - 161

CHAP. II.—Though Infidels profess to hold the doctrine of the Divine Existence, yet they refuse or neglect all religious worship. - - - - - - - - ib.

CHAP. III.—A brief survey of the character of that morality which Infidelity inculcates and displays. - 162

CHAP. IV.—The practical effects of Infidelity. - - ib.

CHAP. V.—A contrasted view of Infidelity and Christianity. - - - - - - - - - - 163

CHAP. VI.—An affectionate appeal to those who have been entangled in the snares of Infidelity. - - 164

SECOND PART.

THE TRUTH AND EXCELLENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

CHAP. I.—The comparative credit due to the conclusions of Sceptics and Christians. - - - - - - 165

CHAP. II.—Showing that the evidence of Christianity is of such a nature that it admits of being brought home individually, with convincing power, to every man's bosom. - - - - - - - - - 166

CHAP. III.—Containing a brief survey of those branches of evidence which it is proper to urge upon the attention of those who have not as yet yielded up their minds to the divine authority and transforming power of the Gospel. - - - - - - - - 167

CHAP. IV.—On the Transmission of the Sacred Books. - - - - - - - - - - 183

CHAP. V.—On the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. - - - - - - - - - - 185

CHAP. VI.—Some popular objections to the full Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. - - - - - 188

Conclusion. - - - - - - - - - 189

CHAP. III.—General sketch of Miss Graham's life; her views of study; extensive attainments; and active devotedness to God. - - - - - - - 194
CHAP. IV.—Further Extracts from her Writings and Correspondence. - - - - - - - - 202
CHAP. V.—Different views and features in Miss Graham's character. - - - - - - - 236
CHAP. VI.—Her illness and death. - - - - 243
CHAP. VII.—Remarks. - - - - - - 248

THE PERSONALITY AND OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN COMFORTER.

LECT. I.—Interesting nature of the proposed Inquiry.

The promise of the Comforter when given.—Greatness of the loss which his coming was to repair. An accurate comprehension of the meaning of the Promise, why necessary. Writers by whom the subject has been already treated. Clagitt.—Ridley.—Owen.—Warburton. - - - - - - - - - 252

The discussion of Religious Mysteries necessary and advantageous.

Christian Morality derives its sanction from Christian doctrine. No revealed truth unimportant. Such inquiries not dangerous to the general interests of Christianity. Folly and danger of dissembling our Faith. A due consideration of the Christian Mysteries how useful. Evils incident to Controversy:—not peculiar to Religious Controversy:—how best to be avoided. - - - - - - - - - 254

Threefold Division of the subject of these Lectures.

1. Nature of the promised Comforter. 2. Persons for whose comfort and protection he was to come. 3. Benefits which they were to receive from him. - 257

I. Inquiry into the Nature of the Comforter.

Impostors who have assumed his name—Manes—Montanus—Mohammed. The Comforter the same with the Holy Ghost. Doctrine of the Church concerning his Personality, Divinity, and Union with the Father and the Son. - - - - - - - 257

LECT. II.—The Personality of the Comforter shown from our Saviour's expressions concerning him.

Actions and properties ascribed to the Holy Ghost or Comforter. Such actions and properties cannot properly be ascribed to a Virtue, Operation or Quality. Qualities, Influences, Powers, &c. what. Accidents only predicable of a real existence Material or Spiritual. The Holy Ghost not a Material Substance. - 257

The expressions of our Saviour concerning the Comforter not allegorical or figurative.

In all expressions not professedly parabolical, the literal interpretation most probable. Inconsistency of the Socinians in preferring the allegorical interpretation. Motives by which men are led to the use of Allegory or Metaphor:—did not apply to the discourse now under examination. Nor have our Lord's words any of the distinctive marks by which figurative expressions are distinguished from those which are to be taken literally. Wherein those marks consist. The Personification of an abstract quality not proper or intelligible, under any other name than that which conventionally stands for it;—much less under a name already appropriated to a real agent. Meaning of the term "Spirit." No reason to apprehend that our Lord used the term in compliance with popular superstition. Nor that the term "Holy Spirit," was employed by the Jews in a figurative meaning to express Inspiration. The testimonies of Jerome and Maimonides to this effect not conclusive. Jerome has misrepresented Lactantius. Maimonides frequently at variance with the usual opinions of the Synagogue. The ancient Jews regarded the Holy Spirit as a Person. This fact sufficient for the present argument, though their knowledge of his Nature and Functions might be imperfect. - - - - - - - - - - 258

The expressions in question further shown not to be allegorical, from the general consent of Christians, and more particularly of the primitive Church.

Force of this argument. Reasonableness of that deference which is paid to the opinions of the primitive Church. Those opinions favourable to the Orthodox cause. - - - - - - - - - - 261

The Ancient Christian Writers not incompetent evidence.

Those Writers not cited for their merit as writers or commentators, but as contemporary witnesses to the faith of the Ancient Church. Their competency to this point. - - - - - - - - - - 261

The Orthodox Opinions not first introduced into the Church in the Second Century after Christ.

Those doctrines found in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers. Testimonies to the Personality of God's Spirit in Hermas,—Clemens,—Ignatius,—Polycarp. The Doxology how ancient. Canticle called the Epilychnia, popular with the lower ranks of Christians. Tertullian and Justin do not favour the notion that the Doctrine of the Trinity was in their time recently introduced. Testimonies of Justin and Irenæus to the universal faith of the Church. - - - - - 262

LECT. III.—The Orthodox Opinions not derived from the Platonists.

The Platonizing Christians why conspicuous in Ecclesiastical History. Their influence with the general body of Christians not great. The Platonists in general hostile to Christianity, and why. Their leading doctrines strongly opposed to the Orthodox faith. Belief in Two Principles. Utter Impurity of Matter. The Creator of the World how esteemed by them. Their objections to the Orthodox Faith in the Incarnation of the Godhead, and the Resurrection of the Body. Porphyry. Apollonius of Tyana. Ammonius. Julian the Apostate. Synesius. Platonizing Christians either Heretics or suspected of Heresy. The Platonic Trinity not a conspicuous part of the doctrine of the Academy. Its resemblance to the Christian Trinity imperfect. Yet, from this resemblance an argument may be drawn against the Unitarians. - - - - 264

The Orthodox Opinions derived from the Apostles themselves.

The Ancient Fathers appeal to Apostolic Tradition and Authority. Necessary inferences from such an appeal. The Orthodox regarded Apostles as the founders of their Sect. This could not have been the case if so important a doctrine as the Trinity had been introduced into the Church by any other person in opposition to the authority of the Apostles when alive, or their known sentiments when dead. Nor can we allow that such an innovation can have been introduced under colour of receiving the genuine opinions of the Apostles,—for no such pretended loss and revival of the faith is noticed by any of the Fathers. If such a revolution in the religious opinions of the Church had taken place, its author must have held a high place in Ecclesiastical History. No such person is known to have existed. Such a change cannot have taken place unobserved. It, therefore, never took place at all. 266

Resumption of the Argument from the general consent of Christians.

The Orthodox Believers composed a Majority of the primitive Christians. The Personality of God's Spirit not held by the Orthodox only, but by the great body of Christians however otherwise divided. The Manichees.—The Arians.—The Mohammedans.—The Gnostics.—The Ebionites.—The Nazarenes. To this general consent, the Sabellians and Socinians the only known exceptions. - - - - - - - - - 267

The Spirit of God, how spoken of in other parts of Scripture.

Examination of those passages where He is said to be given, quenched, &c. Those passages obviously figurative, whether on our principles or those of the Socinians. The persona efficiens may be put for the res effecta. Expressions of the same kind applied to those whose personal existence is uncontrovertible. The Holy Ghost proved to be a Person on the same grounds with those on which we believe the Personality of God the Father. The various metaphorical names applied to the Holy Ghost, no presumption against his Personality. Supposed Identity of the Holy Ghost and the Jewish Schekinah an argument in favour of this doctrine. - - - - - - - - - 267

Socinian and Sabellian Notions compared.

If the Holy Ghost be an attribute or operation, he must be an attribute or operation of God the Father. Whatever is figuratively predicated of an accident is really predicated of the Person or Substance in which that accident is inherent. The Divinity of the Holy Ghost in what sense maintained by the Socinians and Sabellians. The Holy Ghost incidentally proved to be God. But cannot be identified with God the Father. Inconsistency of the Socinians in admitting part of the Sabellian System and rejecting the remainder. 1 Cor. ii. 11, examined and explained. Conclusive against the Arian System but not against the Homoousian. Ancient opinion of two Souls in Man. Contradictions and absurdities of the Sabellian Hypothesis. - - - - - - - - - 269

Conclusion of the Argument in favour of the Spirit's Personality.

Motives by which a Christian is actuated in exposing the errors of his Religious opponents. Exhortation to the study of Scripture. Doctrines now to be tried. Practical nature of the Truths contended for by the Orthodox. Melancholy effect of the Socinian Tenets. - - - - - - - - - - 271

LECT. IV.—Consequences incidentally deducible from the Personality and Deity of the Holy Ghost.

The Doctrine of a Trinity in Unity necessary to reconcile Scripture with itself. That Doctrine not more above reason than many acknowledged truths in Natural Philosophy and Natural Religion. No objection to its truth that it is rather deducible from different passages of Scripture than expressly revealed in any. This is the case with many other of the most important Doctrines in the Old and New Testaments, and corresponds with the general analogy of God's providence. The indirect species of proof less liable to objection than the positive. - - - - - 271

II. Inquiry into the Persons to whom and for whose advantage the Comforter was promised. The Comforter not promised to the Apostles only, but to all generations of Believers.

The Comforter was to abide for ever with those to whom he was sent. The office of God's Spirit in this capacity has relation to this world only. - - - 273

III. Inquiry into the nature of those peculiar benefits which Christians were to receive from the Comforter. Preliminary investigation of the part which the Holy Ghost sustained under the Patriarchal and Mosaic Dispensations.

Reasons for such an investigation. Difficulty of carrying it on so far as concerns the earliest ages of the world. Proofs of the Trinity from the word Elohim, &c. uncertain and dangerous. The "Spirit of God," Gen. i. 2, not a material wind. Uncertain whether the Third or the Second Person of the Godhead be intended by it. The name of Spirit applied to both. Presumption which this circumstance affords against Socinianism. Opinion of the Ancient Fathers that the Son of God, on certain occasions, appeared to the Patriarchs and Prophets. That opinion not inconsistent with the supposed intercourse of God's Spirit with mankind during the same periods of Sacred History. Distinction between the Persons of the Godhead implied in the Old Testament. The name and functions of the Holy Ghost well known to the Jews before the time of our Saviour. Angels by whom the Law was given. The Holy Spirit intended by the Rabbinical Schekinah. Application of these circumstances to the explanation of several obscure passages in Scripture. Vision seen by Daniel on the Banks of Hiddekel. Not a created Angel—nor God the Son. Michael one of the names by which God the Son is distinguished in Scripture. Erroneous opinion that nations are subject to Angel Governors, and that these Governors have wars with each other. The Holy Ghost the ruling and supporting Providence of the world. Grounds for supposing that the Angel Gabriel and the Holy Ghost are the same Divine Person. Meaning of the name Gabriel. Christ's Mortal Body, how quickened by the Spirit, These opinions suggested only as probable speculations. If true, may illustrate, if false, cannot weaken the other proofs of the Trinity and Atonement. - - - - - - 273

LECT. V.—Inquiry resumed. The Benefits conferred by the Holy Ghost in his capacity of Comforter conferred on Christians only.

The Spirit of God our peculiar Comforter. The promise of his coming made to Christians only. - - 278

Those Benefits were some of which the Disciples themselves were not in previous possession.

The terms of visitation and mission figurative only as applied to God. Yet denotes some new manifestation of his power or goodness. The coming of the Paraclete a compensation for the departure of Christ. A compensation what. - - - - - - - 278

Correspondence between the Miraculous displays of God's power at the time when the Law of Moses was given, and those which distinguished the publication of the Gospel.

The Schekinah. The day of Pentecost. Moses. St. Stephen. St. Paul in Paradise. Prophecy. - 279

Yet the gift of Miraculous Powers was not that definite blessing which the Holy Ghost was to dispense as Paraclete.

That blessing promised to all generations. But Miracles have ceased. No sufficient answer to this objection,—that Miracles have become unnecessary. That answer disputable in point of fact. Miracles of rare occurrence, why. Nor, though supernatural aids may have become less necessary than formerly, would this change in the circumstances of the recipient acquit the promiser of his engagement. Circumstances have not materially changed with the Church in those particulars on account of which the Comforter was especially promised. - - - - - - - 279

Nor is the promised protection of the Comforter fulfilled by the grace which he dispenses through the Sacraments, and the perpetuation of an Apostolic Ministry.

Because the promise in question is something more definite than a general assurance of help and comfort. And its terms are such as suit neither of these operations of the Holy Ghost. The Paraclete was to guide us into all truth, &c. These particulars do not accord with the Sacramental Graces nor the Grace of Ordination. Nor were the Sacraments and Ordination new privileges conferred on the Church in consequence of the Paraclete's coming. These rites not unknown to the Ancient Jews. And all instituted in the Christian Church by the Messiah before his departure. The institutions in question are more blessed and efficacious as means of grace to the Christian than to the Jew,—but the source of this difference still remains to be sought after. - - - - - - - - 280

Nor by the protection of the Holy Ghost in temporal matters and as ruling Providence of the World.

The departure of Christ not compensated for by the mere continuance of that protection which the Apostles had, before, in more ample measure, received.—The terms of our Lord's promise have no reference to a temporal guardianship. - - - - - - 281

Inquiry into the necessity and reality of the ordinary and sanctifying influence of God's Spirit.

That influence denied by modern Socinians. Supposed by us to consist in the immediate agency of God's Spirit on the Soul. How distinguished from the inspiration of supernatural knowledge and power. Possibility of such an intercourse. Its necessity.—Objections of the Unitarians considered. God's general Providence a succession of particular interferences. The interference of the Spirit may extend through a very wide range of our thoughts and actions. Natural and peculiar difficulties attendant on the practice of virtue. The inclination of man to do evil. Our human resolution why insufficient to overcome this propensity. Religious motives for self-control often less powerful than worldly motives, why. Those motives more distant and not the objects of sense. The objects of worldly prudence demand fewer sacrifices at our hands. Self-government required in a Christian. The gift of sanctifying grace proveable from Scripture. The opinions of Augustine and Calvin on this subject an abuse of the Doctrine in question. How far those opinions resemble the Fatalism of Socinians. Scriptural testimonies to the reality and necessity of God's sanctifying Grace. The gifts of Holiness and Peace distinct from that of Miraculous Power, yet both ascribed to God's Spirit. Conclusion. - - - 281

LECT. VI.—The ordinary and sanctifying Grace of God not the peculiar blessing which the Comforter, as such, was to bestow on Christians.

Nature and extent of God's sanctifying Grace, explained. Communicates no new idea to the Soul, but enables us to profit by those which we, by other means, acquire. Acts by the illustration not the revelation of truth. Cannot, therefore, be said to teach all things or show us things to come. Given to others besides Christians. Contradictions involved in the contrary opinion. No man can believe unless through grace both preventing and furthering. Therefore grace must have been given to those who were not yet believers. This difficulty how avoided by the Calvinists. Consequences resulting from their system. How softened by Owen. Inconsequence of his reasoning. Grace given, through Christ's merits, to the Patriarchs and ancient Jews,—and to the Heathen. Degree of Divine knowledge on which a justifying faith may be founded, shown from Hebr. xi. 6. This degree of knowledge possessed by some among the Heathen. Proved from the Heathen Writers and from St. Paul. And from the virtues of some among the Heathen. Those virtues did not, all of them, proceed from impure or worldly motives. Sacrifices and Devotions of the Heathen, some of them offered to the true God. The institution of Sacrifice derived from the ancient Patriarchs. Sacrifices might bring down a blessing on those who understood not the meaning of their appointment. Difference between a Type and a Sacrament. The extension of God's sanctifying Grace to the Heathen does not detract from the efficacy of Sacramental Ordinances. A due use of those Ordinances necessary and appointed means of Grace to all Christians. Analogy between Sacramental observances and prayer. Defence of Infant Baptism. The Sacraments only necessary to those by whom their obligation is known. Spiritual regeneration sometimes given by God without, or previous to its outward sign in Baptism. But through Grace may be given to the Heathen, this does not lessen the danger arising from a perverse refusal of the Gospel. Error of all kinds, even when conscientious, a great misfortune. The Grace given to Christians of greater efficacy than that which the Heathen may hope for, and why. Motives for labouring for their conversion. And for gratitude for our own knowledge of the Gospel. - - 285

Corollaries which follow from the above statement. 1. The opposite systems of Pelagius and Calvin are alike disproved.

All the good actions of men referred to God's Grace. Scriptural meaning of the term "Election." Equal degrees of Grace not given to all. Yet no capable subject absolutely excluded from it. - - - 291

2 Grace may be resisted and rendered vain. Fallacy of the Doctrine of Assurance.

No man punished but for neglect of Grace. Men may fall from Grace received. Our own feelings, on the subject of Assurance, may be mistaken by us. Difference between the absence of doubt and the sensation of perfect confidence. The Doctrine of Predestination opposed by our natural instincts. - - 292

LECT. VII.—The Holy Ghost has established his Title to the character of Paraclete by the Revelations which he made to the Apostles.

The Son of God the object, yet more than the teacher of the Christian Faith:—Proved by the ignorance displayed by the Apostles, anterior to the coming of the Paraclete, as to the nature of Christ's kingdom and the reason of his sufferings. That ignorance not to be imputed to natural incapacity or natural prejudice, but to the fact that the time was not come when the designs of God were to be made plain. The doctrines of Atonement for Sin, and the supercession of the Mosaic Law, not clearly expressed by Christ himself, and only to be found in the teaching of God's Spirit through the Apostles. - - - - - - - 292

The Discovery of the Christian Covenant of Pardon and Grace, a sufficient comfort and compensation to Christ's followers for his departure from the World.

Enumeration of the advantages to which the eyes of the Apostles were thus first opened. Effect of these discoveries on their conduct and character. - - 293

The Discovery of that Covenant a necessary and sufficient vindication of Christ's character from the objections of the Jews.

The Spirit of God, in his capacity of Paraclete, was to testify of the Messiah's truth,—to convict the world of the guilt they had incurred in rejecting him, &c. Objections urged by the Jews against the truth of our Lord's pretensions to the character of the Messiah. Those objections not sufficiently answered by the blamelessness of his Life or the greatness of his Miracles. Jewish Treatise called the Nizacchon. Sufficiently answered by the discovery of the nature of that Salvation which Christ wrought for us, and of the means by which it was to be accomplished. The Unitarian system of Theology takes away the only competent answer to the Objections urged by the Jews;—and all adequate motives for the prophecies and miracles by which our Lord's birth, life, and death were distinguished. A Revelation from God may be expected to contain discoveries transcending human reason. - - - - - - - - - - - 293

By his Revelations made to the Apostles the Paraclete instructed the Church in "things to come."

Our Lord himself rarely assumed the prophetic character. Our knowledge of the rise and fall of Anti-Christ,—of the events which are to take place in the last days, &c. all derived from the Holy Ghost through the Apostles. - - - - - - - - - 294

Answer to the Objection that, since the time of the Apostles, no fresh revelation of God's will has been made to the Church.

The promise of our Lord implies the universal and continual superintendence and perfection of the Paraclete, but not that he should be perpetually guiding us into new truths. The inspiration accorded to the Apostles and the elder Prophets not continual or universal. The length of the intervals between the Revelations made to them immaterial. Intervals of the same kind and of very considerable length, occurred in the history of the Jewish Church. The Bath-Col a Rabbinical Fable. Yet God still dwelt in his Temple (Matt. xxiii. 21.) though he had ceased, in a perceptible and miraculous manner, to declare his will from thence,—and, therefore, the Comforter may still be present with the Church, though no case has latterly arisen to demand a new Revelation. - - 294

But, further, the Comforter has, in every age, continued to teach the Church by the Scriptures of the New Testament.

A knowledge of Divine Things being given to the Church,—the manner in which this knowledge is communicated is a matter of indifference. All Revelations made to a few that the many might, through their means, be benefited. Immediate Inspiration not accorded to the majority of Christians in the Apostolic Age. This dispensation not unequal nor disadvantageous to the majority. The abode of the Paraclete among men would have been sufficiently proved by a succession of one or more inspired individuals by whose instruction the Holy Ghost should govern the Church. No difference whether this instruction were oral or epistolary. Nor whether their authors were absent or dead. Therefore, so long as the writings of a deceased Apostle govern the Church, the Holy Ghost who dictated those writings, continues to govern it by them. The Scriptures not only dictated by the Inspiration of the Holy Ghost, but preserved to our time and offered to our notice by his Providence. This particular exertion of his Providence how distinguished from his general care. By the peculiar dispensation in question, the rites which our Saviour appointed before the Paraclete's coming, and the dispensations of the Spirit's mercy and power which we share with other ages and nations, have become more blessed and valuable to the Chistian than to the rest of the world. But it is through Scripture only that the character of these dispensations is thus altered. And by Scripture alone that the Holy Ghost now guides us into truth, or shows us things to come, or pleads the cause of Christ against his enemies. It is, then, as Dispenser of Supernatural Truth and Teacher of the Doctrine of Redemption, that the Holy Ghost sustains his character of Comforter. And this truth he now conveys to us through the Holy Scripture. - - - - - 295

The Inspired Authority of the New Testament asserted.—1st, From the Personal Inspiration of its reputed Authors.

Their Inspiration proved by the miracles which they performed. The reality of those miracles admitted by the ancient enemies of Christianity—Celsus—Julian—the Toldos Jeschu. No want of ability or inclination in the contemporaries of the Apostles to detect any false pretences to miraculous power. The reality of the works in question rendered probable by the sensation which they excited in the Heathen World. Nature of the change which they produced in the habits and pretensions of those who continued hostile to Christianity. Their reality further shown from the internal evidence to this effect offered by the Apostolic Writings. St. Paul speaks of miracles not only as wrought by himself, but by those to whom his Epistles are addressed. Force of this argument. The Apostolic Epistles not addressed in the first instance to the Heathen, or even to the Church at large. Devoid of empirical ostentation. - - - - - - - - 297

2. The New Testament is the genuine Work of the Writers whose name it bears.

Proved from internal Evidence—from universal Tradition—from the reluctance with which Christians in every age have admitted any works into their sacred canon,—from the excellence of the works themselves, as contrasted with the spurious productions which have been, at different times, offered to the Church,—and with the acknowledged compositions of the uninspired contemporaries of the Apostles, - - - 298

Lect. VIII.—Preliminary Observations.

The entire New Testament the work of the Apostles or their accredited amanuenses. The Gospels of Mark, and Luke, sometimes called those of St. Peter and St. Paul. Distinction made by the primitive Church between the Canonical writings and those of the Apostolic Fathers. The claims of those writings called ἀντιλεγόμενα, always placed on the ground of their being the genuine works of the Apostles only. But, though all the works of the New Testament proceed from Inspired Persons,—it might still be questioned whether their Authors were Inspired at the time. Inspiration not a perpetual and pervading gift. Difficulties urged against the inspired Authority claimed by the New Testament. - - - - - - 298

Probability that some of the writings of the Apostles should be inspired, shown,—1st, From the necessity of the case.

Written documents absolutely necessary to the extension and perpetuity of Religious Truth. No rule of faith or practice can be absolute and definitve unless inspired. Nor unless the person who delivered it were inspired at that time and to that effect. Inconveniences of renouncing the plenary inspiration of Scripture; or of confining, with Simon and Warburton, the inspiration of the Sacred Writers to a few conspicuous truths. 299

2. From the Analogy of the Mosaic Dispensation.

Certain Written Laws were given by inspiration to the Jewish Church. But the advantage which was given to the less perfect dispensation would not be withheld from the heirs of the promise to whom it was equally necessary. Nature of this necessity further explained. The leading Facts on which our Faith is founded, might be believed on historic evidence only. —But the practical results which follow from those facts, as explained in Scripture, must be received on the authority of Revelation, or rest on no firm ground whatever. - - - - - - - - - 300

3. From the fact that the Oral Doctrine of the Apostles was, in certain cases, inspired.

This fact established from the promises of Christ, (Mark xiii. 11. Luke xii. 2.) But if the discourses which only extended to a few were thus privileged, we may much more suppose the like assistance given in works where all ages were concerned. - - - 301

The particular Treatises which made up the New Testament, shown to be inspired.

By internal evidence. By Tradition. By the claims advanced in their favour by the Apostles themselves. 1 Cor. vii. 25. 1 Cor. xiv. 37. 2 Cor. v. 20. 2 Pet. iii. 16. Rev. ii. 29. Answer to the objection of Spinoza, "that the Apostles themselves lay no claim to inspiration." The Superscription "Apostle of Christ," in itself implies inspiration. Answer to another objection of Spinoza, taken from 1 Cor. vii. 25, 26. How answered by Horbery. That Text in reality a strong proof of the general inspiration of St. Paul's writings. Spinoza's Third Objection taken from the fact that the Apostles reason and persuade instead of commanding. Not well answered by Simon. God may, without impeachment of his Power and Majesty, use persuasion with his creatures. Exemplified from the Old Testament. - - - - 301

Answer to the Objections levelled against the style and matter of the New Testament.

Necessity of such an answer. All manifestations of God's will, being appeals to the judgment or senses of his creatures, in themselves challenge investigation. 302

Answer to the Objection of the Romanists that the Scriptures are, in themselves, insufficient as a Rule of Faith.

Presumption of requiring an additional guide. The ancient Synagogue and the primitive Church made no such claims as those advanced by a Romanist. The Anathema, what. No remedy provided by Moses for those to whose instruction his writings did not suffice. St. Peter's conduct with regard to the obscure passages in St. Paul. An infallible interpreter of Scripture, a futile expectation—and unnecessary. The Faith of Christians built on Scripture only. By the Scripture the Holy Ghost performs all the Functions of the promised Comforter. Conclusion. - - - - 305

THE

PAROCHIAL LECTURES

ON

THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL.

BY

STEPHEN H. TYNG, D. D.

RECTOR OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

INTRODUCTION.

The Editor of the Christian Library, in pursuance of his plan of furnishing occasionally original productions of American writers for the Library, applied to the author of the following Lectures for some assistance towards that object. These Lectures were prepared and delivered in the regular discharge of pastoral duty, to the congregation of St. Paul's church, in the autumn of 1831. The author had no thought of their publication; and though it has been often suggested to him, he has heretofore declined it altogether. The opinion of others has been, that they could be made useful in a larger distribution, and he has yielded now to this opinion. There is but little room for originality in such Lectures as these. All authors within the writer's reach have been consulted, and very freely used. From Bishop Reynolds, Bishop Hopkins, Dr. J. Edwards, Dr. Dwight and the Rev. C. Simeon, many of the thoughts here presented have been obtained. The latter writer especially, in his university sermons, which have never been republished in this country, so accorded with the views of the author of these Lectures, in his statements upon subjects on which they treated in common, that he has not hesitated to embody large portions of his excellent argument in these discourses. These Lectures exhibit, however, the author's plan of preaching, and the truth as he receives it from the Scriptures. If they can be made useful to others, the object of their publication will be fully answered. At any rate, in reference to a large portion of the clergy and members of the Protestant Episcopal church, it may be said, "So we preach, and so they believed." S. H. T.

LECTURE I.

THE IMPORTANCE OF A KNOWLEDGE OF THE DIVINE LAW.

Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law.—Psalm cxix. 18.

No subject connected with religion is probably estimated by Christians, and enforced from the pulpit, in such inadequate proportion to its real importance, as the divine law. By some it is considered a subject in which all are sufficiently instructed. By others, it is spoken of as a matter which belongs not to gospel preaching; and most men pass over the study of its principles and requisitions with carelessness and unconcern.

The view which the Psalmist entertained of this matter, is well displayed in the devout solicitude with which he speaks of the law in almost every verse of the Psalm from which our text is taken. The extent to which he regarded the spirituality of its precepts, the fervour with which he desired that they might be engraven upon his heart, the sorrow which he experienced in witnessing its violation, the ardour with which he longed to understand its perfections, all unite to show that he considered a knowledge and reverence for the holy law of God of vital importance to the redeemed and enlightened soul. In this Psalm he employs several different words to designate the law. They all have reference to that connected system of divine revelations which are found in the Scriptures; and whether the national law of the Jews, consisting of ceremonies and judgments proper for their circumstances be considered, or the great moral law of God, which has an universal obligation in heaven and on earth, there are contained in each, wondrous things, the understanding of which will well repay the labour of study, and reasonably forms the subject of prayer.

A proper knowledge of the divine law lies at the foundation of all true religion. It opens the only way for understanding and receiving the gospel of Jesus Christ. No man can gain a true knowledge, or an adequate appreciation of the unsearchable riches of redeeming grace, who does not make use of the law, as his schoolmaster to bring him unto Christ. It is therefore of incalculable importance, that we attain right you so evidently need, under the deep conviction, that unless he save you, you must perish.

LECTURE II.

Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of the law.—Psalm cxix. 18.

As a proper introduction to this course of sermons upon the Divine Law, I have attempted to show you the vast importance of an accurate knowledge of this law. In my last discourse I opened this subject by asserting that upon a proper knowledge of the operation and demands of the law of God, depended all our just views of religious truth—all our proper feelings of religious character, and all our scriptural and well-founded hopes of religious blessings.

The proof of the first of these assertions occupied our attention when I addressed you before; and it was my object to show, that without an accurate knowledge and view of the divine law, we could form no just conceptions of the perfections of God, of the offices of Christ, or of the operations of the Holy Ghost. In this view of the subject, there was seen abundant reason for the petition of the text. But what we then considered, forms only a part of the wondrous things which we may here behold, and we shall find still more reason to desire that our eyes may be opened with spiritual understanding upon this all-important subject, when we have finished our meditations upon the other two points before us.

II. A proper knowledge of the law lies at the foundation of all true religion, practical as well as doctrinal, and while all just views of religious truth rest upon this, all proper feelings in religion, the whole state of the affections acceptable in the sight of God, are dependant upon it also.

1. All the affections and feelings which now belong to man, in connexion with his Creator, are those which arise from the fact of his natural sinfulness and guilt. Mere natural religion, of which men sometimes speak, the religion of man's own reason, brings no offerings unto God, but those of Cain, which, like his, must be inevitably rejected. Man has no way of his own by which he can find an acceptable approach to his offended Maker. His native situation is one of utter ruin and danger; the wrath of God abideth on him, and he is living upon the despised forbearance of his Judge, a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction. Of the extent of this natural guilt and danger, however, he is ignorant, and must be ignorant, until he be made acquainted with what God requires of him. By the law is the knowledge of sin; and the conviction which the sinner has of his guilt, will depend entirely upon the view which he takes of the divine law. If he has been accustomed to see it as a spotless and inflexible system, to hear it say to him, of the utmost conceivable devotion to God, and obedience to his will, "Do this, do it always, do it perfectly, do it forever, or thou must die;" when his eyes are opened, to behold his own deficiencies, he will see himself to be counted altogether guilty, and to have his mouth entirely stopped before God; he will see in the demands of the holy law, such an extent of violated and neglected claims upon his soul, that there is left for him no feeling upon which he can rest the shadow of hope, nor any circumstance which he can plead in extenuation of a single deficiency; he is condemned; he is only condemned; he is condemned eternally. This the law shows him, when he beholds its searching application to his own character.

But if he has been satisfied with more general and indefinite views of the claims of the law, the same indistinctness is transferred to his conviction of his personal guilt. What he sees not to be guilty in fact, he will not see to be guilty in himself. His heart will plead a thousand excuses from temptation and imbecility and inadvertence; and while he acknowledges that in many things he has certainly done wrong, he cannot see that even his holy things have been guilt, and every recess of his heart filled with odious and abominable wickedness. Upon a proper knowledge of the divine law depends all true conviction of sin.

2. Again, without an accurate knowledge of the law, there can be no true humility. In the connexion between man and his Creator, this grace is of the highest importance. But what is humility? It is not merely a sense of our weakness as creatures, nor is it a mere general acknowledgment that we are sinners. Not a human being, probably, would deny either of these facts. But it is a deep and abiding consciousness of our guilty and undone state. It is a consciousness that darkness itself is not more opposite to light, than we are to the pure and holy law of God. It is such a sense of our utter alienation from God, and of our voluntary enmity against him; of the fact, that every imagination of the thoughts of our heart is only evil continually, as makes us really abhor and loath ourselves, and repent in dust and ashes, before a God who searcheth the heart, who has surrounded us with his mercies, and will bring every secret thing into judgment, whether it be good, or whether it be evil. This is that broken and contrite spirit which God will not despise. But how rarely is this seen! How seldom do we find persons penetrated with this deep sense of sin, smiting upon their breasts, and crying aloud for mercy, as sinners deserving God's infinite wrath and indignation! Suppose you saw a man under this proper consciousness of sin, crying out, "I am damned, I am damned already,"—groaning under the most distressing apprehensions of the anger of God; which of you, even if you did not deride his fears, would not be ready to suppose that he carried matters quite to an excess, and that unless he had been guilty of some transgressions far beyond the common walk of men, there could be no reason for such excessive griefs and sorrows? Such penitents are few, and such comforters, miserable as they are, would be found in every class of life.

But why is all this? Would it be a false view of the sinner's character that would lead to such distress? No. This false estimation of his sorrow arises from universal ignorance of the divine law. Men do not try either themselves or others by this high standard. Being insensible of their departures from God, they see no cause for such humiliation on account of these departures. The idea of humility, as the scriptures present the term, never enters into the natural mind. The unconverted man does not know the meaning of the word. Copious as were the languages of Greece and Rome, they had not a word which can convey the idea of humility, as expressed in the language of the Bible. The word which expressed their notion of humility, spoke of it just as every natural man thinks of it, as associated with meanness and dishonour, rather than as a high and exalted virtue. Though all now profess to admire humility as a grace, there is not in the universe a man in his natural and unconverted state, that either possesses it, or approves of it according to its real import. It is one of the wondrous things to be beheld from a proper knowledge of the law, and God alone can open our eyes to see and desire it.

3. The same assertion may be made of true gratitude to God. Gratitude is nothing but a thankful sense of mercies which have been received, and it will depend in its degree entirely upon the amount of benefits which the individual supposes to have been conferred upon him. The Christian who sees himself in the light of God's revelations, will view himself as a poor bondslave, ransomed from sin and Satan, death and hell, and ransomed, too, by the precious blood of his Incarnate God. He will be, in his own apprehension, altogether "a brand plucked out of the burning." An apostate fiend, redeemed from the very fires of hell, would not, in his estimation, be a greater monument of grace than he. Having this view of himself, his whole soul blesses his redeeming God, and he calls upon all that is within him to praise his holy name. But, alas! how rarely do we see this transport! How few, even truly redeemed, appear duly sensible of the weight of obligations which has been laid upon them? A proper and reasonable sense of man's unworthiness and God's abundant love, would be generally esteemed extravagant and absurd. To the generality of men, some faint acknowledgments are quite sufficient to express their sense of redeeming love; and stronger language, and stronger emotions, than they indulge, are considered fanatical and false. But oh! how different is this state of mind from the feelings of the holy beings around the throne of God. Angels and saints are penetrated with the devoutest admiration of the stupendous mystery of grace displayed in man's redemption. The one, adoring its transcendant excellency; the other, giving praise to God, as experiencing themselves its richest benefits.

They are all prostrating themselves before the throne of the Lamb. Why is it that men are so cold and insensible? Is it not simply because they see not the depths from whence they have been redeemed? Because they have no clear view of the condemnation under which the law had sealed them, for repeated violation? Did they see in the mirror of God's holy law, the depth of misery from which they have been delivered, they would have far other thoughts and feelings in regard to that heavenly Saviour who came down into the abyss of their ruin, to save them with an everlasting salvation; and from this knowledge of the claims of the law, holy and ardent gratitude would arise to him who was content to bear its demands himself, that they might be released from the necessity of bearing them forever. But having reduced almost to nothing, in this ignorance of the law, their obligations to him, it is not a matter for surprise that their gratitude for his goodness should be proportionably weak and vapid.

4. Without having our eyes opened to behold the true character of the divine law, there will be no holy zeal for God. Who among the redeemed on earth, feels this in any measure correspondent with what the Scripture demands? We are represented as bought with a price; and are therefore called upon to glorify God in our bodies and spirits, which are his. Were we truly sensible of our obligations to God, no service under heaven would appear too great as a return to him. All that we could do for such a Lord, would be nothing in our eyes; and all that we could suffer for him would be accounted light and vain. Our time, our talents, our property, our influence, our whole life, would appear of no value, but as they could be made subservient to advance the divine glory. But how little of this spirit is seen! and how little is it approved among men even when it is seen! How infinitely below this is the standard of those who value themselves upon their morality of conduct! And this deficiency must be traced to the cause we have repeatedly noticed. Humility, gratitude, and zeal for God, all rise or fall, according to our views of the law. According as these are deep, or superficial, will the others evince themselves to accord, or disagree, with the standard which is proposed to us in the gospel.

We can never have an entire devotedness of heart to God, as his redeemed people, until we apprehend the extent of our redemption. With defective views of this, we shall be contented with a low standard of obedience, and never aspire after a perfect conformity to the divine image of God. To walk altogether as Christ walked, will appear to us as bondage. To tread in the steps of the holy apostles, will be regarded as being righteous overmuch. To glory in the cross for Christ's sake, and to rejoice that we are counted worthy to suffer shame, and even death for him, will be thought a state of mind, desirable only for apostles, and missionaries, and martyrs. But no state of mind inferior to this will prove us to be really sincere in the service of the Lord. No partial devotion will be an acceptable sacrifice unto the Lord. If we would be Christ's indeed, we must live not unto ourselves, but unto him who died for us and rose again; purifying ourselves even as he is pure, and being perfect even as our Father who is in heaven is perfect. This is the result of the constraining love of Christ. The grace of Christ alone can effect it in us. Without this grace we must remain destitute of this spirit forever. Without a vital union to Christ we have not, and we cannot have, these high attainments of the gospel; and our ignorance of the divine law will keep us separated from Christ forever. Upon a proper knowledge of the law, therefore, all religious feelings, the whole right state of the affections, depend. And this fact brings home to us, with great seriousness and value, the petition of our text: Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law.

III. Our third general object is to show that a proper understanding of the divine law is the foundation of all scriptural hopes of religious blessings, as well as of all just views and proper feelings in religion.

It is made the subject of repeated prayer by the apostles, that the Christians, to whom they wrote and ministered, might have the eyes of their understanding enlightened, that they might be able to comprehend for themselves the nature and worth of gospel hopes and privileges, and be able to give to others a reason for the hope which was in them. Clear views of religious truth are indispensable to the enjoyment of a rational and consoling hope of life eternal; and while Satan is deluding the vast multitudes of the unconverted with false and unfounded hopes, the nature and the fact of these deceits are only to be ascertained by an examination of the ground upon which the professed hope is resting.

All false hopes of life arise from an ignorance of the divine law. When a sinner is found claiming, as it were, from the reasonableness and justice of God's dealings, eternal life, because he has done no harm, has injured or defrauded no man,—what but ignorance of the law has veiled his mind with an expectation so deceitful? While he sees not that his very best deeds stand in need of mercy as much as his vilest sins; that the smallest defect entails upon him an eternal curse as truly as the most enormous transgressions; that his prayers, by themselves, will condemn him as certainly as his oaths, upon what but total misapprehension of the nature of the divine claims and requisitions, does his false confidence of security depend?

If another man speaks of his hope as founded upon the unbounded mercy of God, which is over all his works, the same ignorance of the law lies at the foundation of this delusion. When a judge is seated upon the bench, could the plea of guilt, on the part of the criminal, be in any degree affected by an assertion of previous dependence upon the mercy that should be found on trial? The hour of trial is the time of law, and not the time for mercy. In the present life, there is abundant mercy offered to the sinner; but in God's own way. When the time of final retribution arrives, all claim upon mercy has passed by; and the principles of just and equal law must govern every determination. The man still sinning, and trusting in divine mercy for final and future pardon, is destroyed by his ignorance of the law. Its claims must be satisfied. It allows not, it cannot allow, the name of mercy. Without the shedding of blood, it offers no remission; and until its full penalty has been sustained, it is utterly vain to think of charming its demands to rest. The mercy of God is shown in his gracious method of making satisfaction to the law for the sinner's soul. It can never be exhibited in setting aside the demands of the law while they remain unsatisfied.

From the same ignorance of the law springs that indefinite kind of hope which great numbers express in the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ. They can give no reason for trusting in him. They have no clear idea of what he has done, that should lead them to this confidence. They furnish no evidence in the holy devotion of their lives, that they have been truly brought by the Holy Spirit to believe in him; nor have they probably any distinct emotion in their hearts connected with that faith of which they speak. But they say they believe in Jesus Christ, and that all their hope is in him. At the same time, they do not, and will not accept salvation, upon the terms on which it is offered in the gospel. They will not agree to renounce their good works, as they are called, as a partial ground of dependance; and to enter the kingdom of heaven at the same gate with publicans and harlots. This is too humiliating. Their proud hearts must have something in which they can boast themselves. And if they cannot make their own lives the sole ground of their justification, they will rely upon them in part. Or if they are to be brought to rest only upon the merit of Christ, they will make their own goodness a reason for believing in him. They will not suffer themselves to be stript of all self-preference. They will not glory solely in the cross of Christ. The condemning character of the law they have never experienced nor seen. They have not the least idea of the way in which it lays guilt and death upon their souls; nor though they assert the possession of a hope in Jesus Christ, do they know or trouble themselves to think what he has done, or how he has done any thing for them.

All these false hopes, and all other hopes of the same kind, rise up and are entertained in the unconverted mind, because the eyes have never been opened to see wondrous things in the divine law. Man cannot live without some hope; and Satan, perfectly aware of this, presents these refuges of lies; and keeping his mind in ignorance, deceives him into the embracing and confiding in these unfounded expectations. The fact that ignorance is the source of these false hopes, will open to us, in part, the importance of that knowledge of the law which lies at the foundation of all true and scriptural hope. Hope is founded entirely upon faith. It is a kind of personal application of the subject of faith. Now the faith which alone justifies the soul, is that which brings us simply to the Lord Jesus Christ as the great end and fulfilment of the law for the believing sinner. If we attempt in any measure or degree to blend with the work of Christ's redemption any thing of our own, we make utterly void all that he has done and suffered for us. From that moment Christ has become of no effect to us. As far as we are concerned, he has died in vain.

Faith looks to Christ as the sole answer to the demands of the law. A due attention to the law presents two distinct claims, which it makes upon every sinner. Death, as the punishment of past guilt; and spotless, eternal obedience, as the title to future reward. Somewhere, either in the sinner, or according to the covenant of grace in the substitute for the sinner, these must be found, or else the law still stands as a flaming and impassable sword, at the gate of life. Now, while these can never be found in the sinner himself, faith discerns them both, in their utmost possible value, in the sinner's surety. As the punishment which the law demands for past guilt, there is seen the sufferings and death of an immaculate Redeemer, upon whom has been laid the believer's load; and from his satisfaction, faith offers to hope a full and unqualified pardon for past transgressions. As the obedience without blemish, which the law requires for justification, there is beheld the perfect, voluntary, unrequired obedience which the Son of God rendered to its precepts; a righteousness which magnified the law and made it honourable; and in the personal imputation of this righteousness to the believer freely, through the grace of God, faith presents to hope an undisputed and interminable title to that life eternal which the soul desires. Here then is a scriptural and well-founded hope. It is a reasonable, religious, and holy hope. It is a sure, immovable, and satisfying hope. But upon what does it rest, save upon a knowledge of what Christ has actually done? And whence does a knowledge of what Christ has done arise, but from a proper view of what the law of God required should be done? Thus it is that true hope rests upon a knowledge of the law; and until we have obtained this knowledge, nothing under heaven can lead us to a simple and living faith in Jesus, or give us the hope which springs from such a faith.

Under these three heads of just views, proper feelings and scriptural hopes in religion, I think I have shown the importance of a proper knowledge of the divine law, and of the petition which our text contains. O that I might impress upon your minds the vast importance of this subject! Its ignorance is the root of all the superficial views and statements in religion with which the Christian world is filled. The salvation of your souls depends upon the acceptance or rejection of the truths which are thus displayed. Let the earnest petition of the text be adopted by every hearer. God's Holy Spirit must deliver you from darkness, in this all-involving concern. The day-spring from on high must guide your feet into the way of peace. If you find yourselves in total ignorance, as many of you must, in this matter, or if you find yourselves, though having partial knowledge to have but indistinct conceptions of the truths which have been set before you, make the prayer of David the prayer of your hearts. Seek wisdom from above, and seek it with all your hearts, that you may walk no more in the blindness of your minds, having your understandings darkened through the ignorance that is in them. You must know the extent of your disease before you will be adequately convinced of the importance of the remedy, or see the adaptation of the remedy to your wants. Give yourselves, then, to the understanding of this vital portion of religious truth; that, by the Spirit of God opening your eyes, and elevating your affections, and guiding your hearts, you may be led to the attainment and possession of a hope which maketh not ashamed; a hope in Jesus, which shall lead you, though you see him not, yet believing in him, to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

LECTURE III.

THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE LAW.

We know that the law is spiritual.—Romans vii. 14.

I have spoken of the importance of a proper understanding of the divine law, upon two previous occasions. The character of that law, of which we are to acquire a knowledge, comes now before us as our present subject. In considering the nature of the law, the first and most important attribute of it is the one declared in our text—its spirituality.

The apostle speaks in this text exclusively of the moral law, to which our attention has been, and is still turned. The judicial law of the Israelites was merely the common law of that nation. It never had, nor was it ever designed to have, the least authority over the inhabitants of any other land. This law could not, in any sense, be said to be a spiritual law. Like all other statute books, its requisitions and prohibitions took cognizance only of the outward acts of its subjects, and recompensed obedience or disobedience respectively, with temporal impunity and protection, and with temporal suffering and death. This law cannot be said to be abrogated in regard to other nations, for it never had authority beyond the bounds of the posterity of Jacob.

The ceremonial law, or the precepts which enjoined the ceremonies and observances of Jewish religion, can with no more propriety be called spiritual. St. Paul styles it a law of carnal commandments; and speaks of it expressly as consisting of carnal ordinances. It was a system of shadows, under which were meant to be represented the great truths and realities of the religion of Jesus; and in itself, it made nothing perfect. This law, like the judicial law of the Israelites, was entirely partial in its application. It was never imposed upon the Gentiles, except as they became proselytes to the religion of the Jews; and, therefore, in regard to them, it can with no more propriety than the last, be said to be abrogated.

The great moral law of Jehovah was embodied in the institutes to which the Israelites were required to submit. But it is entirely separable from that which was merely local and temporary in its authority and its claims. Of this, the Psalmist says, the law of God is perfect, converting the soul; the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes. It is to this, and this only, that the apostle refers in our text, as a spiritual law. This, he says, was ordained to life; or first designed to confer life upon man, as the result of his obedience; and it was only by its transgression that it was found to be unto death. This law was perfectly holy. All its commandments were holy, just, and good. And the very holiness of the law made sin appear exceeding sinful.

Let us understand, then, distinctly, what is to be meant by the moral law, of which the declaration of our text is made. It is that law which is embodied in the ten commandments given to Moses on Mount Sinai, by the ministration of angels. It was written then by the finger of God, and communicated with a pomp and majesty which became its character. The ceremonial and national law was revealed afterwards, and in private. The same law is reduced by Jesus Christ to two simple commandments, embracing supreme love to the Creator, and universal benevolence to his creatures; and still more narrowed down in terms by St. Paul, who says, that love is the fulfilling of the law. To this great law every angelic being is subjected. This law was originally written upon the heart of man in paradise; but being obliterated in consequence of the fall, by the love of sin, and forgetfulness of God, it needed to be republished. In fallen and degraded man, there remained no good thing; not even the remembrance of what his Creator had originally required of him. In order, then, to display the real character of God; to show how much transgression abounded; to exhibit the universal necessity for the promised seed, whom God had taught men to expect, as a blessing to all nations; the divine law was anew proclaimed to the Israelites. This moral law was announced before any private and peculiar institutions were imposed, because this was the foundation of all other commands. In the acknowledgment of subjection to this, the Israelites confessed the right of God to impose upon them any precepts, which in his infinite wisdom should seem advisable. It showed them on what terms life was to have been obtained by man in a state of purity; the only terms upon which the law could offer life. It showed them also the utter impossibility of attaining this object by the law, in a state of transgression; and thus revealing on the one hand the demand, and on the other the impossibility of complying with it; it shut them up to the faith which should be afterwards revealed.

Of this law our text speaks; a law of total submission to the will of the Creator; as obligatory upon Gentiles as upon Jews; as binding in heaven as upon earth. Of this it is said, we know that the law is spiritual. This attribute of the law is a fundamental truth, and one as evident as the same attribute of God. None can deny it, without denying the whole character of God, of which the law is a transcript. And with the same authority and truth with which we can say, we know that God is a Spirit, may we also say, we know that the law is spiritual.

I am now brought, therefore, to the point at which I desired to arrive, the spirituality of the law.

I. My first object will be to explain the meaning of the expression—the law is spiritual.

1. In its origin, it flowed from no human or subordinate source, but from God, who is himself a spirit; whom no eye hath seen, nor can see. This law is a copy of the character and will of the Deity. The same inspiration which says, love is the fulfilling of the law, says, God is love; so that a perfect conformity to the law would be an entire imitation of the moral character of God. It was first established when the first creature was formed, for then the will of the Creator was first declared. In heaven, it is binding upon the spirits exclusively; and the love which moves in the breasts of innumerable holy beings around the throne of God, is the fulfilling of this law. There its origin and its whole operation are equally spiritual; and it is admired and reverenced there as the mirror in which the infinitely glorious perfections of the Deity are beheld.

In reference to man, the origin of the law is spiritual. It was communicated by the Holy Ghost. It was written by the Spirit of God, upon the heart of man, in the hour of his creation. When Adam opened his eyes first upon the beauties with which God had been pleased to surround him, this spiritual law upon his heart led him to lift up his immediate offering of pure and perfect love to his great Creator, and to scatter from his spotless soul the fragrance of the offering upon every created being. It was spiritually republished in the soul of every child of God, after the apostacy, in the hour in which that soul was brought back to God in a spirit of new obedience. It was spiritually proclaimed through the mediation of Moses, and other men of God, who spake its requisitions, as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. It has still the same spiritual origin when the renewed heart is led to perceive and admire its perfections, and the inner man converted unto God, is made to delight in its commands. It is one of those important things which the natural man perceiveth not, nor is able to know, but by the Spirit of God. In its origin, in heaven, with the first created being; on earth, in the heart of Adam; in the revelations of the scriptures, and in the soul of every ransomed sinner, we know that the law is spiritual, and by the Spirit alone to be revealed to man.

2. The law is spiritual in its requisitions. It was probably chiefly under this aspect that the apostle made the declaration of the text. The law is regarded by some, merely according to the letter of its precepts. The ten commandments, for instance, are considered as simply referring, in their commands and prohibitions, to the external acts or duties of which they speak. This is a false and partial view of the subject. In opposition to it, the assertions of scripture carry these precepts as strongly to the desires and purposes of the mind, as to the open conduct of the life. The whole law is spiritual in its application. It lays its power upon the inner man, and while it reveals what God commands, it requires unqualified and unbroken obedience in the heart which God searches. If man were shut out from the possibility of external breaches of the commands; nay, if he were out of the body in which they must be accomplished, and were wholly a spirit, the law would impose the same obligation upon him, and make the same demands from him. The principle of obedience, is that to which the law looks, a total submission to the authority of God. The change of occasional relations to other created beings, does not at all alter the demand for this single principle of subjection to the divine will. This is the spirituality of the requisitions of the law. The thoughts and purposes which lead, in their regular issue, to outward violations of these requisitions, are themselves as much sins against the law, as the results to which they tend. When the law forbids a sin, it equally forbids every thought, and occupation, and feeling, which would lead to its commission; and when it commands a duty, it equally enjoins every circumstance and habit which can conduce to its performance. In the prohibition of sin, it requires, in the same precept, the contrary duty, and in the injunction of a duty, it forbids the transgression which stands against it. It is thus exceeding broad in its application to the conscience, and like a two-edged sword, cutting at the same moment in opposite directions. If the ten commandments, or any one of them, be considered, this is to be the principle of their interpretation; or if we take the two commands into which the Lord has resolved the whole, this is their legitimate application. In the assertion that the law is spiritual in its demands, we simply mean that it demands the heart, in its obedience. Its object is not the regulation of the outward conduct, the directing, or the cutting off the streams of life. It goes to the fountain of all character in the soul, and demands the perfect cleansing of that, in a perfect conformity to the character of God. If it could be a possible event, it would be entirely true, that though in every feeling, and desire, and act of a whole life, an individual had been obedient, and but one single thought had risen in rebellion against God, or gone astray from him, that one thought would as really annihilate the whole obedience to which it had been attached, as a life of iniquity. This was the fact with the first man, who, by one purpose of transgression, destroyed his whole covenant of life. This is the spirituality of the law's demands. It requires, in your whole heart, a submission to God, uninterrupted by a single insurgent feeling, a purity of character, uncontaminated by a single spot, and a zeal of devotion, unrelaxing in a single purpose. Thus we know that in its precepts the law is spiritual; it has no partial operation for the earth. The very same character it requires throughout the universe. What angels are in heaven, it requires that you should have been, from your birth, and be forever. Its precepts reach the heart, and there are to be obeyed in a perfect and perpetual display of the character of God.

3. The law is spiritual in its operations. It was originally ordained to be a covenant of life, and its spiritual operation, then, was simply in its holy, searching and animating guidance to a perfect conformity of the soul to God. It was the friend and guide of man. It taught him what his Creator required. It warned him of what his Creator had forbidden, and thus, in the keeping of its precepts, it gave him great reward.

The disobedience of man has changed the whole course of these spiritual operations of the law. The law can never be the friend of sinners. It comes now with no offer of life. But faithful to God, it stands forth as the witness and the enemy against all who rebel against him. The whole operation of the law upon a sinner, is to convince and condemn him. It comes in the majesty of its authority, and in the clearness of its accusations, for this twofold purpose. It lays out before his conscience the extent of its own claims, and places, side by side, with them, the enormity of his transgressions. It shows him what God requires, and then it shows him what he has done, and thus, spiritually laying open to him his aggravated guilt, it convinces him of the truth of its statements. It stops his mouth from all excuses. It compels him to cry out in deep humiliation, unclean, unclean. Having thus convinced him of the fact of his transgressions, it comes in its condemning power to pass the sentence upon his soul. It proclaims the wages of sin; it announces a coming wrath; it unveils destruction; it strips off the covering of hell; and thus, spiritually destroying the transgressor's soul, it constrains him to exclaim in the bitterness of anguish, "O, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death."

Here the work of the law ends. It cannot go beyond this limit. It convinces and condemns the sinner, and then leaves him to perish. In this aspect, every true Christian may say, as the result of his own experience, I know that the law is spiritual.

Under these three views I wish you to consider the spirituality of the law. In its origin, its requisitions, and its operations. Spiritual in all, because it came from, and is employed by that Divine Spirit who first made man holy, and now renews him again in holiness, after his own perfect image.

II. My second object will be, to draw some suitable reflections from this subject. And,

1. How deeply this view of the divine law must humble the soul of the very holiest of men! As to gross outward violations of the law, many of you may be comparatively blameless. But who has rendered unto God that glory which is his due, and despised every thing, in comparison with him? Were we to trace that line of conduct which the law lays down, in the different relations of life, who would not be compelled, in view of it, to acknowledge that his transgressions were multiplied more than the hairs of his head, and as the sands upon the sea shore? And if we come to the tempers and dispositions which we have exercised, and to the thoughts which we have harboured, who must not blush to lift up his eyes unto heaven, and be ashamed and confounded in the presence of that God who searcheth the hearts? But to call to mind what we have done, or what we have left undone, will give us a very inadequate view of our sinfulness. If you would estimate yourselves aright, you must take the high standard of God's holy law, and see how infinitely short of your duty you have come, in every act of your lives, and in every moment of your existence. You must not inquire merely whether you have loved God at all; but how near you have come to what his law requires, and his perfections demand. You must trace the whole state of your souls from the beginning of their life, and estimate it by this rule. You will then see that your attainments have been as nothing, literally, I say, as nothing, in comparison of your short comings and defects. The poorest bankrupt that ever existed has paid as great a proportion of his debt as you have of your debt to God; yea, he is in a far higher state than you, for he, if he discharge nothing of his debt, adds nothing to it, but you have been augmenting your debt, every day, every hour, every moment. The very best deeds of the very best men in an unconverted state, when tried by the touchstone of God's perfect law, are but one continued accumulation of guilt and misery, against the day of wrath. If you try yourselves only by the letter of the law, you will not see this; but if you look into its spirit, there will be no terms too humiliating to express your sinfulness and your desert of God's wrath and indignation.

O that I could call you to this self-abasing view! That I could wrest out of your hands that delusive plea, that you have done no harm! I pray you take judgment for your line, and righteousness for your plummet, and judge yourselves as God judgeth. It is by his judgment that you must stand or fall, and not by your own; and his judgment, rely upon it, will be according to truth.

Were the condemnation that awaits you to affect only the present life, we might be contented to leave you under your delusions. But we know that you must shortly appear before the heart-searching God, to receive your final doom. Then the book of his remembrance will be opened. Then your own consciences will attest the truth of every accusation which shall be brought against you; and then will you see the equity both of the test by which you will be tried, and of the sentence which shall be pronounced against you. There will be no respect of persons in the judgment of this spiritual law. The learned and dignified will stand on the same footing with the most illiterate peasant; or rather will have a severer judgment, in proportion to the advantages which they shall have neglected to improve. The Lord grant you ability to lay these considerations duly to heart; and enable you to abase yourselves before God with that humility of mind, and that brokenness of heart, which God will not despise.

2. In conclusion I would remark, how foolish are all attempts to establish a righteousness of our own by the works of the law! There is not a single precept which does not testify before God against our guilt. Some persons, indeed, have an idea, that Christ has lowered the terms of the law, and brought down its demands to the standard of human infirmity. But where can they find any thing that sanctions such an idea as this? Which of the commands has the Lord Jesus lowered? He has summed up the whole decalogue in his two precepts: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself. Which of these two has he set aside? Which has he dispensed with? Or what measure of abatement has he made in either of them? If this law before the coming of Christ required too much, was it then holy, just and good? If, on the contrary, it required only what was really due, then has not Christ, if he has at all lowered its demands, robbed God of the obedience which was due to him; and thus become himself the minister and patron of sin?

On every subject which concerns the Deity would I speak with reverence; but I must say, that God cannot reduce the demands of his own law. It would be to divest himself of his own glory, and to give liberty to man to violate the obligations which every rational creature of necessity owes to the Creator. The law of God is as immutable as himself; for it is a perfect transcript of his own mind and will. It is a matter of indispensable duty to every creature to love the Creator with supreme affection; and to love, in subordination to him, all the works of his intelligent creation. This law is unalterable. And if any would obtain a righteousness by it, they must obey it perfectly, from first to last; and as this is utterly impossible to those who are already transgressors, the thought of obtaining righteousness by the law must be relinquished by every soul of man. You must, if you would be saved at all, seek for some other righteousness more commensurate with the demands of the law, and more consistent with the honour of the Lawgiver.

I would to God you could all adopt the declaration of the text: "We know that the law is spiritual." But how generally are you ignorant of this important matter! Nay, what general ignorance of it prevails throughout the Christian world! All sinners are desirous of moderating the law to their own standard. All are anxious to lessen their own criminality before God; and to do this, they thus attempt to make him the partner of their guilt. I beseech you to settle it in your minds, as an indisputable fact, that the law of God is altogether a spiritual law; and that it must remain so for ever. Let it be thoroughly understood, that this is the nature of the law of which, in these discourses, I am proceeding to speak; and if you gain a clear insight into this important attribute of the law, the uses and operations of it, as subsequently considered, will be perfectly distinct and intelligible to your minds. My great object in the whole of this course of remark, is to persuade you to give up your vain confidence in yourselves; to cease from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; to lay aside every notion that you have any thing to offer unto God, and to look for a righteousness which shall correspond with the utmost demands of this spiritual law. Such a righteousness is provided in the Lord Jesus Christ, and freely offered by him to every penitent and believing sinner. Remaining under the law, you remain under a curse. You are exposed to the everlasting anger of God for each thought of your life. It gives you no hope and no comfort. The law is spiritual, and you are carnal and sold under sin. It condemns and destroys you in every one of its precepts; and it is the height of infatuation to look to it for justification and life. If these appear to you hard sayings, the Spirit of God must enable you to receive them. He must subdue your pride and vain confidence; and show you by the very law to which you thus cling, that you are condemned and ruined. O that his convincing power were received and exercised in all your consciences; that you could be compelled to cry, God be merciful to us sinners; that you could be constrained, in the view of the law's unbending, impossible demands, to ask, What shall we do to be saved? Then would you follow me in these considerations with success; and find, to your souls' salvation, that Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.

LECTURE IV.

THE CONVINCING POWER OF THE LAW.

Now, we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law, that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God.—ROMANS III. 19.

The consideration of the spirituality of the law leads us to consider next, as the subject immediately succeeding, the uses and operations of the law. The serious contemplation of the extent of the divine law, must lead us with the Psalmist to exclaim, "Thy commandment is exceeding broad." Though, like him, we have seen an end of all perfection, taken and understood the dimensions of all other things, and been able to estimate the worth of all created objects, yet none by searching can find out God, or behold the extent of that law, which is a perfect transcript or picture of his character. The view which I have attempted to give you of the spiritual character of the law, is entirely inadequate to the importance of the subject; but it is probably sufficiently extensive, to convince you that the subject is important in the highest degree, and one which it is reasonable for us to desire to understand.

We now take the law, thus extended and illustrated, for our subject; and proceed to speak of its uses to us who live under the operation and within the reach of the privileges of gospel grace. It is not uncommon to deny its whole application to men living under the gospel; and it is frequently denied to have any thing like the power and influence which will be assigned to it in these discourses; and which are assigned to it, I believe, in the infallible revelations of the scriptures. The question which the apostle asks, "Whereto serveth the law?" is asked, but in a different spirit, by many among us. The subject now before us will be sufficient, if it be properly regarded, to answer this question, to those by whom it is suggested in a spirit of inquiry; and to set aside the objections of those by whom it is brought forward, in a fretful spirit of opposition.

In pursuing my design, I shall present the spiritual law of the Most High to your view, under four different aspects:

I. In its CONVINCING power upon the conscience of the sinner.

II. In its CONDEMNING power upon the soul of the impenitent.

III. In its GUIDING power to lead the sinner to Christ.

IV. In its GOVERNING power to control him after he has embraced the gospel.

The subject of the present discourse, is the convincing power of the law upon the conscience of the sinner. "Now we know that whatsoever things the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law, that every mouth may be stopped and the whole world become guilty before God."

It is by "whatsoever things the law saith," that its power to convict the sinner is displayed. The legitimate and proper operation of this power is "to those who are under the law;" and so extensive will be seen this proper operation of the law, "that every mouth will be stopped, and the whole world will become guilty before God," or come under the judgment of God, justly forfeited and condemned. This convincing power of the law is either shown in the salutary awakening of the sinner in his day of grace, that he may be brought to Christ for life, or in the final arousing of his conscience in the day of judgment, that he may acknowledge the justice of his own condemnation. In one or the other of these conditions, the mouth of every sinner in the universe shall be stopped; and under an irresistible conviction, he shall be compelled to acknowledge himself guilty before God.

The power of the law to convince the sinner in his day of grace, that he may be saved by his acceptance of the Lord Jesus, is the subject to which I would direct your attention at this time. The law is the great instrument which the spirit of God employs to convince men of sin; and in his hands it is declared to be living and powerful, and sharper than a two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder the soul and spirit; laying open to view the most secret purposes and plans of the inner man; and discerning or separating, for the purpose of clearer exhibition, the thoughts and intents of the heart.

In this process of conviction, the law is altogether an instrument of the Holy Ghost. In itself, it is to the conscience of the transgressor a mere dead letter, because his eyes are so blinded that he will not see its impartial records; and like the deaf adder, he stops his ears that he may not hear that which it testifies against his soul. This refusal to behold and listen, the spirit of God overcomes; and putting life and resistless power into the declarations of the law, he breaks down all the sinner's strong holds of pride and self-confidence, and crushes his rebellious spirit into the dust of humiliation and conscious ruin. Though without this spiritual application of the law he may be alive and boastful in himself, when the commandment comes with the attendant power of the Holy Ghost, sin revives in all its awful, deadly and destructive features, shows itself to his conscience, without disguise, in its own hideous form; and he, under the clear apprehension of its guilt, and the danger which attends it, dies; lies powerless at the feet of Jesus, and yields himself to the new creation of his grace.

I. By the instrumentality of "whatsoever things the law saith," the Holy Spirit convinces the sinner of the guilt of his past trangressions. We have already seen that the law claims entire, perpetual and spotless obedience. It describes the holiest of possible character, and demands the conformity of the whole man to that. In the exercise of its convincing power, it reveals this true character of itself to the sinner's understanding, and compels him to acknowledge it; and then comparing the obliquity and defects of his own character with its strictness and purity, laying down a rule perfectly straight and unbending upon the crookedness of all his conduct, it gives him thus a knowledge of sin. It communicates a knowledge both of the nature of sin in itself, as a transgression of this law, and of the existence of it, in an aggravated degree, in his own character and life. You have naturally no disposition to attend to the things which the law saith. In reply to its holy and inflexible demands, your hearts are ready to say, "Not so; be that far from thee to condemn the righteous with the wicked." But it is the truth, that the law lays the most awful charges of guilt against your souls; and in the operation of it, to which I now refer, it convinces you of their justice. It searches into your character, and shows you to be, by nature and voluntary habit, a mass of corruption and sin; having the whole head sick, and the whole heart faint. It charges you with having spent the time which the divine forbearance has allowed you on earth, in an open defiance of the great God of heaven. It accuses you of presumptuous sins committed against warning and knowledge; of relapsing into them against vows, and protestations, and prayers; of rushing by all the admonitions and entreaties of your own conscience, in the determination of your sin. It accuses you of sins of inadvertence and ignorance, utterly without number; of allowing days to pass without consideration or reflection; of crowding together the greater part of your lives, without pondering what you do, or caring whether you do well or ill. It accuses of secret sins of thought and desire, literally like the ocean's sand; sins which, though they are concealed from the cognizance of the world, are open and naked to him with whom you have to do; sins which pass you like the motes that play upon the sunbeam, and elude all your exertion to examine or pursue them. It accuses you of the habitual omission of holy duties; of negligence of God and his requirements; of restraining the voice of prayer, and refusing the offerings of praise. It accuses you of total deficiency in the spirit of those duties which you have undertaken to perform; of dullness, formality and hypocrisy in your apparent approaches to the service of God. It accuses you beyond all acts of omission or commission, of that which they infallibly indicate, a natural state of sin; a nature of rebellion; a fountain in your hearts, of aversion to God; a state of character and life, in which every feeling and purpose partakes of the universal bitterness, and is sinful and worthy of condemnation; from which there has never proceeded in the minutest or most infantile shape, one good thing. These are the charges which the law makes against you, as constituting the guilt of your past transgressions; and with these, by the quickening power of the Holy Spirit, it convinces you of sin.

II. By "whatsoever things the law saith," the spirit convinces the sinner of his exposure to the wrath of Almighty God, and of his danger of eternal death. The divine law has guarded itself against all violations, by the most important and solemn sanctions. While it promises life everlasting as the result of everlasting obedience, it denounces eternal death as the inevitable consequence of eternal sin. It proclaims an unspeakably awful curse upon every soul of man that doeth evil, and because every man living is born a sinner, and grows and matures in sin, this curse, in all its terror, is laid upon every soul of man. The sinner's condemnation is not a future matter. He is condemned already; and although, like a convict in his cell, there is a respite yet allowed before the execution of his sentence, still his case is to be regarded as disposed of; no new act of authority is required for his punishment; his time is fixed, and he is only to be let alone until it shall arrive. The state of an unconverted sinner is a state of condemnation and wrath. There are many of you who may be ignorant of this; nay, perhaps, who may feel disposed to deny it. But this is one of those things which the law saith, and in the exercise of its convincing power upon the conscience, it makes you acquainted with this solemn and all-important fact, that you are condemned already, and the wrath of God is abiding on you. It shows you, that although prosperity and wealth, and ease and honour, may be allowed to decorate your passing hours here, your final destiny, while you remain under the law, is nevertheless fixed; there is a curse rolling forward upon your souls which will sink you into eternal ruin. While the law convinces you of your real character, as sinners, it fastens this acknowledgment upon your minds, that for you, in this character, there remains, "the fearful expectation of judgment and fiery indignation," which will consume you, as the adversaries of God. It shows you, that all your past blessings are no proof of God's acceptance of your souls; that although he has sustained you, with much forbearance, you were still "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction." In the hour of conviction, it lays open before you the solemn fact, that you have been the enemies of a God who has said, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay." It shows you that you are, with the utmost reason, condemned to everlasting death, and that it would be altogether right and just in God to cast you finally from his presence, and to refuse the exercise of mercy to your souls. It lays down before you the long chain of sins to which reference has been already made, and attaches to every individual in the series an everlasting curse, and then bids you to look at your condition, and see what hope you have of escape from the damnation of hell. I pray you to observe that this conviction of your exposure to God's holy indignation, is only the revelation of a fact of which you were before entirely ignorant. The law saith, "There is none that doeth good—no, not one; they have all sinned; they have all become abominable." Then it saith, "Cursed be every one that sinneth against God." "Let wrath come upon them, and let them go down quick into hell, for I have seen iniquity in them all." Of this condition of ruin in which transgression of the law has placed you, in your state of native carelessness, you are entirely ignorant. The convincing power of the law, of which I now speak, does not make the fact of your danger, but it unveils your eyes, and compels you to see it. Under the operation of this power, though you groan in anguish, you are no more in condemnation than you were before, when you were thoughtless and gay; but you have been made to see and consider dangers to which you were before voluntarily blinded, and the sight of your previous actual condition, over which you have long slept in heedlessness, will now, under this convincing power of the law, fill you with apprehension and grief.

III. The law, with the attending power of the Spirit, convinces the sinner of the utter impossibility of his ever obtaining justification before God, on the ground of his own works. This fact the apostle declares in the verse immediately following the text, "Therefore, by the deeds of the law, shall no flesh be justified in his sight, for by the law is the knowledge of sin." The law teaches no other knowledge than this. A knowledge of pardon and salvation must be acquired from some other source. The convinced sinner sees this utter impossibility, and while he is obliged to acknowledge his guilt, and to confess his just exposure to wrath, for his transgressions, he finds himself compelled to lay down all hope of working out any righteousness for himself. He cannot obtain acceptance by his obedience to the law, for the law shows him the total imperfection of any obedience which he can render. He cannot be justified by making satisfaction for his disobedience, for the law shows him again, that no satisfaction can be received, short of the penalty threatened, which is everlasting death; so that to hope for life, by satisfying and recompensing divine justice for his offences, is simply to hope for salvation by being damned. This twofold impossibility he sees demonstrated to his conscience beyond the power of denial. To this great end, the convincing power of the law will operate upon your consciences. When it has thus brought you to despair in yourselves, by showing you your unspeakable dangers, and your utter inability to find a remedy in yourselves, by any thing which you can do or suffer, it has finished its work. There it must leave you, in this horror of great darkness, until the Holy Spirit, who, by this ministry of the law, has convinced you of sin, shall, by the gracious ministry of the gospel, convince you of a perfect and sufficient righteousness laid up for you in Jesus Christ.

This is the conviction which the Spirit of God produces, by "whatsoever things the law saith;" and until the law has wrought with this convincing power upon your consciences, all preaching of Jesus Christ to you is utterly vain. Until you are thoroughly awakened to acknowledge the facts to which the law calls your notice, you will never turn, with a godly sorrow for sin, to embrace the offers of mercy which the gospel holds out to your acceptance. You will wrap yourselves in your own carnal confidence, and see no need of looking after any other righteousness than your own. You will think yourselves whole, and will, therefore, refuse the physician. You will be blind to danger, and deride the proposal of salvation.

But upon whom is this convincing power of the law to operate? The text declares, "whatsoever things the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law." In the connexion in which the apostle uttered this assertion, it was to prove the guilt of those persons who were supposed to be in possession of the greatest privileges. The Jews, who were in every sense "under the law," were perfectly ready to acknowledge the truth of the broadest statements of sinfulness, when applied to the Gentiles, but were disposed to deny the proper application of the same statements to themselves. In opposition to their personal assumption, the apostle wrote the text; he argues the reasonable application of all that the law had said, to those to whom the law had been given, and while the law did utter aloud the charge of universal and indiscriminate guilt, it certainly designed to direct the charge against those to whom its holy and searching precepts had been communicated. In applying this assertion to the moral law, which we are peculiarly considering, I must unequivocally assert its appropriation to every human being; all, without exception, are born under the inflexible obligations of this sacred law, and the things, therefore, which it saith, belong to the whole family of man. If they applied to Jews, to whom had been given the oracles of God, as well as to Gentiles, who had been without a revelation, they apply to those to whom these divine oracles are still granted, as much as to the heathen, who are without the knowledge of God. As extensively as the precepts of the law reach upon the earth, do its charges of guilt, and its denunciations of punishment, also go; and if there be not an individual man who is released from the obligation of loving God with all his heart, there is not an individual who is not justly accused of transgression, and threatened with punishment for having refused to comply with it, "For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God;" nor is there a man who can say, without entire falsehood, "I have made my heart clean; I am pure from my sin." The proper operation of this convincing power of the law is upon every human being. Its broadest accusations, and its most fearful threatenings, belong to every one before me, and none can have the prospect of security by pleading an exemption from the charges which it makes. Whatsoever things it says, it says to you. And whether it comes in the power of the precept, or in the terror of the denunciation, it lays its iron grasp upon your souls, and will hold you to eternity, unless there come to your rescue, a power of grace stronger than the power of wrath. Its object is to convince you of sin; to show you your entire need of a Saviour; to constrain you to throw away all deluding and destructive pleas; to compel you, in the acknowledgment of your guilt, to cry aloud for the exercise of mercy; to send you to the blood of an Almighty Redeemer, as the only fountain which can be opened for sin and for uncleanness. If its operation upon your consciences, for this purpose, be denied and resisted, its further design is then to convict you before the bar of God; to compel you there to see your exposure to wrath and eternal woe, and to draw from your own conscience the acknowledgment that your condemnation is just.

This end and result the apostle declares in the conclusion of our text; the law says all these things, that "every mouth may be stopped, and the whole world become guilty before God." Now, the mouths of sinners are by no means sealed; they are every day uttering complaints against the unreasonable strictness of the divine commandments. You find your natural hearts constantly rebelling against the solemn demands of God: you do not, you cannot acknowledge, that you are bound to such devotion as it requires, or that you are justly charged with guilt, for failing in that, which you find to be so repugnant to your dispositions, that its fulfilment amounts to an impossibility. You find your hearts inventing a thousand excuses and pleas for your security; temptation, ignorance, heedlessness, weakness, are all severally urged as sufficient reasons why you should be dealt with upon some milder system, and receive a more extensive toleration. All these complaints and excuses arise from the want of that conviction, which it is the province of the law to impress upon you. When by the power of the Spirit, with the ministration of the law, you are convinced of sin, your mouths will be sealed. The justice and holiness of God will be so apparent, that you will feel no right to complain though you are condemned. Your own aggravated guilt will be so clearly manifested, that no excuse or extenuation will occur to your remembrance; you will lie down before a God of immaculate purity, with a spirit torn and bruised, acknowledging the truth of every accusation, and proclaiming the entire justice of every woe. Whatever may be the character of others, you will feel that shame and confusion of face alone belong to you, and that God is righteous though he taketh vengeance. If this conviction be not awakened in your souls in your day of grace, while it may be salutary and effectual, it will come upon you like a giant aroused from his sleep in the day of judgment; confusion will cover you in that day when God arises to shake terribly the earth, and to repay vengeance and recompense to all his adversaries. Then, every impenitent and unprofitable servant will be speechless, though he be bound hand and foot and cast into outer and final darkness: while the universe will proclaim the abiding spotlessness of the judge, who thus solemnly condemns.

The final result of this convincing power of the law is, that beside silencing the complaints of every transgressor, "the whole world may become guilty before God," or come under the judgment of God, condemned for sin, and without a claim for the exercise of mercy. The holy law announces its requisitions, and proclaims its sanctions, that it may make room in this world for the exercise of abundant grace, and hereafter display the entire justice of God in the exercise of condemnation. It brings the whole world, and every individual transgressor, under the divine judgment; nothing can be demanded but the wages of sin; in passing by every sinner, God would not be unjust; in pardoning and saving one, he is infinitely gracious and merciful. When the sinner is truly convinced, he sees this fact strikingly displayed to his mind. Under such circumstances you will feel that you are justly under condemnation, under the judgment of God, and that there can be no reason found for the extension of any compassion to you, but in the unsearchable riches of the love of God. This conviction will lead you to look to nothing for pardon and rescue, but free and unlimited grace: to throw yourselves altogether upon the mercy and sufficiency of that Being, who has become the end of the law, that he might bring in an everlasting righteousness for you, and in whom God can be just, and the justifier of all who believe in him.

When the law works its last and eternal conviction upon the conscience of the impenitent, in the day of retribution, this great and final end to which the text points you will be displayed, "The whole world will come under the judgment of God." He will be seen to be righteous who judgeth in the earth; and while not a being has any claim to mercy, and the impenitent and hardened are justly condemned; he will show, in the free and full redemption of every soul that has fled to Christ for refuge, how, in his own appointed and glorious way, mercy can rejoice against judgment, and grace accomplish what the law must leave undone forever.

LECTURE V.

THE CONDEMNING POWER OF THE LAW.

The law worketh wrath.—ROMANS IV. 15.

The whole subject of the present discourse is presented in the declaration of this text. It is the condemning power of the divine law. We are now to consider the law as standing forth, to warn men against itself; we are to regard it as proclaiming to every sinner who is seeking after salvation, "it is not in me;" we are to speak of that aspect of its character, which occasions it to be called "a fiery law," a "ministration of condemnation," and a "ministration of death." Let it be distinctly understood, that the whole power of the law here referred to, has accrued from the apostacy of man. For man, as an innocent being, it was ordained unto life. Its one grand requisition of implicit and total submission to the will of the Creator, was written upon his heart; and whether that controlling will of God prohibited the eating of an apple, or the crime of murder, the necessity of obedience and the guilt of transgression were not in any degree altered. This law, to a holy and obedient man, would have wrought life and happiness, as it does to the pure spirits of heaven.

But to a fallen man, it works nothing but wrath. In the violation of its one grand requisition, Adam and his posterity fell into ruin and guilt. "By one man's disobedience many were made sinners." "By the offence of one, many died, and judgment came upon all men, to condemnation." This violated law is the covenant under which every child of man is born into the world: it rolls down its sentence of death for past transgression, from generation to generation, at the same time that it does not relax in any degree the obligation of its demands. Every infant of the race is exposed from his birth to the awful penalty of this broken covenant, as much as Adam was in the moment of his sin, and is still bound to render the full obedience which its precepts demand, as much as Adam would have been, if he had never sinned. Every unconverted sinner remaining still "a child of wrath," remains under the two-fold pressure, which is here referred to, of a penalty, the endurance of which is intolerable, and of a requisition, the fulfilment of which is impossible. Christ Jesus the end of the law for righteousness, offers the only refuge from the wrath which the law thus works, and every man who is rejecting Christ Jesus from his heart, is voluntarily choosing to abide under a covenant which works, and can work, nothing but wrath. "Tell me, then, you who desire to be under the law, do you not hear the law?" Does it say any thing to you, but "do this, and thou shalt live?" Does it set before you any alternative, but "Cursed be he that continueth not in all things, which are written in the book of the law, to do them?" Has it any other terms than this? "Do this," this wrath-working law proclaims; do it all, all without exception, continue in it from first to last, and you shall live. But a curse, an everlasting curse, awaits you if you offend in any one particular; plead what you will, its denunciations are utterly irreversible: "I wish to obey it," you may say, and it answers you, "Tell me not of your wishes, but do it." "I have endeavoured to obey." Tell me of no endeavours, but do it, or you are cursed." "I have done it in almost every particular." "Tell me not of what you have done almost, have you obeyed it altogether? Have you obeyed it in all things? If not, you are cursed." "I have for a great number of years obeyed it, and but once only, through inadvertence, have I transgressed." "Then you are cursed; if you have offended in one point, you are guilty of all." "But I am sorry for my transgression;" "I cannot regard your sorrows, you are under a curse." "But I will reform, and never transgress again." "I care nothing for your reformation, the curse remains upon you." "But I will obey it perfectly in future if I can find mercy." "I have no concern with your determinations for the future, I know no such word as mercy, I cannot alter my terms for any one. If you rise to these terms, you will have a right to life and need no mercy. If you fall short in any one particular, nothing remains for you but everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.'"

I pray you to observe, that this is no fancy of mine. St. Paul says, "as many as are of the works of the law," or looking to the law for any ground of hope, a description which includes all men in a natural state, "are under a curse." "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." There is no mere human being who has ever obeyed the law; and, therefore, without an exception, every mouth is stopped; every soul is counted guilty before God, and is under a curse now; condemned already; a curse, which, if the only refuge for the sinner be rejected, must remain on them eternally. This is a plain statement of the demands of the law. And from the utter impossibility that an apostate being should rise to the terms of its inflexible demands, "it works wrath;" it warns men to flee from itself, and to seek a hope of peace somewhere, where it may be obtained, in consistence with the character of God.

This condemning power of the law, this solemn warning which it utters against itself, is manifested in the obedience which it demands, and in the sentence which it passes.

1. If it referred solely to overt and gross acts of transgression, it would rather encourage us to cleave to it, for our hope, than dissuade us from abiding by its terms. But such is the spirituality, the exceeding broadness of its character; such is the extent of obedience which it demands, that it charges us with guilt, not only on account of open violations of its commands, but also on account of the defectiveness of our best actions. Suppose that you are at this moment filled with love to God; does this love rise to the full measure of the precept which requires it? If not, your best moment is a moment of guilt, and a sufficient reason for condemnation. The same may be said in reference to all your best efforts to fulfil the commands of God. The law cannot receive the disposition in place of the act. It makes no toleration for the sincerity of desire, if there be not the utmost fulfilment of the requisition. It is so rigorous in its claims that it admits of no deviation, no weariness, no defect, even for a moment, or under any circumstances, to the very end of life. Thus, in the inexorable character of its claims, it works wrath; it produces inevitable condemnation, and lifts up its voice in perpetual warning against itself. "Do not think," it says to you, "of obtaining life by me; you see my demands; you see that they can never be relaxed; you see that a curse is denounced against the least transgression; I can make no abatement on account of your weakness; I can offer no assistance for the performance of any one duty; I can present no hope of mercy; I must have a spotless obedience from first to last; and though there be but a single failure in that, I must testify against the acceptance of the whole; and will you seek life in me? O fly from me; be afraid to remain one hour under my curse; escape for your life to him whom I acknowledge to be a Prince and Saviour, able to give repentance and forgiveness of sins." The terrors of Mount Sinai, and the fence around its base, and the strict injunctions against any attempt to break through and gaze, marked the impossibility of gaining access to God by any way which the law could open. In reference to that illustration, Moses said, "I exceedingly fear and quake;" and much more, in the actual exposure to the reality, may you feel awakened and terrified at the wrath which this holy law thus works.

2. In the sentence which it passes, it still further manifests this destroying power, and warns you to flee from all idea of attaining hope in the personal satisfaction of its claims. The penalty of disobedience in a single deficiency, is everlasting death. There is no alternative less than this presented by the law. Whatsoever things the law saith, it saith to those who are under the law; and reveals indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doth evil; and then shows that all have sinned or done evil, and come short of the glory of God. In proclaiming its irreversible sentence, the law asks you the simple question, "Who can dwell with the devouring fire? who can dwell with everlasting burnings?" Thus bringing up every soul of man before God, under the solemn charge of guilt, and then laying the obligation of endurance of its penalty upon every one who hath sinned, the law can work nothing but wrath; and man might as reasonably seek for rest and shelter in a burning fiery furnace, as seek for life and salvation in his own obedience to the law.

It is remarkable that the whole body of the Israelites were required to give their cordial assent to this condemning power of the law. When the Levites proclaimed from Mount Ebal, "Cursed be he that continueth not in all the words of this law, to do them," it is added, "and all the people shall say Amen." Be it so, it is right. Some of my hearers have been ready, perhaps, to cry "God forbid," under some of my statements, to imagine that I have overstrained the matter. But I would commend this example to you; and while I make assertions correspondent with the evident revelations of Almighty God, and so conformable to all the sober deductions of our own reason, I would hope there may yet be found but one sentiment pervading this whole assembly; and that all, in the way of intellectual acknowledgement, and of cordial approbation, will be ready to cry out, "Amen, amen."

Having considered this condemning power of the divine law, and shown how it works wrath, I wish now to point out the connexion which this attribute of the law has with ourselves. I have said, that every child of man is born under the curse of this law, as a matter of unavoidable inheritance. But beyond this, I now assert that every unconverted man, every one who has not yielded himself to the spiritual dominion of the Lord Jesus Christ, is labouring to obtain salvation by his obedience to the law. All men by nature, being ignorant of God's righteousness, attempt to establish a righteousness of their own, and in the refusal to submit to the righteousness of God, thus expose themselves to all the wrath which the law can work. This connexion you all have with this vitally important subject. The moment in which you turn to any thing which you have done, as a ground of hope and justification, you choose this for your covenant, and become debtors to do the whole law; and then there is presented to you the simple choice of perfect and perpetual obedience, or chains of everlasting darkness. This disposition to rest upon the works of the law, you will find all persons to be indulging who are not spiritually united to Christ.

There are some who look for their justification altogether upon the ground of their own works; they cannot understand why good works should be required at all, if they are not to obtain our acceptance with God. And when the assertion is made, that our own obedience does not in any degree operate to procure our justification, they suppose that we set good works altogether aside, and encourage all manner of licentiousness. These persons throw themselves altogether upon the law; agree to abide by its terms; expose themselves to the utmost of its claims; and voluntarily assume the whole amount of wrath which it has power to work.

There are others who see and acknowledge that some honour is due to Christ, and that from his being called a Saviour, we must stand indebted to him in some manner, in part at least, for our salvation. They will assert, therefore, a partial dependance upon Christ, and try to connect his atonement with their own obedience. The utter impossibility of such an expedient they do not see. The one makes void the other. Their salvation must be altogether of grace, or altogether of works. The attempt to unite them, only forms a system, like the feet of Nebuchadnezzar's image, part of iron and part of clay, which can sustain no weight, and constitutes a totally insufficient foundation. These persons, in the rejection of a free redemption through unassisted grace, lay themselves down beneath the whole burden of the law; and not being able to produce the perfect obedience which it requires, for them the law worketh wrath.

There are others who think they must do something for themselves; and therefore they enter into a kind of composition or agreement with the Lord of all, that they will render him obedience, if he will bestow upon them salvation. They do not expressly unite their merits with his, but they make their own obedience the ground upon which they confide in him, the reason for the trust which they affect to place in him. They do not remember that they have no obedience to bring; that they have nothing but sin and misery to lay down before him; and thus they do not feel that their total dependance must be in sovereign and all conquering grace; that they must receive a salvation entirely without money and without price.

There are others who refine still more than this. They think themselves willing to give all the glory of their salvation to Christ; but they want some warrant, some argument for believing in him. They are not willing to take the fulness of the provision, and the freeness of the promise, for this warrant, but they must find it in themselves. They will either say, that they dare not go to him, because they are so vile; and therefore they will endeavour to make themselves better before they venture into his presence, and indulge the hope of his acceptance; or else, that they have a good hope of his acceptance and mercy, because they have never transgressed the bounds of human infirmity, or have truly repented of their faults. The result of all these delusions is the same. They throw the sinner wholly back upon the claims of the law. Salvation must be all of grace, or all of works. Any attempt to blend the two, in any measure, destroys the whole idea of grace, and exposes to the demand of perfect works, under the alternative of endless wrath upon their failure.

This is your connexion with this subject. If you do not come as poor and outcast and perishing, to the atoning sacrifice and the justifying obedience of the Lord Jesus Christ, you must stand by the law and meet its requisitions. If you are not willing freely to accept the work of a perfect surety offered in the covenant of grace, you must, in your own persons, fulfil the utmost demands or bear the eternal penalty of the covenant of works. The terms of this covenant you cannot, in any degree, alter; you must come up to the full of its demands, or it works for you nothing but wrath. Let this consideration lead you, with St. Paul, to seek earnestly and only to be found in Christ, not having your own righteousness, which is of the law, but the righteousness which is of God, by faith in Christ; and to count every thing but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of him.

If this connexion of our ourselves with the condemning power of the law be a fact; if it be true that it works wrath to an extent so universal, O what deep humiliation of soul becomes you all, in view of its claims! What an amount of curses it suspends over the sinner's devoted head! You must not look solely to your outward transgressions of the commands, your grosser violations of precepts, as reasons for God's righteous anger. The wrath of God is revealed against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. Your defects expose you as much as your violations to condemnation, and every omission, as well as every positive disobedience, will receive its just recompense of reward. If, then, it should be granted that your lives are blameless, so far as regards outward violations of God's authority, still your iniquities have grown over your heads; your sins are utterly innumerable. In comparison with many of your fellow-men, who have suffered the punishment of trampling upon human laws, your characters may appear exemplary and worthy; and such, men may think you; but in the sight of God the difference between you is small. He may behold in you less gross iniquity, but see it far more than counterbalanced by an abundant measure of spiritual sins, by no means less hateful in his sight. Suppose it had all been true which the self-righteous Pharisee asserted of himself, that he had been no extortioner or adulterer; did not his hateful pride, his self-complacency, his uncharitableness, more than compensate for that? If he had tried himself by a proper standard he would have found but little reason for his self-preference above the contrite Publican; he would have seen, that had all been true which he had asserted, the simple difference between them was, that the one was a painted sepulchre, and the other a sepulchre without paint. I do not assert that gross outward transgressions add nothing to a man's guilt; but that in the absence of these, God may see spiritual transgression in the heart, more than enough to supply their place. The point to which the attention must be directed to produce true humiliation, is the defectiveness of our best services. Look upon this deep deficiency in duty; behold it in its aggravated character, as against a God of infinite love and mercy; against a God who has assumed our nature and laid down his life for us; against a God who has been interceding with our hearts, to guide us aright, and to lead us to repentance. Behold it also against light and knowledge, against vows and resolutions, against judgments and mercies, and continued in without repentance or shame for many years. Behold it as a proud rejection of the boundless love of a crucified Saviour; as a bold and persevering determination to stand upon your own ground, and to claim salvation upon your own merits, and you will see that the law reasonably works for you nothing but wrath; that your guilt must sink you into everlasting perdition, if God do not interpose in the multitude of his mercies, and cause his grace to superabound, where sins have so fearfully abounded. Behold the aspect under which this condemning law brings out your character, and you will see that to call yourselves the chief of sinners, is not merely a humble expression, which, though it sounds well upon the lips, need not be felt in the heart, but is the real character which belongs to you all, since the very best man among you must know far more evil of himself than he can know of any other individual, and see a depth of guilt in his own heart, concealed from the knowledge of the world, which, were it exposed to public view, would overwhelm him with total degradation.

If you will fairly bring up your character to the trial of this condemning power of the law, you will see yourselves exposed to God's heaviest judgments, no less than the most flagrant transgressors in the world. You will feel obliged to cry for mercy, as Peter did when sinking in the waves. "Lord save me, or I perish." Others who have different views of what God demands, may wonder and say, "What can you have done to call for such humiliation and distress?" But you will know your own deserts, taste the bitterness of your own sins, and feel compelled to lie down before a holy God in the deepest self-abasement.

O that you could be brought to this state of mind; to have it as a settled principle in your judgments while the mirror of God's requirements is held up to you, that by the works of the law no man living can be justified. O listen to this law, though it works nothing but wrath. If its warnings are alarming to you, they are indispensable; and surely it is better that you should be warned in season, that your house is built upon the sand, than be suffered to perish in its ruins. Should I know your danger, and utter no warning, I should be accessary to your ruin. It is a fatal delusion which shuts your hearts against the acceptance of a Saviour, who is the end of this fiery law, for righteousness to your souls. There is no other hope presented to you; but this is presented. And while the law drives you thus away from itself, humbled, guilty and condemned, it does not thrust you upon an ocean of uncertainty, to find by chance, where you can, a remedy for your disease and a satisfaction for your want. It acknowledges a righteousness in your anointed substitute commensurate with its utmost demands. It bids you seek to him and live. It tells you of a Saviour who can preach glad tidings, though it cannot. This has been my present object, to show you that there was no dependance to be placed in your own obedience, and no hope to be offered you in the law. The law offers nothing but a curse; and yet all the unconverted among men are still seeking salvation in this curse. The gospel of Jesus brings a full salvation, and yet the same sinners are rejecting all the mercy which it presents. I ask your serious thoughtfulness to be directed to the subject now presented to you; and if you can be persuaded to listen to the warnings which the law utters against itself in the condemnation and wrath which it works, your minds will be prepared to consider it with me next as a guide to him who is able to save unto the uttermost, all who come unto God through him.

LECTURE VI.

THE LAW A GUIDE TO CHRIST.

Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith.—GALATIANS III. 24.

The subject which we are now to consider, is one upon which we may enter with delight, as in every respect congenial to the feelings of a redeemed soul. There has been an unavoidable aspect of severity in the views of the law, which have been previously presented to your minds. But this severe appearance of its demands will serve to render the more cheering and valuable our reflections upon the great object of proper love and adoration who is now brought before you, as the chill and darkness of the night which is just passing away prepares us to welcome the rising of the sun with the greater gladness. To meditate and to speak of Christ, is delightful to those who appreciate his worth; and to be able to lead the hearts of the sinful children of men to a cordial acceptance of his redemption, and to a free submission to his power, more than compensates for the unpleasant severity by which their minds need often to be awakened to an acknowledgment of their necessities.

The interesting subject now before us, is the guiding power of the divine law to lead our hearts to Christ. The illustration in which the apostle presents this subject to us, in connexion with our text, has great force. He argues from the total impossibility that any law should be given to a fallen being which could bestow life, the necessity and value of that system of redemption which the gospels reveals by faith in Jesus Christ. He then considers the condition of all those in whose hearts this life-giving faith had not been produced, as one in which no alternative was presented to them but this, or ruin. He represents the law as a jailor, under whose power they were fast shut up, for this alternative. The law was added because of transgressions. It was not designed to give life to a fallen being, or to be in any way the friend of sinners. It imprisoned all under the bondage of sin, and allowed no avenue of escape but that which grace opened in Jesus Christ. Before this great object of faith came, men were thus universally imprisoned under the law. Every door was fast barred, and every one was to remain so but the single one, which opened upon the satisfaction of Christ. They were shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed, as their only alternative to perpetual imprisonment. Thus the law, closing every other way of escape, and dealing with its captives with great severity, became a kind of schoolmaster or guide, to bring them unto Christ, that they who could not be justified by works might be justified by faith; and when this door of grace opened upon them, as it were of itself, and the divine messenger of mercy loosed their chains and bade them go in peace, while the keeper became as a dead man; then, except they remained voluntarily in their captivity, they were no longer under this schoolmaster; no longer under the law, but under grace. This is the course of the apostle's argument, in which he introduces the assertion of the text.

I. In considering this guiding power of the law, the views of the law, which have been already presented, must be borne in mind. It must be remembered, that the law can never be set aside. It is as unalterable as the character of God himself. It is holy, and can never abate of its commands. It is just, and can never mitigate its sanctions. It is good, and must eternally continue so, whatever may become of those who are subject to its dominion. In every thing which it requires, its direct tendency is to promote the honour of God and the happiness of man; and if it become an occasion of unhappiness to any, it is only through their own perverseness in violating its commands. Immutable in its constraint, it says to all, "The curse which I have denounced must be inflicted; the commands which I have given must be obeyed. If there be any person found to endure the one for you, and to fulfil the other in your stead, and God Most High be pleased to accept a substitute in your behalf, it is well. But without such a regard to my right and my honour, no man living shall be saved. I must be magnified and made honourable. My integrity and faithfulness must be shown before the whole creation, or no sinner shall find acceptance before him from whom I proceeded, and whose authority I must maintain."

The law thus, as it were, puts us upon a search for some sufficient Saviour. It leads us to look at the demands which it makes upon us; and when we are convinced of the unalterable character of those demands, and see the impossibility of our complying with them, we are directed to the inquiry, if there can be a possibility of finding an adequate substitute. It is not my object to consider the text in its application to those who lived before the actual appearance of the Saviour on the earth. I wish to present the whole matter in the light of personal application to individuals among ourselves, and to consider the present habitual operation of the law as the sinner's guide to Christ. Considered in this light, it makes its personal demands upon us, by a compliance with which it promises us acceptance. It tells us honestly and candidly, that if we can undergo the full punishment which it requires for our past transgressions, we shall be accounted free from guilt, and allowed to set out again in our attempts to obey the divine commands; and then, if we can offer a full and perfect obedience to the precepts which it sets before us, we shall be considered righteous, and be justified and accepted upon the ground of our own righteousness. When our consciences have become convinced of the folly of any exertions to work out such a righteousness for ourselves as this, then it tells us, if we can find such a satisfaction and such an obedience in any one who will be the surety for our souls, its claims may be answered. But when the law has thus put us upon looking out for a Saviour, we ask at once: Where can one be found who is capable of thus fulfilling its requisitions? one who can bear infinite wrath, and accomplish a spotless obedience? And above all, where shall we find one who is ready to do this for us? A creature, though he were an archangel, would sink under the everlasting wrath of God. Any creature would be himself as much subject as we to the divine commands, and therefore could only obey for himself. He would be bound to fulfil all that the law has enjoined. He could do nothing beyond his absolute duty. He would therefore be in the end an unprofitable servant. He could never obey for others, for he could not exceed what was due from himself; so that no created being could become such a substitute as the law would accept. The only thing under such circumstances that could give the slightest hope to man, would be for God himself, the only being competent to answer the demand, to come as the substitute for sinners; and in their nature to suffer and obey for them. Were this possible, there might indeed be a hope, because the dignity of the sufferer would put a value on his sufferings sufficient to overbalance the eternal sufferings of the whole world; and the obedience paid by one who was under no obligations to obey, would form a justifying righteousness sufficient for all the sinners of mankind. This would be sufficient, were it possible; but how can such a thing be contemplated for a moment? Is it probable? Is it possible? Possible or not, the law shuts us up to the attainment of this or death. It says decidedly, "I can consent to no lower terms than these. Suppose such a plan to be sanctioned, approved and executed by the Almighty himself, then I can consent to the salvation of sinners; yea, I should not only consent, but highly approve of it, because the satisfaction and obedience of the living God will glorify me infinitely more than either the obedience or the condemnation of the whole human race. Let such a plan as this be made and executed by the Creator, and I agree that you shall be saved by it and receive a weight of glory, which your own obedience never could have deserved. Let a door like this be opened to you, and I can hold you imprisoned no longer; but until it is so, you are still shut up under the impossibility of obtaining salvation."

Thus the law acts as a guide to bring us unto Christ, by awakening our expectations, and putting us upon the inquiry for a Saviour competent for our wants. It prepares our minds to hear the glad tidings of the gospel, and to look with amazement and thankfulness into its glorious revelations. It prepares us to rejoice in the faithful sayings, that "God was manifest in the flesh;" "made in all things like unto us, sin only excepted;" that "he hath borne our sins, in his own body, on the tree," and "become obedient unto death," and been raised for our justification," that he might "become the Lord our Righteousness," and that we might be found in him, having the righteousness of God, by faith in Jesus Christ. By leading our minds to look altogether to this quarter for a way of escape from the captivity in which we are held, the law becomes a guide to Christ, and when this door of grace is opened, and the light of eternal day shines into our prisons, we are ready to arise and follow the herald of peace and security with the utmost gladness and speed.

2. Again, the law acts as our guide to Christ, by showing us how we must go to him to obtain an interest in his redemption. It exhibits to us our real character and condition, showing us that we are, in fact, sold under sin, in a state of entire bondage, without any thing to offer for our own redemption, and without ability to do any thing for our own rescue. It holds up plainly to us the great truth, that our salvation must be all of grace, the fruit of overflowing compassion, having no reference to any worth in us in our state of captivity, or to any thing we shall do for our Deliverer, after our release. When this door of faith is opened to us, and Christ calls us to the liberty of the gospel, the law tells us, with fidelity, "you must not attempt to recommend yourselves to him by any works whatever. You must arise and go to him ignorant, that you may be enlightened; guilty, that you may be pardoned; polluted, that you may be purified; enslaved, that you may receive a free and full redemption. You must carry nothing to him but your wants and miseries, and expect nothing from him but as the result of his own previous purposes of grace, and the free gift of God, for his sake. You must renounce, and count as worthless, every thing of your own, and desire to have him made unto you, all in all, your wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption; that throughout eternity you may glory in the Lord alone. If you entertain the idea of earning any thing by your own obedience, you will only come back to me and remain under my imprisonment, to be dealt with according to the terms which I have proposed. You must disclaim all thought of this, and be content to be saved by grace alone, to receive every thing from that fulness which is laid up in Christ. This is a way of salvation, both suited to you, and honourable to God. It is suited to you, because it provides for those who are ruined, every thing, as a free gift. It is honourable to God, because, while it preserves my integrity unviolated, it exalts and glorifies every perfection of the Deity. Flee then by the open door which is set before you. Flee to the everlasting covenant which God the Son has established by his own blood. Believe in him. Look to him as the procuring cause of all your blessings. Be not discouraged by any conviction of your own unworthiness, but go to him as the chief of sinners, that you may be made the brightest monument of his grace. He came to call sinners to repentance, to seek and to save that which was lost, to preach deliverance to the captives, and to set at liberty them that were bound. The more deeply you feel your need of him, the more readily will he receive you to the arms of his mercy. He stands at the door and knocks. He calls to you, "Come unto me, all that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." "Whosoever cometh unto me, I will by no means cast him out."

The law thus shows you, in your bondage, both the necessity that some way of salvation altogether by grace shall be laid open to you, and the method in which you must become interested in this gracious salvation when it is revealed. It tells you of the necessity of some Almighty substitute, and of the dependant and suppliant manner in which you must apply for his mercy, and appropriate his work to your souls. Thus it prepares you to hear and receive the revelation of that great fact which constitutes the gospel, that such a substitute has been found; that he has finished the work of redemption which was necessary, and having made all things ready for your salvation, invites every sinner to become a partaker of his mercy. In this way the law acts as a guide to the gospel, as a schoolmaster to bring you unto Christ.

3. The law further manifests its guiding power by showing you how you must maintain an interest in his redemption. "That we might be justified by faith." The great want of a rebel sinner, who is under the condemnation of the law, is of a justification before God. The idea of justification, includes in it a pardon for past transgressions which shall restore the sinner to the condition of an innocent man, though a man without merit; and a title or right to future blessedness and reward which must arise, and can only arise from a perfect obedience to the commands of God.

In order that a sinner may be justified, the law shows this twofold righteousness to be necessary. He must have this to present before God. Now to be justified by words, would require that we, ourselves, had personally accomplished this righteousness of satisfaction and obedience which is demanded. If this could be done, we should have whereof to glory; we should be independent of every other being; heaven would be ours by legal right; there could be no room for the exercise of grace, nor could God justly deny what we fairly deserved by our own obedience. The law, in the exercise of its convincing power, shows the impossibility of this ground of hope. But still our condition is not changed; our want is the same; we must be justified, or we must be condemned. If we cannot be justified by works, is there any other way in which we can attain this desired end? Yes. The law brings us unto Christ that we may be justified by faith. To be justified, or to be pardoned and rewarded by faith, does not mean that faith is received in the place of a perfect obedience, and is itself regarded as a sufficient righteousness. Faith is not the matter or reason of our justification. But it is the instrument or means which conveys to us and makes our own, the perfect righteousness of our Great Surety, a righteousness which more than answers every demand of the law of God. How then does the law guide us to this justification? Why, it says to us, "You must have a perfect satisfaction of my penalties, and a perfect obedience of my precepts, or you cannot be justified. This satisfaction and obedience you can never accomplish for yourselves; therefore, by the works of the law shall no flesh living be justified. I can never save you, either in whole, or in part. Cease, therefore, to look to me for that which I can never bestow upon you. But while you can never obtain this end for yourselves, there is one who has done every thing for you. He has a righteousness to be bestowed freely upon you, perfectly commensurate with my demands. Procure his righteousness to be imputed to you, to be made yours. Obtain a title to his obedience, which he is ready to give you without money and without price, and you will be able to present to God all that I can ask, and be fully and eternally justified before him. Believe in him, and this perfect righteousness of his shall be made yours forever. You well know how a branch receives every thing from the stock into which it has been engrafted; precisely thus must you receive from him the blessings which he offers. You must, by faith, abide in him, and you shall be freely accepted before God. The law thus unalterably demanding a perfect fulfilment of all its requisitions, before a sinner can be justified, and at the same time pointing to the Lord Jesus Christ, whose everlasting righteousness is to be imputed to us, and made ours by the instrumentality of faith, becomes our schoolmaster, or guide, to lead us unto Christ, that we may be justified by faith; and when, in the acceptance of the tidings of the gospel, this faith has come to our souls as the instrument of our attaining an acceptable righteousness, the law sets us entirely at liberty; we are no longer under a schoolmaster; we are no longer in bondage; but being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, or the gospel which brings the spirit of life to our souls, has made us free from the law of sin and death; the law which could give no knowledge but sin, and pay no wages but death, and we are to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free.

And now, that you have seen the guiding power of the law, and heard the instructions which this schoolmaster gives, let me intreat you to take him as your guide to life. There are other teachers who will speak to you in far milder terms, and accommodate their statements much more to your carnal minds. They will tell you of the value of your good works, of the mercy of God, of the lowered terms of obedience which the Saviour has introduced; but I beseech you, listen not to them; they will deceive you to your eternal ruin. A dependance, however partial, upon your own obedience, will destroy your souls. For, establish whatever standard you may, and try yourselves by it, and you will find that your own system concludes you under sin. Which of you has, from his earliest youth, acted up fully to the light which he has enjoyed, and done every thing which he knew, or believed to be required of him? Nay, which of you would dare to stand by this trial, and allow his everlasting destiny to be determined by it, for even a single day of his life? There are many not able to endure sound doctrine, who will deceive you by such hopes as this, and persuade you that your salvation must, after all, be in part by your own works. Such delusions are fatal beyond expression. There is no salvation to be derived, in any degree, from your own obedience. The utmost attainments in personal holiness which you may acquire, are of no value in the estimation of the law. They can purchase nothing from God. Nay, so far are you from obtaining salvation by your own holiness, that you have no holiness of character until you have renounced this vain ground of hope, and fled to Christ as your only refuge, that you may be justified because found in him. All your possible obedience to God results from this vital union with Christ, in which you are justified. Before you are thus accepted, there is not a single aspect of your character which does not exhibit rebellion against God. You never do or can obey until salvation has visited your souls, in your cordial acceptance of the Lord our righteousness; and then you are accepted before God, not with the least reference to any thing in yourselves, but solely because he has paid the penalty, and fulfilled the precepts of the law for you.

O, that God may be graciously pleased to impress these truths upon your minds! to open your hearts to receive the things which are spoken in the word of truth! Your natural state is one of utter ruin. Your condition was fairly represented in the case of the Israelites, bitten by the fiery serpents. You are incapable of restoring yourselves to health, or of finding a healing balm throughout the universe. Death is sweeping you off, in swift succession, and, alas! whither is it bearing you? What is to be the result of your rebellion? But why? Is there no remedy? In the case referred to, see the remedy. Let Moses be your guide to Christ. By God's command he erected the brazen serpent, and proclaimed throughout the host the joyful tidings, that whosoever would look upon it should be saved. The opportunity was gladly embraced by multitudes who were perishing, and the promise was fulfilled to them. This day is this transaction renewed in the midst of a congregation of dying sinners. You are all perishing from the wounds of sin. There is not a creature in the universe who can render you the least assistance towards a recovery from your condition of ruin. But the Lord Jesus Christ is set forth openly among you, as crucified for your sins; and the law itself directs your hearts to him, as the great appointed way for your salvation. This hour would this instructor bring your souls to him, that they may be justified by faith. As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so hath the Son of man been lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have eternal life. Behold the eternal Son of God, lifted up upon the cross, bearing the burden of your sins, bruised for your iniquities, made a curse under the law, for your souls. Hear his gracious invitations: "Look upon me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth, for I am God, and there is none else." "There is no Saviour besides me." Hear the law and the gospel uniting in one annunciation to you: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and you shall be saved." "All that believe in him shall be justified from all things." "In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified and glory." O, throw away your garments of self-righteousness and come to him. Come miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked, and lay yourselves down before his feet, to find a free salvation. Fly from all dependance upon yourselves. Shake off all the weights that false instructions and false views would hang about you, and ask for a free redemption by the grace of God, through the blood of the Lord Jesus; and while the law utters unavoidable denunciations, and makes impossible demands, let them lead you to that gracious Saviour who has wrought out an everlasting righteousness, and bringing it for your acceptance, asks to be received into your hearts, as your hope of glory, and your only source of peace and consolation.

LECTURE VII.

CHRIST OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.—Romans x. 4.

The subject which this text presents to you, is the most important one which can be offered to the view of a congregation of sinful beings. It embraces the whole grand system of man's redemption It comes to you as rebels against God, under the condemning sentence of his law, exposed to his fiery and everlasting indignation, and utterly unable to find a ransom for your own souls; and addressing you under this character, it announces the glad and glorious intelligence, that there is one, in whom for you, all fulness dwells, one who has fulfilled every demand upon your souls, and wrought out for you an everlasting and all-sufficient righteousness. After the views which we have taken of the convincing, condemning and guiding power of the divine law, after the terrors which we have seen to be denounced against us, and the demands which we have seen to have been made upon us by this violated dispensation, it will be refreshing and satisfactory to us to meditate upon the glorious truth of a full and free redemption from its curse, and its power to destroy. In my last discourse, I considered the operation which the law had to lead us unto Christ, for a free justification through his blood. The present subject comes in an immediate succession to that, as it presents the real ground and foundation of our acceptance before the throne of God, and the actual object of a living Christian faith: "Christ the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." In my remarks upon this important subject, every word should be adequate to the vastness of the theme; and I desire to look with intenseness of dependance to the enlightening Spirit of God to guide me in what I may say, and to enable you to attend to, receive, and understand the things which may be spoken, agreeably to the holy word and will of Almighty God.

In considering the present text, three subjects are suggested for reflection and inquiry.

I. What Jesus Christ did, as man's Redeemer, for which he may be called the end of the law.

II. For what object was he thus the end of the law?

III. For whom is he thus the end of the law, and who are benefitted by his redemption?

It will be readily perceived that these three inquiries will suggest most important topics of remark, and express my views in reference to some cardinal but controverted points of divine truth.

I. We will inquire in what sense Jesus Christ is "the end of the law."

The word which is here translated end, presents to us two distinct ideas. It signifies both the object which was designed, and the object which has been accomplished. Christ was the end of the law in both these senses. He was the grand object to which the law pointed, and to which it was designed to lead, and he has been the fulfilment of all that the law required. He was the end to be attained by the law, and in the finishing of his work of love, he has been the end and accomplishment of all the law's demands. These two points we will separately consider.

1. The full redemption accomplished by the Lord Jesus Christ, was the grand end to which the law was to lead, and the object in view in the publication of the law. Under whatever sense you may consider the word law, you will find the entire truth of this assertion.

Jesus Christ was the grand object of all the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish dispensation. Every sacrifice offered with fire from the time of Abel, pointed to him, and had no meaning or efficiency, except as the faith of the offerer laid hold of this great sacrifice, by which sin was to be put away, in the latter ages of the world. The purifications and washings of the ceremonial law, the construction of the tabernacle and temple, and the thousand ordinances among the Israelites, which in themselves appeared so unmeaning and useless, were all designed to lead their minds forward to him in whom all righteousness should be fulfilled. They were the shadows of the really good things which were to be revealed in the incarnation of the Son of God. They made nothing perfect, for they were themselves entirely imperfect and incomplete, without that key to their design, furnished by the actual redemption accomplished in Jesus Christ. He was the single object to which they led, and without him they are, in themselves, entirely inexplicable. The whole of the Mosaic ritual was appointed, not of itself to be the immediate means of salvation to any individual, but to point universal attention to him that should come as the single author and source of life eternal unto sinners. For this purpose it was established, and to this end its consistent and proper operation guided all.

Christ was also the great object of the moral law. The publication of this divine law to fallen beings, whether in the age of the patriarchs, or by the ministration of Moses, was not designed to open in it a way of life for sinners. Its object was directly the reverse; it invited none, but it faithfully warned all. By showing, in the spiritual purity of its required obedience, the impossibility that any sinner should comply with its terms, it invited all to look forward to some other source for salvation. It was added, or proclaimed anew to man, from time to time, because of transgressions; to convince men of their sin and danger, until the seed should come, in whom all the promises were to meet and be fulfilled. To constrain sinners to look forward to the great Redeemer who was promised, was one most important object in the proclamation of the law; and in the accomplishment of this purpose, it caused him to be the desire of all nations, and to be welcomed by those in all nations who waited for consolation from on high, as an unspeakable gift and blessing to all.

In this sense Christ was the end to be attained, both of the law of ceremonies, and the law of moral obedience. They are unintelligible without him, and as their requisitions and ordinances are read and considered in the Old Testament, he must be borne constantly upon the mind as the great object in whom they were all designed to meet and become effectual; and with the light which is thrown back upon them from his redemption, they have a meaning and force, which without him they must want entirely.

2. Christ is the end of the law, in the actual accomplishment of all the law demands.

While all the shadows and ceremonies of the Jewish religion were designed to lead to him, he has fulfilled them all, rendered them unnecessary in their obligation, and set them aside forever. The types of the old scriptures are all answered in him. The predictions which they gave of his circumstances and character, and the illustrations which they furnished of the method of his personal obedience, have been all accomplished. These types and shadows, exhibited in correspondence with the Saviour's work, are still useful, as illustrating the nature of his redemption. They deserve always to be studied and considered, for his sake. But he is their full and single end, and they cannot carry the mind beyond the parts and progress of his glorious dispensation. The ordinances and institutions of the law of ceremonies are fulfilled in him. He is the Great High Priest; the only sacrifice; the true paschal lamb. He has opened the one real fountain for sin and for uncleanness, and while God could not accept sacrifices and burnt offerings, or have pleasure in them for their own sake, he has come, in a body which was prepared for him, to do the will of God, and to sanctify forever those who are accepted in him. Having thus fulfilled the objects and design of all the ceremonial observances of the law, he has abolished them forever. That which is perfect has come, and that which was in part is done away. All the shadows of a salvation approaching for man have past by in the arrival of this salvation in the fulness of its light and power; and Christ having come, and offered himself without spot to God, to obtain eternal redemption for us, has become the end and fulfilment of all that this law of ordinances designed.

Of all the requisitions of the moral law he is also the end. He has fully obeyed its precepts, and endured its penalty. While the law required a perfect and spotless righteousness, an obedience which should be, in the minutest point, altogether unblameable, Jesus has rendered the utmost of its demands; and because his nature was so high and dignified, and he was under no obligation to obey the law, but was perfectly voluntary in his conformity to it, his obedience magnified it and made it honourable. The law claimed the utmost love to God, and universal benevolence to his creatures. This love Jesus rendered, and thus his obedience was an entire fulfilment of the law.

But it cannot fail to be remarked by a reader of observation, that while Jesus thus perfectly fulfilled the law, so that it had no claim upon him in the shape of a penalty, even for the most trifling deficiency, he was still dealt with and punished as an entire criminal. He received the full punishment of transgression, and died under the condemnation of the violated law. He furnished the only possible instance in which the same being shall perfectly conform to the precepts of the law, and yet sustain the curse of an universal violation. And while a being who has never sinned may fulfil the preceptive part of the law, and a being who has sinned may bear the penalty and curse of the law, he alone could make them both the matter of experience, and thus become the end of all that the law demanded of any created being.

It is in this aspect that he is presented as the substitute for sinners. All that he did, he did for them. Every part of his life formed a portion of his actual obedience in their behalf; and every suffering which he passed was a part of that death which he had voluntarily undertaken for them. The hour in which he became a subjected being, he began his voluntary and unconstrained humiliation; and from that hour every moment of his life was a part of his one great offering for the transgressions of his creatures. The twofold demand which the law made, he accomplished; and his infinitely exalted character and rank added such dignity and worth to his obedience and sufferings, that they were reasonably accepted as of more value, and more honourable, than would have been the personal submission of the whole human race. The divine law made no demands, and can make no demand, which this high Redeemer did not adequately answer, so that though his obedience did not abolish the law as a rule of life for his followers, it did provide for them, in answer to its demands, a perfect righteousness; and he was for them the end or fulfilment of the law, so far as it regarded any claims which, as a distinct dispensation, the law could have against them.

It is under these two senses that Christ may be called the end of the law, as he was the great object to whom the law was designed to lead, and as he has been the accomplishment of every thing which the law required.

II. The text further declares the purpose for which the Saviour thus became the end of the law: it was for "righteousness."

It could be for no other purpose. Righteousness comprises the whole circle of the law's demands, and the whole extent of the sinner's wants.

The law could ask for nothing but a righteousness which should be a satisfaction of its penalties, and a fulfilment of its precepts. When this righteousness, this perfect conformity to its claims was found, the law was satisfied, it could go no further.

The sinner under the condemnation of the law, wanted nothing but a righteousness which should be sufficient to answer the requisitions of the law which held him in bondage. Whenever and wherever he could find this adequate righteousness, his release and liberty were made secure to him forever.

The violation of the law formed the whole necessity for an atonement and expiation for sin, because sin is the transgression of the law. Accordingly, when a Saviour was found who agreed to become the sinner's substitute, his mediation would have been unavailing, unless he could furnish this righteousness, which was the sinner's single want. It was the relation in which the transgressor stood to the divine law, which made his need for a priest and sacrifice; and when that priest and sacrifice appeared, it must have been to sustain the same relation to the law in which the sinner had been placed, or the mediation would have come short of the necessity. That he might obtain a righteousness sufficient for his wants, was the sinner's only need for a Saviour and substitute. Of course, all that this Saviour did as the surety for the sinner, must have been designed to accomplish and provide for him the perfect righteousness which his condition of condemnation and despair rendered indispensable.

The Saviour came to release the sinner from the bondage of the law, and to bestow upon him freely, by his grace, the inheritance of life which had been forfeited by disobedience. The law could not agree to this release until its demands were fully answered. Every thing, therefore, which the Redeemer did or suffered, was designed to make up and finish this everlasting righteousness which the case required. His labours and instructions, and miracles, his pains of body and agonies and darkness of mind, all his acts of obedience and all his deprivations and sorrows, united themselves for this single end, that he might be the Lord our Righteousness, and able to save unto the uttermost those who should come unto God through him. In him there is now provided the infinite treasure of merit which the sinner needs. We are to stand complete in him; and while the Father could say of him as the evidence of the greatness of his own love, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," the law could proclaim in view of the perfectness of his work, "This is a righteousness which meets my utmost claims."

The satisfaction which the Saviour made to the law was perfect and entire. He answered every claim which it could make for obedience or suffering; and thus he accomplished a perfect righteousness, for righteousness is nothing but perfect conformity to the law.

But this righteousness which he attained by being thus the end of the law, could not be for himself. The law had no claims upon him; his obedience and his sufferings were equally and entirely voluntary; and all that he did, he did as the substitute for sinners. When he became the end of the law, he was in possession of a spotless righteousness. But for whom was this righteousness? The text answers this question: "He is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth;" and thus presents us with our third subject of remark.

III. There is no distinction among the whole human family as it regards the condemnation under which the violated law has placed them. Without reference to any acquired varieties of character or degrees in guilt, by natural inheritance, every man born into the world is under a curse, and under an equal curse, for sin against God. This is the relation in which the whole race of men stand towards God; condemned under his righteous judgment, and exposed to his everlasting wrath. In becoming the end of the law for a world thus universally guilty, the Saviour has provided a remedy in every respect equal to the want. It was to satisfy the law, and to render the salvation of men consistent with the character of God, that an atonement was required, and a Saviour offered. This Jesus has done; and the righteousness which he possesses as the world's Redeemer, is sufficient for all, is designed for all, and is honestly offered to all the children of wrath and sin. The satisfaction to the law, which was indispensable to render the forgiveness of a single sinner consistent with the character of God, was equally sufficient for the whole world. Before the law was thus satisfied, not an individual could be pardoned. After this perfect satisfaction was made, it is trifling to speak of limitations to its sufficiency or its offers. The whole world may be saved in as perfect consistence with the character and government of God, as a single transgressor. The way is perfectly opened, for the exercise of grace to all; and there is not a barrier left, but in man's voluntary and determined enmity to the God that made him, to the universal salvation of this fallen family.

But while there is this perfect sufficiency and unlimited invitation in the work of substitution which Christ has finished, the result of the case is the simple one announced in the text. He becomes a personal righteousness only to those who believe. There is abundant provision, and it is honestly offered to every sinner; but it is applied for individual salvation only to those who accept it in faith. While the law was unsatisfied, the holiness and faithfulness of God could allow no offer of salvation. The atonement of Christ has respect singly to this difficulty, and renders the exercise of pardoning grace consistent with the divine character, and honourable to the divine government. If no atonement had been made for sin, men could not be required to believe, for there would have been no Saviour for them if they should. But now nothing prevents the pardon of all but the want of that evangelical faith which shall appropriate to the sinner the provided righteousness. Any man may be pardoned who will accept with faith the offered atonement. The way is open, and equally open to all. The proffers of pardon are made with the same sincerity and kindness to every sinner to whom the gospel is preached; and he who does not accept them, and of consequence remains unpardoned, must remember that nothing is in his way but his own impenitence and want of faith. He is condemned singly and wholly, because he loves darkness rather than light.

When any sinner can be led to accept with faith Christ as the end of the law for his righteousness, every obstacle which the justice of God and his own perverted heart interposed to his salvation, has been removed; and he is accepted, crowned with full redemption, and saved with an everlasting salvation.

How glorious and consistent is that scheme of salvation which is presented in the gospel! Jesus, an Almighty Saviour, all in all. The gospel takes us just where it finds us, in a state of ruin and sin, condemned by the law of God to everlasting perdition, and utterly incapable of procuring justification by our own righteousness. In this miserable condition, it announces to us a Saviour divinely great and glorious, divinely excellent and lovely, assuming our nature to become an expiation for our sins, revealing to us the way of reconciliation to God, and inviting us to enter into it and be saved. The acceptance of this expiation it announces from the mouth of God himself; and the simple terms upon which we may be reconciled to God, by believing in Christ and being found in him, it discloses with exact precision and perfect clearness. The one demand which it makes upon us, is the submission of our hearts to Christ, because with the heart man believeth unto righteousness.

How desirable is that vital principle of faith which shall seek and find a permanent refuge for the sinner in the bosom of Jesus. The cause of every sincere believer is safe in the hands of God. Christ has been the end of the law for him, and there is no condemnation to him while he is in Christ Jesus! He has chosen the good part, which shall never be taken away from him. The Saviour who has begun to befriend him in this infinite concern, will never leave him nor forsake him. All the steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord. Though he fall, he shall rise again; and his mercy God will not utterly take from him. In the seed which is sown in his heart there is a blessing, the beginning of life immortal. Cold and wintry as is the climate beneath which it has sprung; unkind and barren as is the soil in which it grows; doubtful and fading as its progress often appears, it cannot die. The hand which planted it will cultivate it with unceasing care, and will soon remove it to a happier region, where it will flourish, and blossom, and bear fruit for ever; and the satisfied law will rejoice in the triumphs of grace which have brought the ransomed soul to eternal glory.

And O how awful is their condition who voluntarily reject this Saviour, in whose atonement and sufficiency God declares himself well pleased! The law condemned them, for their original apostacy, to everlasting ruin. To the guilt of this apostacy, unatoned, unrepented of, and therefore remaining in all its enormity, they add a second condemnation: the peculiar guilt of rejecting the singular and amazing efforts of the goodness of God to bring them back to holiness and life.

In what manner men can more effectually despise the divine character, affront the divine goodness, and expose themselves to inevitable destruction, no mind can conceive. No other offer can be so kind, no other blessing is so great, no other display of the character of God so lovely. The ingratitude, therefore, of the sinner refusing the righteousness of Christ is wonderful, his guilt incomprehensible. If, then, the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall these unbelieving and ungodly sinners appear? If it be a fearful thing for all men, for heathens and Mahommedans, to fall into the hands of the living God, what must it be for those men to whom Christ is offered freely, daily and always; who sit, from the cradle to the grave, under the noonday light of the gospel, and bask through life in the beams of the sun of righteousness? Be assured, the Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of their temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment, to be punished.

LECTURE VIII.

THE GOVERNING POWER OF THE LAW.

Being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ.—1 Corinthians, ix. 21.

I enter with much pleasure upon the subject now before me, because I am aware that many of my hearers have felt anxious lest my arguments, to which your attention has been previously called, should be supposed to set the obligations of the law altogether aside. We have considered the divine law as a spiritual system of requirements, convincing the sinner of his guilt and danger and weakness, condemning the impenitent under the perpetual burden of unpardoned guilt, guiding the awakened sinner to the mercy offered in Jesus Christ, who has been the end of all its demands, as the sinner's righteousness; and we are now brought to the fourth and last aspect of this holy system, in its governing power over those who have embraced the gospel, or fled from the terror of its denunciations to the shelter offered in the full salvation of Christ.

It has been my wish to state as clearly as possible, the great truth, that our own obedience has not the least influence upon our justification before God. We are accepted solely for the perfect obedience of the Redeemer. In such plain statements of the doctrine of the Bible, many in our day, as in the apostles' time, are ready to think that the necessity of obedience has been destroyed, and that our system is one which tends to overthrow a proper watchfulness in personal character. To relieve all such fears, and to shield the truth from such unreasonable and improper imputations, I am now to show the use and obligation of the law as a rule of personal conduct to the true believer.

The expression of St. Paul in the text furnishes a proper introduction. His anxiety to win souls to Christ, led him to conform, so far as it was consistent with his duty, to the habits and prejudices of all among whom he ministered. He asserted his entire liberty from the impositions of all men, and yet he voluntarily submitted to the views of all, that he might gain the more. In preaching to the Jews, he became a Jew in his outward conformity to unimportant ordinances; and while they considered themselves under the ceremonial obligations of the law, he refused not to submit to them also, that he might win their attention to the liberty which was presented in the gospel. And on the other hand, while he preached to those who had never received the law, he became in his disregard of ceremonial observances, without law also, that he might gain those who were thus without the law. This varying compliance with the feelings of men did not show that he had no regard to the divine authority, or that he felt himself to be without law to God. He claimed the privilege of disregarding only that which had been fulfilled and abrogated. The moral precepts of the Almighty laid upon his conscience with their full power; nay, his embracing the hopes and promises of the gospel, had increased their authority upon his heart; he was "under the law to Christ," who had given him a still higher standard of obedience and still more powerful motives to lead him to obey; and the doctrine of salvation in Jesus which he preached to men, though built upon his perfect satisfaction of the demands of the law, did not make void its authority as a rule of character, but tended still the more to establish and confirm it.

The text describes the exact condition of the justified and accepted man. He has been delivered from the condemnation of the law. It has no penalties to demand of him. He is free from all its denunciations; but he has been placed under new obligations to obedience, and has new motives leading him to acquire a perfect holiness of life and character. He is not a lawless man, not without law or any rule of obedience to God, but under the law to Christ, who has perpetuated and confirmed upon him every divine commandment; and taught him, that thus only can love to a Saviour be exhibited, by obedience to divine commandments.

The sinner who has embraced the gospel of Jesus, is resting his whole hope of justification upon the perfect righteousness of the Lord. He does not expect to earn a single hour of peace or glory by his own holiness of character. The obedience in which he trusts for his salvation, was finished long since; and he does not hope to add an iota of merit to that great offering which has been once for all made for his soul; but yet, as his rule of character, the law has dominion over him so long as he liveth. Its governing power constrains him unceasingly in his exertions, to bring forth fruits of holiness unto God. He is bought with a price, that he may glorify God in his body and spirit, which are his; and is in the expression of the text, "under the law to Christ."

1. The law displays this governing power over the Christian, by setting before him the unalterable standard to which he must be conformed. As a rule of individual character, the law of God is holy and perfect. It is the transcript of the character and perfections of the Creator. A conformity to its precepts is an attainment of the image of God. After this image every Christian is to be progressively renewed, until he is holy, as God is holy. The one principle which fulfils the law is love. When with our whole heart and strength, we love the Lord our God; and with a principle of universal benevolence we love every creature as ourselves; this principle will lead to the performance of the duties of every possible relation in life. This requisition of entire and unlimited love was laid upon us by the Creator, as it is laid upon every creature which he hath formed. No change of circumstances could ever alter the holy and perfect standard which divine wisdom has thus placed before every created being. Whatever station we should occupy in the scale of being, it must be our indispensable duty to love God with all our hearts, and our neighbour as ourselves. Nor can this obligation be set aside without authorizing men to despoil themselves of the image of God, and to rob him of the glory which belongs to him. When we have embraced in a new heart the mercies of the gospel, and are under the law to Christ, the constraint of this obligation of universal love is increased by all the high motives which the redemption of the Lord Jesus has set before us. No being in the universe, not an angel in heaven, is placed under the law of love, with such a weight of obligation as a sinner ransomed by the blood of Christ. This perfect standard of obedience is set before us, and our great object is, in a conformity to its precepts, through the power of the Holy Ghost, to be renewed after the image of God, from day to day. And though we are forgiven and accepted in Christ Jesus, the governing power of the law still controls us, by presenting the only standard to which we are required to become conformed.

2. One great object of the redemption of the gospel was, that we might be governed by the precepts of the law. The Lord Jesus had in view the holiness and obedience of his people in all that he did and suffered for them. He did not come merely to rescue us from death, but to deliver us from the bondage of sin. This design was given as the reason of the name by which he was called: "He shall be called Jesus, because he shall save his people from their sins." The great object declared in the hymn of Zacharias, for which God had raised up a horn of salvation, and remembered his holy covenant, and the oath which he sware unto Abraham, was, that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life. To have merely delivered a race of rebels from the ruin which they deserved, would have been but a partial object. The great design was to bring back these rebels to a state of obedience and love; to take away the spirit of hostility which had governed them, and thus to restore harmony and peace to a disordered universe; to stop the breach which the waters of contention had made, and to bring all conflicting feelings and purposes into one in Christ Jesus. This St. Paul declares was the great object for which the Redeemer gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all inquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works. He has restored that holy government of heaven which is the source of universal peace and assurance, and died, and risen, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and the living. He will not rule in kindness over a world which still lies in wickedness, but has purchased for himself a church, an assembly of pardoned sinners, that he might present it unto God, holy and without spot or blemish. As he sees this sanctifying of men progress, he sees of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied; and, rejoicing over every ransomed sinner, whom he brings in triumph to the glories of the blessed, he presents each one to the Father, as the full accomplishments of his great design in pouring out his soul as an offering for sins, and consenting to be numbered among transgressors; "Behold here am I, and the children whom thou hast given to me." In the view of his own image impressed upon every glorified saint, and partially upon every child of God on earth, he triumphs in that result of his humiliation and death, which has plucked brands out of the fire, and brought rebels home from eternal condemnation to a lasting conformity to the law and the image of God.

3. The governing power of the law is displayed in the fact, that the most important end for which we are delivered from the condemnation of the law is, that we may obey its precepts. Christ hath purchased us in our state of bondage, by the offering of himself, and bestowed freely upon us the liberty of the gospel, so that we are no longer under the law, as a violated dispensation, uttering condemnation and wrath, but under grace. But we have not been made free that we may continue in sin. We have been liberated that we may obey the holy commands of God, in newness of spirit and life. The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made us free from the law of sin and death, or the gospel has delivered us from the condemnation of the law, that what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, or through man's inability to obey God, in sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, might do, that is, condemn sin in the flesh, for this great and important end, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. While under the law as a dispensation, we can never obey its holy and separating precepts; it can offer us no assistance or strength; it can neither make us acceptable nor holy in the sight of God. It acts as a hard taskmaster, requiring us to make brick while it furnishes us with no straw. But when we have embraced the gospel, all the help is afforded us which we want; and we are then able to offer that obedience to the precepts of the law, which in our former condition we were unable to present. And the great object for which we have been thus set at liberty from condemnation is, that we may be able to obey the precepts of the very law which has before held us in bondage and sin. There is a race to be run and a contest to be maintained. But it is vain to command the culprit in his dungeon, bound hand foot with chains, either to run or fight. Loose his fetters and open his prison-doors, and then with propriety, and probably with success, you may require him to contend and strive. Precisely so is it with our connexion with the bondage of the law, and the liberty of the gospel. We are dead to the law, that we may live unto God, and its power over us is cancelled and destroyed as the measure of our hope, that being united unto Christ through whose sufferings we are freed, we might obey its precepts, and bring forth fruits unto God.

4. The governing power of the law is remarkably exhibited in the fact, that a holy obedience to its precepts is one of the most important promises of the gospel. It is announced repeatedly in the Old Testament, that one great result of the publishing salvation in Jesus Christ, should be, that God would put a new heart into his people, and renew a right spirit within them; that he would cleanse them from all their uncleanness and sins, and put his Spirit within them, and cause them to walk in his statutes and to keep his judgments to do them. When delivered from condemnation, we accept the unsearchable riches of grace which are laid up in Christ Jesus, this gracious promise is fulfilled. The disposition to sin is taken away in proportion as we are sanctified; and we are set out upon a new course of obedience to the commands of God. In this aspect of the gospel system, the Christian's personal holiness of character is exhibited as a privilege of the gospel, and his obedience to the law is infallibly secured by God's undertaking to work it in him and for him, by the good influences of the Holy Spirit. The solemn covenant which the Saviour makes with every sinner who receives him in his heart, as his hope of glory, is, sin shall not have dominion over you, for you are not under the law, but under grace. When you were under the law, sin did have dominion over you; but now that you have embraced the refuge of the gospel, this dominion is broken, and you shall be holy, for I am holy. No higher honour could be put upon the requisitions of the law, than this constituting obedience to them one of the chief blessings of the gospel, in the promise that when the full redemption of the people of Christ should be accomplished, they shall be all holy, and presented without blame before God. And nothing could more clearly show, that in delivering our souls from the bondage and curse of the law, the Redeemer never intended to open the door of transgression, to lead us to sin because grace abounded, or to set us fairly loose without law to God; but to give us the very obedience which the law before demanded in vain, to increase our obligations and motives to obey; and with new constraint to bring us, so far as its governing power was concerned, under the law to Christ.

5. The governing power of the law over those who have embraced the gospel, is displayed in the fact, that Jesus has made obedience to it the grand characteristic of his disciples. By this he certainly proves, that he never designed to make void the law, as the believer's rule of conduct. "By this shall all men know that ye love me, if ye keep my commandments." "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." "By their fruits ye shall know them." No professions of regard or devotion testify the sincerity of our love for Christ; no sufferings, though they amount to martyrdom for his sake, form an accurate indication of the state of our hearts before him, if a watchful pursuit of holiness of character and conduct be wanting. Our holy obedience to the law, our supreme love to God, our universal love to men, actuating us in all the relations of life, constitutes the only possible evidence that we have been rescued from the condemnation of the law, and made free with spiritual and lasting liberty. A man who has truly embraced the gospel, cannot but be an holy man; for the grace of God which has brought him salvation, has visited his heart for this very purpose, that he might be taught and enabled to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and live soberly, righteously and godly in the world. And the alternative is perfectly true, that he who is not thus holy, and thus mortifying the body of sin, has never yielded his heart to the dominion and righteousness of Christ, or been delivered from the law, which worketh wrath. There is no other proof of the existence and operations of the spirit of God within the heart; every thing is uncertain and unsatisfying as an evidence of grace, but the love which fulfils the law. They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. Against such there is no law. But, being bought with a price, they are delivered from the law in all its penalties; that in a holy obedience to God, they may be, as their rule and evidence, under the law to Christ.

6. The governing power of the law is displayed in that explanation of its precepts which the Saviour has recorded. The constraint of the law, as a rule of life, he came not to destroy, but to establish it in the obedience of his followers, as it was in the obedience of the holy angels, more durably than even heaven and earth should stand. To this end he displayed the perfectness and spirituality of its character; he showed that its precepts extended to the desires and purposes of the heart; and while men had supposed that the regulation of the exterior conduct was all which could be required of them, he insisted upon the necessity of attention and watchfulness, to be directed to the feelings and thoughts. He taught that the conduct and character of men were desirable, according as they were conformed, in sincerity and holiness, to the will of God, who searches and knows the heart, and that nothing which was merely external or partial, could be of any avail while the spirit and life of true obedience, in the inward character was deficient. In this explanation and extension of the precepts of the law, while he adopted it as the rule by which his disciples were to be governed, he magnified it and made it honourable. He testified to its excellence and purity, and made it evident, that unto all generations of his people, it was to be made the great standard of obedience and character. In his answer to the scribe who asked him which was the great commandment of the law, he displayed the extent of obedience which he required; and while Jewish teachers had looked chiefly to the outward character, he demanded the cordial submission of the heart, in a spirit of universal devotion and love.

These views show the perpetuity of the law, as a rule of conduct, and display the existence and extent of its governing power over those who have embraced the gospel. Perfect holiness of character is required of every Christian. To this all-comprehensive and important end, the exertions of every Christian are to be directed; and although we come infinitely short of this, in our present course, we have no right to adopt an inferior standard. Feeble and worthless as we are in our highest efforts, and not, in any degree, expecting acceptance on account of our obedience, no lower purpose must be set before us, than that we may be presented perfect in Christ Jesus, and have every thought of our hearts brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ.

I have thus endeavoured to display the governing power of the law over those who have embraced the gospel; or the fact, that though set at liberty from the condemnation and penalties of the law as a covenant, we are still as our rule of life, under the law to Christ. The effect which our obedience to the law has upon our personal salvation, will form the subject of my next discourse.

And now, let me intreat you, in enforcing the obligations of the law, not to attempt to lower its demands in any point of character. We have seen that as a covenant it recedes not from a tittle of its requirements. Its demands were to be perfectly fulfilled, and they were perfectly fulfilled in the work of the Lord Jesus. As your rule of life, its requisitions are of equal extent. It enjoins you to attain a love for God, with your whole heart and strength, and to love others as yourselves. You must propose no lower standard than this to govern you in your daily walk in life. Do not be satisfied with the standard of the world. Do not be contented with the performance of a mere round of outward duties, or a few kind and charitable acts. You must die altogether unto sin, and live with your heart and spirit unto righteousness. Make it your object to have the whole body of sin within you mortified and subdued; to delight yourselves in the law of God, in the spirit of your mind, and to perfect holiness in his fear. While the law is your rule, let Christ be your example. Walk as he walked. Purify yourselves, as he is pure. Be as he was in the world. Let nothing satisfy your desires and determinations, short of absolute perfection, longing and labouring to be holy as God is holy, and to be perfect as God is perfect.

Be willing servants and cheerful subjects of the precepts of the law. Consider the obedience which God requires of you, to be perfect freedom, and run the way of his commandments, with enlarged and thankful hearts. Where this spirit is, there is liberty and comfort, and the commands of a holy God appear in no degree grievous. Brethren, I speak to them that know the law, and approve of it in the operations of its power, which have been set before you. Let me beseech you to give yourselves up unreservedly to God. Those who do not enter into your views, nor adopt your system, will judge of you by the evident holiness of your characters and lives. Let them see in you what the real tendency of the gospel is. On the character of professing Christians, the honour of God and his gospel much depends; and I would that you should be wanting in nothing; that you should walk worthy of your high vocation in every duty, and by abounding in every virtue, and every praise, let it be seen that you have no wish to sin, because grace abounds, but are cheerfully and perseveringly under the law to Christ. There is no way in which you can put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, and prove yourselves to be indeed the disciples of Christ, and be made the effectual instruments of doing good to others, but by pressing onward unceasingly to attain the measure of the stature of perfect men in Christ Jesus.

And should there be any of my hearers who have looked with prejudice upon this subject, and regarded the law as severe, and the gospel as licentious, under the display which has now been made of them, I can only say that I have set before them life and death. I pray them to allow the law to have, in its application by the Spirit, its proper influence to convince them of their sin; to show them their dangers; to lead them to Christ, and then to govern them in a new and holy life. The blessed and abiding influence which it produces upon one sinner, it may produce upon all, and if it harden any in their sins, it is only because they pervert its operation and reject the counsel of God against themselves.

LECTURE IX.

THE EFFECT OF OBEDIENCE TO THE LAW UPON OUR SALVATION.

Blessed are they who do his commandments, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.—Rev. xxii. 14.

At the conclusion of this series of discourses upon the divine law, I am brought to consider the effect which our obedience to the law has upon our everlasting salvation. Everlasting salvation and happiness is the great object to which the scriptures would lead our desires and exertions. For the attainment of this, they would persuade us to forget the things which are behind; to count all other things but loss, and to be willing to sacrifice every thing which is seen and temporal.

This everlasting portion of blessedness to which our attention is turned, the text places before us, under two separate figures, suggesting two distinct ideas. It speaks of it as dwelling in a city, presenting the idea of security; and as a partaking of a tree of life, presenting the image of perfect and eternal enjoyment.

Blessed are they who may enter in through the gates into the city, for they shall be everlastingly protected and made secure; and blessed are they who have a right to the tree of life, for they shall possess the means of everlasting enjoyment; and then, because these results are so desirable and glorious, blessed are they who do his commandments, for these important privileges shall belong to them.

The text thus presents us, as two general subjects of remark, the end which is to be attained, and the way through which we are to attain it.

I. The great end and result of a Christian life, is the everlasting security and happiness of heaven; to enter through the gates into the city; and to have a right to, or power over, the tree of life.

1. The scriptures frequently speak of the future state of blessedness for the saints as an abode, or place of residence. Our Saviour calls it "the Father's house." St. Paul speaks of it as "a city which hath foundations;" and St. John styles it the "new Jerusalem." In the two last chapters of the Revelation, the apostle dilates in a beautiful description of the whole appearance of this heavenly city. He speaks of its walls and gates and inhabitants, in expressions which are calculated to fill the mind with the most elevated and glorious thoughts. He describes the character of those who are admitted to its enjoyments, as pure and holy, without a spot. This description of a city is undoubtedly figurative, so far as its minute particulars are concerned. But whether the whole idea of a material abode and residence for the glorified people of God, be a figurative representation, is more than I am able to say. The idea which is evidently suggested to us by the figure before us, is that of perfect security and everlasting defence, and the entrance through its gates implies the attainment of this security, in the regular and appointed method.

The ransomed sinner, who has found this eternal shelter, was a guilty and condemned rebel. He fled from the avenger of blood. The violated law uttered its awful denunciations against him. Offended justice demanded the punishment of his sin. The plain in which he was pursued afforded him no shelter. His own strength supplied no means of defence, and wearied and desponding, he was ready to perish, when the glad tidings of the gospel directed him to the city of refuge, and led him to run thither and be safe. Through the door, by embracing the invitations of the Lord Jesus, he sought and gained a blessed and eternal abode in this home of peace. He was again a pilgrim follower of Jesus, conflicting with trials and difficulties; encompassed with enemies, pressing forward through multiplied sorrows, but keeping his hope steadfast to the end, and purified in all his trials, he has found, at last, his perpetual home, in the new Jerusalem, secured from every enemy, and delivered from every trial forever. He has sought a heavenly country; a continuing city; a kingdom which cannot be removed; and now, by grace, rescued from every difficulty, and supported through full obedience to divine commands, he has an everlasting security in the presence of God. After the views which we have taken of the sinner's necessities under the law, where he is without security, without protection, without comfort and without hope, we are prepared to adopt the full meaning and expression of the text, blessed is he who can enter through the gates, into a city of everlasting righteousness and peace.

2. But this salvation is not only an abode of protection and security: it is the enjoyment of lasting bliss. It is to have a right to, or power over the tree of life. In the description which St. John gives of the city of God, he speaks of a pure river of water of life, proceeding from the throne of God and the Lamb; and on either side of the river was the tree of life, which bear twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations. This description presents an abundant source of heavenly enjoyment. There is an abundance of fruit yielded every month. There is a variety; twelve manner or kind of fruits. It is lasting, for it is a tree of life growing upon the bank of a river of the water of life; and even its leaves, that part of the tree which is generally fading and useless, are for the healing of the nations. The glorified Christian is stated to have power over this tree of life. It belongs to him, and he partakes of its enjoyments as his own. In this image, I am not disposed to follow out the minute illustrations. But the whole presents the idea of abiding enjoyment, and to have a right to the tree of life is to have a proper title to everlasting joys. The wants of a sinner under condemnation, having no prospect but death, and no source of comfort or lasting peace in himself, having lost by disobedience the right to any tree of life, and without means to acquire it for himself, perishing in his want and wretchedness, form the contrast to this picture. Amidst the vain and empty and fading gratifications of the present life, blessed is the thought, that there is a tree of rich and abundant life; and while all men are under the condemnation of sin, and without means of purchasing deliverance, blessed indeed is he who has received a right to this living tree; who may look to the eternal enjoyments of heaven as his own, and rejoice in the prospect of their being bestowed upon him.

Under these two figures, the text presents to our consideration the security and the enjoyment of heaven. None will hesitate to unite in its expression, Blessed are they who shall be enabled to attain these in the sure and appointed way which God has set before us; and, therefore, none can refuse their cordial assent to the whole declaration of the text, "Blessed are they who do his commandments; they may have a right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the city."

II. This is the way through which we are to attain the blessings of eternal rest. While in its convincing and guiding operations the law is to be our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we may be justified by faith; in its governing power over our hearts and character by the sanctifying ministrations of the Holy Ghost, producing in us perfect holiness of character, it is to be our schoolmaster also to educate us for the glory of heaven, and render us meet to become partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. Perfect obedience to divine commandments, universal holiness of character, is indispensably required under the gospel to the attainment of life eternal.

"His commandments" in the text refer to all divine commands, particularly to those two which our Saviour selected as the fulfilling of the law: supreme love to God, and universal love to his creatures. It is by obedience to these commandments that the high privileges of the text are to be obtained; and the reverse of this is perfectly true, the man who does not obey them cannot attain the glories which are here presented.

1. The obedience to the precepts of the law which the gospel requires of every believer, is a perfect obedience; and it cannot, and does not, promise salvation to any man but in the way of a perfect obedience. Still the idea of perfection in obedience under the gospel is quite distinct from the idea of perfection in obedience under the law. This distinction I will make apparent.

The law demanded an obedience for justification, perfect in degree; so perfect in degree, that nothing was deficient and nothing could be added. This is the obedience which angels render. The original depravity of fallen beings vitiated such an obedience in the very outset, and the attempt on their part to attain it, would have been to build a house upon a quicksand, into the fathomless abyss of which each stone would sink as soon as it was laid. This obedience, perfect in its degree, to which nothing could be added, an obedience which was necessary to the sinner's justification, the great Substitute for sinners has rendered for them, and has thus entirely fulfilled the demands of the law.

But having released us from the bondage of the law, he demands of us, under the gospel, a perfect obedience also. I say he demands it; for being justified by him, we are no longer under the law, but under grace. The law does not demand, but Christ does. But the perfection of obedience which he requires, is a perfection of motive and principle, and not a perfection of degree. It is a perfection which has respect to all commandments, and aims at a glorifying of Jesus in a full obedience of all, though there may be necessary infirmity and deficiency characterizing the actual obedience of each. It is a sincere and cordial devotion of the powers and faculties and affections of the whole man to the obedience of God's holy commandments, though all may be in themselves weak and imperfect.

The obedience accepted under the gospel is a china vase, which is whole, without a break; and is therefore said to be a perfect vase, although it may be small in size and inconsiderable in value and workmanship. The obedience demanded by the law is a vessel in itself of the highest possible worth, and therefore perfect, because no power could improve it or enhance its value.

Legal perfection is a perfection of degree. There can be no increase of it, because there is no deficiency. Evangelical perfection is a perfection of particulars, a wholeness and unity of system. It is like the body of a perfect child; of which, though every member is diminutive, none is wanting. So in this obedience, all precepts are regarded, and all graces are cultivated, though each one be infantile and weak, and in itself of no worth.

Such an obedience the gospel requires of every believer; having regard to every precept, and aiming constantly at supreme perfection in each; willingly omitting no command, passing over no duty, but governed by a single purpose and desiring the glory of a single being; following every commandment with an enlarged heart. This is a perfect, whole, unbroken obedience, though weak and imperfect in the degree to which it is carried upon the earth. Such an obedience which consitutes the holiness of a Christian character, is required in the text as the way through which we are to attain a power over the tree of life, and a right to enter through the gates into the city. The man who attempts to climb up some other way, and to separate the walk of holiness from the reward of peace, the same is a thief and a robber.

2. But in what character is this obedience demanded; What effect will it produce upon our eternal salvation?

Our obedience to the divine precepts is not required of us as the meritorious cause of our salvation. We are saved by grace. No obedience could save us but one which should perfectly fulfil every demand of the law; and the only meritorious cause of our salvation is that obedience of Jesus which has actually fulfilled the law, and which is offered to us as a free donation of the grace of God to those who are perishing under the condemnation of their sins. This obedience has purchased a right to the tree of life, and a right of entrance through the gates into the city; and having done this, Jesus has become the author of eternal salvation to all that obey him.

1. But though our own obedience is not the meritorious cause of our salvation, it is the indispensable antecedent and preparation for its completion in glory; and is thus required of us. This renders us meet or prepared to become partakers of the inheritance of the saints, as an adequate education in the business of the world renders us meet to engage in its duties, when, at the proper age, we are called to their performance. The business of heaven is unqualified submission to God; and for this, the increasing holiness of the Christian on the earth educates and prepares him. They who have lived and who die in the Lord, rest in the hour of death from their earthly labours; but their works follow them, not only as the evidence of their character, but as the commencement of that life of perfect obedience to the divine will and cordial rejoicing in the divine presence and glory, in which they are to be occupied for ever. And he who would delight himself in the eternal contemplation of the majesty and glory of God, must not here be habituated to love darkness rather than light, because his deeds are evil.

2. Perfect obedience is required of us under the gospel as a debt of gratitude to Christ, and an evidence of the reality of Christian character. This real motive of Christian obedience Jesus offers us when he says, if ye love me, not if ye would purchase life eternal, keep my commandments. A real love for Christ will constrain us to live, not to ourselves, but for him who died and rose again to bring us unto God.

For this end we have been bought with a price, that we may glorify God in our bodies and spirits, which are his; and Jesus lays it upon us as the argument of friendship for him, that we follow his commandments in a life of holiness, and keep ourselves from the power of the evil one. He would bind us here by those cords of love which shall hold us throughout eternity, and deal with us, not as vassals and servants whom he can govern as he pleases, and who dare not resist his will, but as the chosen friends and companions in whom he shall delight himself forever, and whose hearts he would attach now to that holiness of character in which he desires them to shine, as the brightness of the firmament and the stars forever and ever.

3. This perfect obedience to divine commandments is required as the evidence of our title to the blessedness of the people of God. "Lord, Lord," may multitudes say at the gates through which the real disciple enters, "Open unto us; we have prophesied in thy name, and eaten and drank in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets." But the reply to all such demands must be the same: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." The title to reward is the perfect obedience of Jesus; but the evidence that this title has been conferred upon us, is in the sanctifying operation of the Holy Spirit, by which we are sealed to the day of redemption. By no other testimony can the title be established; and vain is the assertion of a right to the tree of life, which, destitute of this evidence, we are utterly unable to prove. By faith we are justified and made the heirs of the divine glory; but no man can bring evidence of evangelical faith, who is destitute of evangelical obedience. An unholy Christian is a contradiction in terms; for as animal life can be in no method indicated, but by the motion and speech of the living being, no more can the spiritual life of the professed Christian be testified, without the full result of its power in the outward holiness of his character.

4. From this it is further evident, that perfect obedience of the divine precepts is necessary to bring an assurance of the attainment of salvation to the heart. There is no possible method by which a voluntarily sinful man can attain an assurance of rest. If he could be supposed to do it, it would be obtaining conviction of the truth of that which, after all, is an absolute falsehood; for there is no rest to the wicked, saith the Lord. If you can suppose a renewed man, a child of God, to turn aside from following after holiness, and to enter upon the paths of disobedience, we affirm that that man is on the broad road to hell; all his righteousness shall not be mentioned in the day of his sin; but for his iniquity that he hath committed, he shall die; and unless he be converted unto God, and renewed in holiness, in the whole character of his soul, he shall be lost forever; for without holiness, no man shall see the Lord.

5. From these demands for perfect obedience, as the indispensable preparation for heaven, as a testimony of gratitude to Christ, as an evidence of a right and title received from him, and as the only ground of assurance to our own hearts, I may lastly remark that it is necessary, from the absolute command of God. This is the will of God, even your sanctification. He requires you to glorify him in those good works which he hath before ordained, that you should walk in them; all that he has desired, revealed, or enjoined, is for this single end, that he might make unholy and rebellious men once more perfect in holiness, after his own image. For this his love has laboured. For this his grace has strove. For this his power has been extended; and to this great end the command of God, which cannot be turned aside, is directed, that they which believe be careful to maintain works of holiness; that they may stand according to that trial which shall say "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

In considering the effect which our own obedience produces upon our eternal salvation, we see the truth of the assertion of the text; and more than this, the great truth that the gospel of Jesus is designed, and operates to produce universal holiness, and universal peace in submission to God throughout the universe. In this method, the great object of Jesus to redeem the world from sin and to renew it in holiness, is accomplished; and they who do his commandments, have, through his grace, the right to dwell forever in the city of God, and to enjoy the benefits of the tree of eternal life.

This interesting subject shows us who are the real candidates for eternal bliss. They are those who are growing in holiness of personal character; who are maturing in deep and humble piety, and daily acquiring more of the blessed and delightful spirit of the Redeemer of men. Hereby we know that he dwelleth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us; and no evidence can truly convince us, that either we or others are preparing for everlasting glory, but the holy and peaceful fruits of that spirit. Our confidence in hope, though it does not rest upon our own obedience, but upon the perfect obedience of Christ, must rise or fall, in direct proportion to the holiness and watchfulness of our own conduct; and we shall certainly deceive ourselves, if, while we are not growing in grace, we comfort ourselves that we may still rejoice in hope of the glory of God. The sinful and rebellious heart cannot escape the just judgment of God. To be with God, and to enjoy his presence, we must be brought into a state of subjection to his will, and learn to follow in the steps of his holiness. While we are pressing forward in the paths of obedience, though we are altogether infirm and imperfect in our character, yet if we are sincere and true in our purpose, we are preparing to enter through the gate into the city, and Jesus, passing by all our infirmities and weakness, while looking to the perfect desire and motive which has governed us, will be prepared to say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

But if this is the way to blessedness, and this the fair and reasonable prospect of those who are following after holiness, see the sad condition of all who are cherishing a spirit of rebellion against God. While the renewed and humble Christian enters through the gates into the city, against them the door is shut, and without the protection and comfort which that city gives, they are with odious and abominable beings, with whatsoever loveth and maketh a lie. God looks upon them with no compassionate tenderness. Like reprobate silver, rejected from the fining pot; like tares bound in bundles for the fire, they are rejected forever, with no eye to pity, and no arm to save. The wages of sin is death; and they who have sold themselves to be the servants of sin on earth, must groan under the payment of their hire throughout eternity. They have passed a life of enmity to the Almighty God; they have provoked against themselves the vengeance of the Most High; and rejecting the holy precepts of his law as the rule of their life, they remain under the fearful condemnation of that law, unpardoned and chained down with everlasting despair. What can there be in the pleasures of transgression which shall compensate the sinner for such a result of his wasted life? How strange that Satan should be able so to delude him with the prospect of security, when the Almighty has declared that iniquity has no lurking place in which it shall be concealed? that though the sinner could dig into hell, thence should his hand take him; and though he could climb up to heaven, thence would he bring him down; and neither the top of Carmel, nor the bottom of the sea should afford protection to his soul? The present discourse has placed before you the only path of safety. The return of your hearts to God, in a new and holy life, conformed to the precepts of his sacred law. Blessed are you when convinced of your guilt, you turn with desire to the divine commandments. Blessed are you while with a spirit of sincerity and love you walk in the path of these commandments; for according to God's gracious promise you shall have power over the tree of life, and enter through the gates into the city.

LECTURE X.

THE OBJECT OF THE GOSPEL.

The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.—Luke xix. 10.

The Son of man is the Lord Jesus Christ. It is an appellation which he assumes to designate his voluntary humiliation for the sake of man. In his own eternal nature he was the Son of God, "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person." But being originally "in the form of God, and equal with God, "he took upon himself "the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men." Then he became the Son of man, "was made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons."

When this wonderful event took place, he came, in the expression of the text, from heaven to earth; from God to men; from personal glory to personal humiliation and distress; from the possession of inexhaustible life, to lay down himself as a sacrifice for the sins of his creatures.

This coming of the Son of God, to be made the Son of man, is the whole subject of the gospel. The writings of the New Testament tell glad tidings, good news to fallen and ruined sinners; and thus they preach the gospel, because they reveal the fact of this mission of a mighty Saviour.

The word gospel means glad tidings; and the glad tidings are, that there is an all-sufficient and glorious Redeemer, who, in the sacrifice of himself, has removed the necessity of eternal death from the whole race of man.

That the Son of man has come, is the delightful intelligence of the gospel. He has borne the necessities of sinners; has made an end to sin for those who believe in him, and has brought in an everlasting righteousness as the free gift of God to those who will receive it. And having done this, the gospel which he commands his ministers to preach, is simply the intelligence of this grand fact. The sum and substance of all that we announce to man, in the name of Jesus Christ, is, that "God hath made him to be sin for us, when he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him;" and being reconciled to us through this one offering for sin, he calls upon us to be reconciled to him, and not to receive the grace of God in vain.

Thus understood, the text proclaims the object and purpose of the gospel: the design upon which the Son of man came into the world, and for which he consented to be numbered with the transgressors. "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost. The text thus fully introduces to your notice the subject of the present discourse, which is, the object of the gospel.

This object is here declared simply to be, "to seek and to save that which was lost. The mission of the Son of God constitutes the subject of the gospel; and the design of that mission is to save the lost.

In discussing the important subject which is thus presented to us, I shall best display it to your minds by following the language of the text; and,

First, State the condition in which the gospel finds you; and,

Secondly, The means which it has provided for your deliverance from that condition.

I. The condition in which the gospel finds the whole race of men is exhibited in the text by a single word. They are "lost." And in reference to them it has but a single object, which is, "to seek and to save" them.

It needs no argument here to prove that you are not now by nature, what God designed you to be. He formed man upright; and now that man has fallen, he would restore you to a more permanent uprightness than that in which he was formed at first. It is, however, absolutely indispensable that you should understand the state to which transgression has reduced you. You must see yourselves as you are in fact; for a conviction of your wants and dangers, and an humble sense of your great alienation from God, lies at the root of all true religion; is indispensable to your acceptance of the gospel.

1. The gospel finds you lost under a burden of inconceivable guilt. Every precept of the divine law testifies against you. There is not a duty required of you which has not been left undone. There is not a transgression prohibited, in which, by thought and purpose, if not in word and act, you have not engaged. You were born in sin; and from the birth you have gone astray. One transgression would have exposed you to eternal ruin; and you have multiplied your transgressions as the sand of the sea. Every hour of your life, because spent in rebellion against God, is a record of condemnation; and there is not a single hour, which, if you were tried by it, would not sink you into unutterable despair. Your guilt is, therefore, inconceivable: for until you have written down every sinful purpose and feeling of your lives, and marked the recompense of everlasting condemnation as its proper desert, and then have added up the sum of all these innumerable purposes, and taken the amount of condemnation which will result from your estimate, you have attained no just measure of your guilt. It is high as heaven; what can you know? It is deep as hell; what can you do? It is utterly beyond the power of your minds to comprehend the extent of actual guilt which lies upon every one of your souls. You are lost beneath a load which the arm of omnipotence alone can heave off from you; and in this condition the gospel comes to seek and to save you.

2. The gospel finds you lost in the extremity of personal corruption and sinfulness. The depravity of your fallen nature is exceeding great, and it extends to every power of your mind, and to every affection of your heart. It is vain to dispute about the words total depravity, which are often used to express the state of man by nature. I mean, by my assertion, that there is nothing in you by nature which is not sinful, that your hearts are full of evil. Your understandings are dark; your wills are perverse; your affections are sensual; your conscience is partial; your memory will not retain heavenly truths; your bodies are under the influence of a depraved mind; and every member, instead of being an instrument of holiness, is a willing servant to sin. And from the head to the foot, you are destitute of soundness or spiritual health, and filled with unholiness and pollution. Through your whole lives, and in your whole character there is not one good thing. And if your everlasting salvation were offered you upon the single condition of finding a thought or desire which was not sinful, in the whole compass of your past existence, the requisition would defy your power in compliance. There is none of you who hath done good, no, not one. That there may be depravity beyond yours, none will doubt; but that there is any thing but depravity in you by nature, the word of God denies. Lost in this extreme of sinfulness, the object of the gospel is to seek and to save you.

3. The gospel finds you lost in a state of enmity to God. The natural mind of every man is enmity against God. In some it may break forth into more open acts of hostility than in others. But it is not less really enmity to God, where it is cloaked with a fair exterior, and shut up under false professions of indifference or friendship. I mean to say, that there is a direct hostility between the mind of God and the mind of every unconverted sinner. They pursue opposite and entirely inconsistent ends; while one is gathering, the other is labouring to scatter abroad. Many may not be conscious of distinct purposes of opposition to the will of God; many may deny that they have such. The reason is, simply, either that they do not stop to consider what the will of God is, or that they have formed such erroneous views of his character that they have made him altogether such an one as themselves. To a God of perfect holiness, a God who cannot abide transgression, a God who will by no means clear the guilty, there is not an unrenewed sinner upon the earth who is not an enemy. Your whole course of character and conduct, in an unconverted state, is operating to thwart the divine purposes in the redemption of the world, to make iniquity abound, when he would make an end of sin, and to divert from Jesus the heart which he would bring home to his dominion. And thus, by these wicked works, you prove yourselves the enemies of God.

4. The gospel finds you lost in a state of utter inability to return to God, or to restore to yourselves the divine image and favour. So far are you from being able to recommend yourselves to God, that every imagination of the thoughts of your heart is only evil continually. God alone can enable you to will or to do any thing that is good. You have not a wish of your own to be reconciled to God. Your dispositions and affections are so entirely averted from him, and you love darkness and sin so much better than you love light and holiness, that you have no natural desire to be brought to a knowledge of yourselves or to a knowledge of God. This aversion of your minds forms an utter incapacity of yourselves to return to God; and were there no other power to operate in the conversion of your souls but the determining power of your own wills, Ezekiel might as well preach to the dry bones as we preach the gospel unto you. Still more beyond your power is it to restore to yourselves the divine favour and image which have been lost by sin. This is a path which no human wisdom hath ever trodden, and no mortal eye could ever discern. And except as the result of God's unsearchable riches of grace, all possibility of reconciliation to him would cease for ever. So far as it regards a way to render God merciful to the sinner's soul, or to bring this soul back to God, though the united wisdom of all creatures should be collected to decide upon the method, the gospel finds you utterly lost, and must seek and save you as you are.

This is the condition in which the gospel finds you by nature. You are lost under a load of intolerable guilt, in the extremity of sinfulness and corruption, in the enmity of your hearts to God, and in an utter inability to restore yourselves to his favour.

I have no disposition to overstate this matter. But unless you do discern your actual state by nature, and become acquainted with your necessities, it is vain to point your notice to the provisions which the gospel has made for your rescue and relief.

We cannot better illustrate the natural condition of fallen man than by comparing it with the actual condition of fallen angels. They contracted guilt and were unable to remove it. They lost the divine image in which they were created, and were unable to restore it; and having no provision made for them by God himself, they are left to endure the penalty of their transgression in endless, irremediable misery. I know not that there is a shadow of difference between us and them in this respect, except so far as the sovereign grace of God in which they found no interest, has interposed for us. This, I believe, to be the very truth before God; and all the difference between us and them, is the difference which grace has made.

But if this truth were really felt among you, our work, in establishing the truth of the gospel, would have no difficulties to encounter. It is the pride of your hearts which interposes the great obstacle to your acceptance of the gospel. You are so averse to see your necessities, so disposed to contend for some remnant of goodness or power in yourselves, which shall lessen your obligations to God, that the provisions of the Son of man are shut out from you and despised. But could you feel and acknowledge yourselves to be wholly lost, and for ever lost, you would be ready to hear of a Saviour with thankfulness, and to embrace with anxious desire the salvation which has been provided for you in the gospel. You would rejoice that "the Son of man had come to seek and to save that which was lost."

II. We will proceed to consider the means which the gospel has provided for your deliverance from this lost condition.

The object of the Saviour is a single object; it is "to seek and to save that which is lost." Every other purpose which the gospel accomplishes, and every other aspect under which the Saviour is presented, is subordinate to this. As a teacher of morals, a revealer of wisdom, a guide in life, the character of the Lord Jesus is honourable and comforting. But all these characteristics and offices are merged in that one glorious, indispensable character; "a Saviour to the chief of sinners." This is the character which the text presents.

The first object of Jesus was to seek a world that was lost; a world that had started out as it were from its proper orbit of submission to God, and had wandered off, unknowing and unknown, in regions of everlasting darkness and despair. Like the shepherd, whose ninety-and-nine sheep had remained in his protection, while one only had gone astray, Jesus left the innumerable hosts of beings who still owned his just dominion, and came to look for this one poor race of creatures, that in the wonderful method which he had devised, he might save them from destruction, and bring them back to acknowledge and to delight in the holy government of their Creator.

Having visited and found this alienated world, his next object was to save it; to put an instant stop to the course of condemnation and ruin; to arrest all proceedings of violated justice, and to subdue the purpose of rebellion which actuated the heart of man. In the accomplishment of this end, he has rendered the forgiveness of man consistent with the character of God, and has provided means to reconcile the alienated heart of man to God, from whom it had been averted.

In its pursuit of this grand object, the gospel has made every provision which the lost condition of your souls demands. And it offers to your acceptance a salvation in every respect honourable to God, and adapted to your utmost wants.

1. For the inconceivable guilt which presses down your souls in death, the gospel has provided a substitute and surety in the person of God's dear Son. He has given himself a ransom for all. He came as the Son of man to stand in the sinner's place. He was born of a pure virgin, that he might be a partaker of the nature of man, while he should not partake of his guilt or inherit his corruption. Of all our sinless infirmities he was made the subject; but in regard to our corruption of nature, he was free from sin. He was a victim without spot and blemish; and having no sins in himself to demand atonement, he could make himself an offering for the sins of others. In his sacred person were united both God and man: and having humbled himself to death, even the death of the cross, for us, God "laid on him the iniquities of us all." For you he suffered, for you he bore the penalties of the broken law, which, without his merciful intervention, you would have suffered in eternity: and for you he obeyed its holy precepts, to work out a righteousness which should be imputed to all, and put upon all that believe. He voluntarily assumed your guilt to be laid upon himself, that he might bear its curse. This has been done. If, now, you will thankfully accept his righteousness, to be laid upon you, the work of the Son of man for you will be accomplished; and your inconceivable load of guilt shall be carried away to a land of utter forgetfulness.

In this great offering of the Son of man, he has restored the relation of peace between God and your souls. He has thus rendered God's purposes of love to you perfectly consistent with the holiness, justice and faithfulness of his own character. He has silenced the denunciations of the offended law; he has satisfied the utmost claims of divine majesty; and has done every thing which is necessary to be done beyond the limits of your own perverted hearts, to save you from your lost and ruined state. Having thus opened a perfect and sufficient way to rescue your souls from the everlasting punishment of sin, he is now able to apply to each of you, for the conversion and cleansing of your individual hearts, the full atonement which he has made.

2. For the exceeding sinfulness and depravity of your hearts, the gospel provides the influence and power of the Holy Spirit, the third person of the blessed Trinity, whose grace is freely offered to you to bring back your affections unto God, and to renew you in holiness after the divine image.

To save you from your native enmity to God, by the power of this Spirit it takes away your evil hearts of unbelief, gives you a spirit of submission to the divine will, and causes you once more to render unto God that which is his own.

To supply your utter incapability to restore the divine image to your souls, it works within you by the same Spirit both to will and to do. It thus reveals the Saviour to your acceptance, and fulfils the good pleasure of his grace, in your final salvation.

The difficulties which your lost condition opposes to your salvation beyond your own hearts, the gospel provides for in the infinitely sufficient mediation of God the Son; and the difficulties which arise from this lost condition within yourselves, the gospel removes by the power and operation of God the Holy Spirit.

As, when you were all without strength, Christ died for the ungodly, and thus came to seek and to save a world which was lost; so while you are individually dead in trespass and sins, the Holy Spirit comes as the great gift of Christ to apply the work which he has finished to your souls, and thus as the great agent to the Son of man, to seek and to save each individual sinner among you from his lost estate.

This last provision of the gospel for the attainment of its great object, is as full and sufficient as the former, which we have already considered.

Your personal inability to save yourselves is an entire inability, though it be the result of sin, and no imperfection in the original constitution of man. So far as relates to any spiritual feeling or power, you are naturally utterly destitute of both, and are dead in your sins.

In this condition, the Son of man comes by his Spirit to seek and to save you. This Almighty Spirit quickens you by his divine power; and it is by this power alone, the power which raised Christ himself from the dead, that any one of your souls can attain the least disposition to serve and honour God. Having quickened or awakened your souls, the Holy Spirit discovers to you the extent of your wants, and humbles you under a sense of them; he then stirs you up to cry after God; he then reveals the Saviour to your view, enables you to exercise faith in him, and to receive him in the gracious offices which he sustains for you. Having done this, he fills you with a principle of love to Christ, and constrains you to devote yourselves to him.

From this, he gives you ability progressively to mortify the indwelling power of sin, to honour the Saviour who hath called you by a holy conversation; and from day to day he transforms you more entirely after the image of Christ, and renders you meet to become partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. He is thus sent as the great instrument of God, to apply individually to your souls the perfect and all-sufficient redemption which the Son of man has wrought out for you: and under the gracious provisions of the gospel, you have access through Jesus Christ by one Spirit unto the Father.

In the means of deliverance which are thus provided for your free acceptance, the gospel accomplishes its one great object; "to seek and to save that which is lost." These means are perfectly sufficient for the end designed; they supply every possible want; they meet every possible deficiency; they come up boldly to face all opposition: and the sinner who is willing to embrace them, finds them ministering to his soul a full and final salvation.

Let it be remembered that the single object of the gospel in reference to yourselves, is your everlasting salvation from a condition of utter ruin and death. Every other purpose which it attains in accomplishing this is partial and unprofitable, if this be not attained. If in this life only, you have hope in Christ, you are of all men most miserable. To attain this great object of your salvation from ruin, it provides a perfect atonement and righteousness in the Lord Jesus to reconcile God to you, and the all-powerful sanctifying influences of the divine Spirit to reconcile you to God. It declares to you, that God has accepted the mediation of the Son of man, and is reconciled to you; and it asks if you will accept it also, by the power which is given you from on high, and be reconciled to him? Whenever you are individually ready to do this, the great object of the gospel has been attained, and the Son of man has sought and saved that which was lost.

III. In concluding my remarks upon this important subject, I must ask you to examine with the utmost fidelity, how far this object has been attained among you.

"The Son of man has come to seek and to save," this whole congregation of sinners, pressing forward to the judgment seat of God. Had the gospel produced its proper effect, there would not be in this assembly one transgressor still alienated from God through the blindness of his mind. But alas, how far are we from this result! what mean the number of slaves to the world, of captives to Satan, to whom the solemn voice of the Almighty God this night comes in the warnings of his word? What mean the giddy children of folly and mirth, for whom hell has opened her mouth, and still enlarges herself without measure? Whence the swarm of infidel hearts that yet lift up themselves in rebellion against the Creator of heaven and earth? O, how very partially has the great object of the gospel been attained among you! Could I go from soul to soul before me, and see the mark of God's infallible determination of character rise upon your foreheads as I approached each; upon what numbers should I read that solemn word, LOST, LOST! in many cases, perhaps, beyond the reach of recovery! and what would be the probable result—but, that the greater portion of this assembly of immortal beings would be proclaimed to be still under the wrath of God and without hope in the world? This fact is awful; is it a fact? Am I now addressing hundreds who are denying the Lord that bought them, and bringing upon their souls a swift destruction? And are you careless and unconcerned under such views of your character and condition? Do you feel nothing? Have you no desire to be brought back to the fold of Jesus? Have you no wish to be saved in the day of his power? Will you choose as your portion, the darkness and despair in which unpardoned sin will inevitably involve you? I do ask you honestly and affectionately, will you determine to drive the Son of God from your souls, and lie down upon the unbeliever's everlasting bed?

I would speak to you, as a poor sinful creature, with humility and tenderness; but I would speak to you also, as the minister of God to you for good, with authority and much assurance; I warn the multitude of dying and yet unconverted sinners to whom I speak, that they cannot escape the just judgment of God; I call upon you in the name of the glorious Redeemer, who desires not your death, to awake from the ruinous delusion which you are playing upon your own hearts. Lay up no more sorrow for the last days. Be no longer infatuated with the false promises of the destroyer. The Son of man has sought you, O shall he not be allowed to save you and bless you with peace? Every thing is waiting the result of your own determination; heaven and hell are suspended upon a moment's choice: and this night you either go back with the shepherd to the fold, or you bind yourself the more irrevocably to the power of Satan.

Poor deluded sinner, lost! O, how much is meant by that one word lost. The man has wandered from his home, the shadows of the evening are stretched out, the coming darkness hurries on despair. Alone in a wilderness, wearied with the day's anxiety and fatigue, with no track to lead him to his home, no prospect of repose but on the bosom of the desert, no shelter for the night but the chill atmosphere of his solitude, with what feverish delirium he throws himself upon the earth. Home, children, friends, comforts and joys, all crowd into his bewildered mind. But these are gone. He shall see them no more. He is lost, and many a heart is swelling with anguish at the fear he will return no more forever. No sound arrests his ear but the desert's blast, or the wild beast's roar; and hope, and peace, and reason too, have taken their flight from his disordered mind.

But would you complete this picture of woe? See, a messenger of kindness comes to this lost man to tell him of a path to his home, and to lead him back to its secure repose. He wakes him from his dream, intreats him to arise and go with him, assures him that he will lead him in safety to his own abode, and with a thousand words of sympathy and love intercedes with him for his own deliverance. But reason and feeling and recollection have gone, and though he is lost, he refuses to hearken to his guide. He will listen for a moment to his kind offer and then lie down in the madness of despair, finally to perish, and turn a deaf ear to every intreaty and remonstrance. You pity the image which fancy has created, but you are lost, and will not pity the actual miseries of your own ruined, deserted souls, nor allow the Son of man, this messenger of mercy, to bring you back to his Father's house in peace.

LECTURE XI.

THE GOSPEL WAY OF SALVATION.

By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God.—EPHESIANS II. 8.

The great object of the gospel is the eternal salvation of man. To accomplish this object has been the design of the Son of God in all that he has done and suffered and taught. The accomplishment of this purpose is all that man requires. Let the sinner be saved, and he may be happy in the prospect of it, though he be poor and deeply afflicted with the trials of this world. Let him live and die without the prospect of this salvation, and all the wealth and indulgence of the world cannot purchase for him the comfort which he wants.

The few years of his existence here are but of small importance. Whether they pass away in sorrow or in joy, they will soon pass, and their pains and pleasures will be alike forgotten.

So far as this life is concerned, it would be reasonable in you to dismiss anxiety and care. But you have to die; and after death, the judgment; and after the judgment, eternity. These claim your notice and consideration. Seventy years of life you may be allowed to despise; but the countless ages of your future existence you cannot despise. For them the great question is to be settled, and to be settled here, Shall you be saved or lost?

The object of the gospel of Jesus is to settle this all-important question. It is to save you with an everlasting salvation. But how you shall be saved, how you shall escape the just judgment of God, and come before his spotless throne in peace, forms another question, which the gospel alone can determine.

To answer this momentous question is my purpose at this time, while I bring before you, as the subject of the present discourse, the gospel way of salvation.

You find yourselves by nature in a state of utter ruin and condemnation. You have no peace with God, and no comfort or hope in yourselves. Eternity is filled with the blackness of darkness forever; and you see that you shall have no hope when God takes away your soul. God in his righteous indignation against you is a consuming fire, and you feel that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. But how you shall escape his anger, and be made secure from the proper consequences of your own sins, is a matter utterly beyond your power to determine. It is a matter which would have remained a mystery hidden in God forever, had it not pleased him, in the riches of his grace, to reveal it to you in the gospel of his Son.

To the decision of this matter, the present text comes with the wisdom of God, and it answers as from the very throne of the Most High to every question and every doubt, "By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God."

In considering this subject, the text presents three natural divisions in the three assertions which it makes:

I. "By grace are ye saved," as the cause and instrument.

II. "Through faith," as the method.

III. And "The gift of God," as the origin.

I. "By grace ye are saved."

When our thoughts and desires are first turned to the glorious blessings of the gospel, and we ask with the jailor at Phillipi, "What shall we do to be saved?" probably in all instances the first idea which occurs to the mind is, that we must do something, in order that we may in some way merit and earn the salvation which we want. The performance of some particular duty, the hearing of some particular preacher, the reading of some designated book, the new obedience of our life, or even our own grief and sorrow for sin, are suggested to our minds as a price which we must pay for the blessing which we want; and it is sometimes long before we are willing to trust ourselves to the free and sovereign grace of God, to be saved in the way which shall seem best in his sight. The salvation of the gospel is altogether a salvation by grace. The term grace is used generally to convey two distinct meanings; the one of which is a consequent upon the other. It means the original unmerited favour or mercy of God, from which our salvation has flowed as the cause, and the influence of the Holy Spirit, by which that salvation is applied to us, as the instrument.

When we say "ye are saved by grace," we mean to assert that your salvation flows exclusively from the unmerited mercy of God, which has provided and offered a Saviour, and that it is applied to you exclusively by the new creating power of the Holy Ghost, who takes of the things of Christ, and shows them unto you and enables you to believe in your hearts on him.

The first aspect of the text declares ye are saved by grace, to the exclusion of all human merit, in the purchase of your salvation. The second, ye are saved by grace, to the exclusion of all human power, in applying this salvation unto you, and in converting you unto God.

Let these two be distinctly considered:

1. The gospel teaches us, that we are saved by the free grace and unmerited mercy of God, to the exclusion of every thought of human works or deservings. The idea of merit in a fallen and imperfect being is entirely absurd. Consider the situation of our first parents after their disobedience, and what could they do to recommend themselves to the favour of the God against whom they had offended! I will not ask what they could do to merit the gift of God's dear Son and the influences of the Holy Spirit upon their souls, for it is obvious that no thought of the possibility of such a method of restoration could, by any means, enter into their minds. But what single personal act or service could they render to God for which he should be induced to pardon their disobedience and restore them to his favour? What can the fallen angels now do to restore the image and favour of God to themselves? and they are as capable of earning their salvation as is any unconverted sinner upon the earth.

But it may still be said, that since God has mercifully bestowed a Saviour upon us, we should do something to deserve his favour, or to repay him for his kindness. I would ask, then, what can we do? "Without him we can do nothing." And if the communication of his grace must precede every good act in us, it will be self-evident that we can do nothing to deserve it; and must be dependant upon God's sovereign pleasure for the ability both to will and to do.

The truth is, as the first gift of a dying Saviour sprung from God's unmerited love, so must our salvation by him in all its parts. We have nothing to offer him. All our sufficiency is of God; and render him what we will, we only render him that which is his own.

The gospel opens to us, therefore, a way of salvation perfectly free. It has provided every thing which our souls can want; and having made such abundant provisions, it asks us to receive them without money and without price. Its salvation is clogged with no conditions. Accept it as the gift of God to those who are perishing, and it is your own for ever. The depth of your sinfulness forms no difficulty. Salvation is as freely offered to the pirate in his dungeon, as to him who is, in morality of conduct, not far from the kingdom of God. Whosoever will, may take a blessing, to which man can add nothing, and for which man give nothing. Whatever you have been, whatever you have done, the gospel does not ask a question about it. It addresses you all as the chief of sinners, and presents the full glories of its salvation as honestly to one as to another, asking nothing but your thankful acceptance of the gift which it offers.

2. But how shall you accept this gift, and apply this free salvation to your own souls? The text answers you under the second aspect, "Ye are saved by grace." The Holy Ghost must come upon you, and the power of the Highest overshadow you, before, in the acceptance of this salvation, you can be created anew after the divine image, and be made the sons of God. A real conviction of your sinfulness and danger is the result of his power. He gives a true repentance for sin; he leads your hearts to the Prince and Saviour who has been exalted to give repentance and forgiveness of sins. He bestows upon you that new heart and new nature which is promised in the covenant that God hath made with his people under the gospel. His power is all-sufficient, and it is alone sufficient to create in you the gracious dispositions and character which God is ready to accept.

When you are dead in your sins, he awakens you to life. While you are infirm and feeble, he sustains and strengthens you. He leads you to the fountain of living waters, and clothes you with a new and divine life; and from the first hour of your spiritual existence to the hour of eternal triumph by the grace of God, you are what you are.

The gospel requires no human power in the work of your salvation. It depends not, in any degree, upon your own wisdom or strength, or determination. It demands nothing of you which it does not promise to work within you, so that from the divine fulness you may receive grace upon grace. When it commands you to repent or believe, or be obedient to God, it has before offered to your acceptance the very gracious qualities which it requires you to exercise; and there is not a single quality which it calls for that can flow from any other source than its own sufficiency.

This view of the gospel way of salvation is most important, and cannot be too deeply impressed upon your minds. The Saviour asks from you nothing but what he first offers to give you. There is not a grace in the renewed heart which has proceeded from any other power. The same spirit upholds and sanctifies the steadfast believer, which consoled and transformed at first the penitent transgressor. The gospel will set none of you up upon an independent stock of grace. Your manna must fall every morning, and be gathered before the sun is hot. Your barrel and your cruse shall never fail, but they shall never be filled. As your day is, and only so, shall be your strength; and you might as well close the shutters of your house to keep the light of the sun which you have received, as think of retaining grace and strength when cut off from immediate and uninterrupted communication with the great source of both. You will live only while Christ lives in you; and from the first to the last, the work of your sanctification is all divine, and the glory belongs entirely to God.

The gospel way of salvation is in these two aspects a salvation by grace, to the exclusion of human merit and human power. The provisions which it had made it asks you to accept, and then promises and gives you the power to receive them. The full foundation for your hope was laid when the Prince of Life offered himself upon the cross as a sacrifice for your sins. You will be able to build securely upon this foundation when the Spirit of God shall be allowed to lead you back from your love and pursuit of sin, to acknowledge and receive him as your righteousness and peace.

The text yet more definitely points you to this way of salvation, when it goes on to state the method in which you may be interested in it.

II. "Ye are saved by grace through faith."

Every gracious provision of the gospel is made independent of ourselves; and the work of our salvation is accomplished when we are finally interested in those abundant provisions for our wants which God offers us in the gospel. When we are united to Christ, we are partakers of his abundant mercy; our sins are pardoned through his atonement; our souls are justified through his obedience; and because he lives, we shall live also. While all these provisions are beyond ourselves, it is by faith alone that we can be interested in them. The foundation is laid; it is perfect; it is all-sufficient. Whether we believe or not, it remains the same. God cannot deny himself. Would you then be made partakers of that grace whereby you may be saved, you must believe God's record respecting his dear Son; and then look to him for the communication of his purchased benefits to yourselves. You must rest yourselves with confidence upon that unmerited love of God which has offered you salvation, and that all-powerful influence of his Spirit which may apply this salvation unto you. There is no other conceivable method in which you may obtain an interest in the mercies which God has treasured up in Jesus Christ; and if you look through the scriptures, you will find that your simple faith in the power and promises of Christ is the only instrument ever spoken of there, as the one which shall secure to you the work which he has finished. If I have treasured up in my house abundant provisions for the destitute, which I offer freely to their use if they will receive them, how can they obtain the blessing but by believing that it is there, and will indeed be bestowed, and then asking in this spirit of faith for the bestowal? God's treasures are laid up for you. They are not now to be made, or to be increased in any degree by all that you can do. Believe that they are there, believe that they are all-sufficient, believe that they will indeed be bestowed, and then ask them with the desire of faith, and you shall not be sent empty away.

It is true you are required to repent, and to obey the commandments of God, in a new life of holiness; but these are the results of a true faith. You can have no repentance unto salvation without believing in him whom you have pierced, that he may give it to you. You cannot obey a single command but by his power dwelling within you; and these gracious dispositions and habits, instead of purchasing salvation for you, are themselves a part, and a most important part, of that very salvation which is offered to you in the Lord Jesus Christ as the purchase of his cross.

Do you ask for a godly sorrow for sin? for a total subjection of your unholy affections? for the dominion of holiness and love within your hearts? May not Jesus reply to every request, "Believest thou that I am able to do this?" And will not his bestowal of them, and of every thing accompanying salvation, depend upon the answer which your consciences would be obliged to render to a question like this? Only believe, we may still say to you, and these and all other mercies shall be bestowed. The treasury of God's love, in which attribute the scripture says he is "rich," is freely open to you. Every thing which you want is there; and a coming thither with faith will show you such provisions of grace as pass man's understanding. You can purchase nothing, you can render nothing, you can offer nothing. When you are by faith vitally interested in Christ, you will want nothing more. You will find no deficiency for your own power to supply. While he dwells within you by faith, every holy trait, every lovely disposition, every spiritual habit, every heavenly desire, shall spring and rise, and flourish and spread abroad in your hearts and character, from Christ who dwelleth in you. But until by faith you yield to him, you are dead in your sins; and a naturally dead man might as justly be expected to rise up and offer a price for that life, the possession of which was implied in his very rising, as you expect to offer anything but a depraved, corrupted and dead spirit, upon which Christ may show the power of his grace. You must be saved by grace, and that grace shall be applied to your souls by faith; and even here again, to take away all pride and glorying from yourselves, the grace and faith and every mercy, spring not from yourselves; they are all "the gift of God," a gift to those who are poor and destitute and perishing in their sins.

III. "The gift of God." This last assertion does not refer particularly to the faith which is required before, but to the whole salvation by grace of which the text speaks. Every part of man's salvation is equally a free gift. The original purpose to save, the glorious sacrifice which has been made, the offer of that sacrifice to you, the acceptance of it by your hearts, and the peace and holiness which this acceptance gives, are alike the results of a principle of love in God, which looks to no merit, or strength, or recompense, in the creatures to whom the gift is made.

The same determinate counsel and purpose of divine mercy which delivered up a Saviour to be crucified for you, will, in the last day, finish your salvation by crowning you with him. Your last breath will be as much dependant upon him as your first; and eternity will be spent, not in personal congratulations upon your own strength or wisdom or perseverance, but in raptured hallelujahs of thanksgiving to him who has loved you and given himself for you, and washed you from your sins in his own blood, and redeemed you from every kindred and tongue, and people and nation, to make you kings and priests unto God for ever.

Although the truths which I have here presented to you have been controverted in every age, and there have been multitudes of men who have opposed this casting down of human merit and ascription of all praise and glory to the grace of God; still the Bible teaches the same thing, and the plain and simple way of salvation which it first laid open to sinners it lays open now; and it seems to me that nothing can be more plain and evident, and intelligible, than is this way of salvation which the gospel offers. While on the one side there is a poor wretched creature, wanting in every thing and having nothing to give, on the other there is a bountiful Sovereign and Lord, who offers every thing freely, and asks no price from the subject of grace.

The gospel is provided in all its operations as a remedy for existing evil, and as such it is in every part exclusively "the gift of God."

Let us come back to consider the actual state of a fallen being, the actual condition of your own souls by nature, and you will find yourselves to be entirely in a guilty, polluted and helpless condition. In this state of spiritual ruin, God has provided for you a remedy; and he both inclines and enables you to apply that remedy. For your guilt he applies to you the atoning blood of Christ; for your pollution and weakness he sends the Holy Spirit, to begin and carry on a work of grace within your hearts. By looking to Christ you may obtain peace with God and in your own conscience; and by yielding yourselves to the influences of God's Holy Spirit, you may become renewed and sanctified in all your powers. Your renovated health will begin immediately to appear. You will be enabled to mortify all your former corruptions, and to walk holily, justly and unblamably before God and man, and will become gradually transformed into the divine image in righteousness and true holiness. But to what then shall be ascribed the change which has taken place within you? Will it not be altogether owing to the remedy which God has prescribed and enabled you to apply? To your latest hour you will continue to apply the same remedy; for through the whole of this life you will be only convalescent and not perfectly recovered; and when in the full establishment of your spiritual health, in the heavenly inheritance, you will tell the history of your restoration to the sole honour of that Almighty Physician who visited you in your lost estate, and brought a balm which was adequate to your need.

Now is not this perfectly plain and simple? Is it not exactly the gift which every sinner wants for the peace of his mind and for the sanctification and salvation of his soul? Yet in this representation all is of grace. Both the Saviour himself, and unmerited salvation through him, are the free gift of God; and not according to works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy we are saved by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost.

I have thus endeavoured to set before you the gospel way of salvation. You find it a way perfectly adapted to your powers and to your necessities. It calls for your sincere thankfulness to God, who has been willing to provide it, and your cordial acceptance of the gift, while it is so freely presented. But all will be of no avail to you unless you embrace with rejoicing, the remedy which is thus presented. Let not the subject, therefore, be allowed to rest in your understandings unfruitful and barren. Seek to have your hearts interested in it; hear the voice of the Spirit, which says to you, "This is the way, walk ye in it;" and turn not to the right hand or to the left.

In concluding the remarks which I have now to make, let me beseech you to seek a deep acquaintance with your real state before God, and the application to yourselves of the gracious remedy which is offered you in the gospel.

Had you but a due preparation of heart for the reception of the gospel, were you truly convinced of your unworthiness and danger, the glad tidings of salvation would distil as the dew upon your souls, as the showers that water the mown grass. Did you feel that the sorrows of death compassed you about, and the pains of hell had got hold upon you in the deep and piercing sense of your own guilt, the sound of salvation purchased by our incarnate God would transport your souls, as it did the angels, when they sung, "Glory to God in the highest; and on earth, peace, good will towards men." Unspeakable joy would spring up in your hearts from the thought of an indwelling God, undertaking your cause and working effectually upon your souls. The great and universal reason why you hear the gracious invitations and promises of the gospel so inattentively, and with so little effect upon your characters, is, that you are not convinced of your danger. You do not feel and mourn over your lost condition. "They that are whole need not a physician." Because so many of you believe yourselves to be whole, the remedy is heedlessly rejected, and your souls are left to perish. O that God would tear off from your hearts the veil which Satan and the world are uniting to weave over you, and make you to see the pollutions which are there open to his view! Why are you so anxious to deceive yourselves in this matter? There is a day before you when hell shall be naked, and destruction shall have no covering; when every false excuse shall fail, and every extenuating plea shall become utterly useless; and when, though discovery shall be perfect, it shall be too late to be beneficial. If you are insolvent and ruined, why attempt to delude yourselves with the contrary belief? But are you not? Then Jesus is no Saviour to you. You may as profitably own Mahomet or Brahma for your Lord as Jesus. He will not, he cannot save you till you feel yourselves to be lost. I pray you look at your characters in the mirror of God's infallible word; and while he proclaims that you have altogether gone out of the way, acknowledge the truth of his representation, and be willing that he should bring you back to himself in peace.

Upon this deep acquaintance with your own character and state alone, can be built a proper acceptance of the gospel. However your understandings may be enlightened with a knowledge of the gospel way of salvation, it will profit you nothing while this knowledge is merely speculative. Though the patient in the hospital might deliver a lecture upon his own disease, and the adaptation of the remedy to his want, it would avail but little should he still refuse to apply the remedy to himself. If you neglect the gracious remedy of the gospel, or substitute any other in its stead, you do so to your eternal ruin. I beseech you to look to Christ for the justification, and to the Holy Spirit for the sanctification of your souls. In no other conceivable method can you find salvation from the condemnation of the law, the bondage of sin, and the everlasting punishment of hell. There is no other name given for salvation, but the name of Jesus, and that name is worse than useless to you, unless it be permitted to dwell in your heart, as your hope and comfort. Yield yourselves to his power. Be willing to be saved by grace through faith, and so receive the unspeakable gift of God, that his power may operate within you, to bring you home to that fold of ransomed sinners which is under one shepherd, Jesus Christ, the Great Bishop and Shepherd of souls.

LECTURE XII.

THE HISTORY OF THE GOSPEL.

Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people.

As he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began.—St. Luke i. 68 and 70.

In one previous discourse I have considered the great object which the gospel designs to accomplish, which is to seek and to save that which is lost. In another I have spoken of the way which the gospel lays open for the attainment of this object, which is by grace through faith, as the gift of God.

Before I proceed to consider several distinct attributes and characteristics of the gospel, I wish in my present discourse to set before you the history of the gospel. By this expression I do not mean the narrative of facts which the writings of the Evangelists contain, but the history of the gospel itself, as a dispensation to man, showing its origin and its progress, in the clear manifestations of its grace to those for whom it was designed since the fall of man.

As an appropriate introduction to this subject, I have selected my text from the sacred hymn which Zacharias uttered at the circumcision of his son. This hymn was uttered by the immediate inspiration of God, for it is said, "that Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied" in the divine language which is here contained. Every assertion of necessity which this hymn makes, must be infallible and eternal truth.

The son of Zacharias was to be the forerunner of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world; and on the occasion of his public dedication to God, his father prophesied of the character and work of that Saviour before whom he was to be sent.

The Redeemer was not yet born in the lowly nature which he had assumed. But the faith of Zacharias was led forward to him, when it is more than probable that none of his auditors, beside his own wife, understood the allusions which he made. "Blessed," he says "be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David." In the figurative language of the Israelites, a horn implies great strength, and in the text, "a horn of salvation," is a strong salvation; an all-sufficient salvation; a salvation to the uttermost; or, as in our prayer-book, "a mighty salvation," because accomplished by the mighty God of Israel, although he stooped to be a babe in the family of his servant David. The reference of this high title, "The Lord God of Israel," to the child who was to be born of Mary, becomes evident in the succeeding verses of the hymn, in which Zacharias addresses himself to his own child, whom he now held up in dedication unto God, "And thou, child, shalt be called the prophet of the highest, for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways;" and this perfectly corresponds with the statement of the angel before the birth of John, "He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb, and many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God, and he shall go before him," the Lord God of Israel, in the spirit of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

The great event for which Zacharias thus praises God, was the incarnation of the Lord God of Israel; the whole sum and substance of the gospel. This raising up a mighty salvation in the family of David, in the birth of him who was to be the Saviour of the world, Zacharias says was a fulfilment of all the divine promises of salvation to the people of Israel. "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people, as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began." This incarnation and suffering of the Son of God, is the subject of the gospel. This gospel has been proclaimed by the inspired prophets of God, from the beginning of the world. The interesting subject which I now propose to you, the history of the gospel, will lead me, first, cursorily to trace these different publications of the gospel to men, from the earliest ages of the world, in order to show that the great truth upon which we rest our hope, the incarnation of a mighty Saviour, was from the beginning of the world spoken to our fathers by the holy prophets whom God inspired.

From the day of man's fall from God one great plan has comprehended the whole arrangement of divine providence and divine mercy. This one plan is the redemption of the world, by our Lord Jesus Christ. For this the earth and men have been suffered to exist. For this the mighty revolutions of the sons of men have been overruled. For this the least event in the life of each individual subject of redemption is made to operate; and all things work together for this unspeakable good to those who love God, who are called according to his purpose.

The scriptures teach us that all the various parts of man's salvation have been devised from the foundation of the world. The great covenant of redemption between the persons of the Deity, in which the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit united to bring back the captives of Satan, was made before the world was created. The great sacrifice which the law demanded, and which this covenant of redemption provided, was then appointed, and Jesus is called the Lamb, slain from the foundation of the world. The book of life was then prepared, and the saints are said to be those who are written in the Lamb's book from the foundation of the world. The everlasting home for the saints was then provided; for thus says Jesus of the redeemed, "Then shall the king say to them on his right hand, come ye blessed of my father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." The view which is thus presented of the great salvation of the gospel, is high and comforting. For the everlasting good of the feeblest Christian, the power of Almighty God has been exerted from the beginning of the world; and the gospel, which in its rich and attractive invitations is preached to us, is the simple, but glorious intelligence of that which occupied the wisdom and the love of heaven, before this world was formed.

The redeeming visit of the Lord God of Israel, of which Zacharias speaks, was planned and determined before the creation, and has been announced as the object of faith to the people of God, in every age since the world began. This I will proceed to exhibit to you, and may your hearts unite with the Father of the baptist in blessing the Lord God of Israel for this work of grace.

We will first speak of that period of history between the fall of man and the covenant with Abraham, and show how, in all this interval of time, God was proclaiming the glad tidings of the gospel to men.

As soon as Adam fell, the Son of God immediately entered upon the office and work of a mediator. This work he had undertaken before the world began; for he thus says of himself, "I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was." Now the appointed time had come, and in the moment of man's transgression, he immediately presented himself as the daysman between a holy, infinite, offended majesty, and offending mankind. His mediation was at once accepted, and wrath was prevented from going forth to execute the amazing curse which had been denounced against transgression. It is manifest that Christ began his work of mediation instantly upon the fall, because God immediately exercised mercy, and did not cut off man at once as he did the angels who had sinned. But no mercy could be extended to fallen man, but through a mediator; the exercise of divine forbearance and mercy shows the commencement of the work of the gospel, and when the Saviour came to comfort our first parents, on the day of their transgression, in the garden of Eden, he came to seek and to save that which was lost, as much as when he came afterwards to take upon himself the nature of man of the virgin Mary.

From that day Christ took upon himself the care of the church in all his offices. He undertook to teach mankind as their great prophet; to intercede for men as their priest, and to govern them as their king. He was then set up as the captain of the Lord's host; as the captain of salvation to his church, to defend them against all their foes, and from that hour God acted solely through a mediator, in teaching, governing, and blessing mankind.

While on the day of the fall the Son of God commenced the attainment of the great object of his mediation, on the same day intelligence of this was also proclaimed to man, and the gospel was first preached upon the earth. God said unto the serpent, "I will put enmity between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." This was the first revelation of the covenant of grace; the first dawning of the gospel upon the earth. By the transgression of man, the light of God's favour had been shrouded in darkness, which neither men nor angels could scatter; and when, on that day of sin, God called man to account, his heart was filled with shame and terror. These words of God were the first dawning of a returning light. Before they were uttered there was not one glimpse of light; not one beam of comfort, nor a single source of hope to the sinner. Here was a certain intimation of a merciful design to be accomplished by "the seed of the woman," which was like the first glimmering of morning in the eastern sky. This gracious promise was given before the sentence was pronounced upon either Adam or Eve, from tenderness to them, lest they should be overborne with a sentence of condemnation, without having any thing held out whence they could gather any hope.

In the institution of sacrifices, with the skins of which Adam and Eve were clothed, the gospel was again revealed to man, and a permanent type set up of the sacrifice of Christ, by which the power of Satan was to be subdued. The ordinance of sacrifices was instituted immediately after the revelation by the promise of the covenant of grace. Thus the first stone in the great edifice of man's redemption was laid in prophecy of Christ, and the next in this standing type of his one sacrifice for sin.

Not long after the gospel was thus first proclaimed upon the earth, and the way of salvation through a mediator was laid open, God began the work of actually saving the souls of men. It is probable that the first fruits of the redemption of Christ were Adam and Eve. It is probable, I say, from God's manner of treating them, in comforting them by a promise, under their awakenings and terrors; for while they stood trembling and astonished before their Judge, without any expedient from which they could gather hope, then God offered them an encouragement, and told them of his designs of mercy through a Saviour, before he passed the sentence against them.

But it is certain that in their children, the great Captain of salvation manifested his power to save to the uttermost. In the instance of righteous Abel, we hear of the first ransomed sinner who went to heaven through Christ's redemption. In him the gospel thus wrought its perfect work. In him the angels first acted as ministering spirits to bring a lost soul to glory. And in him the holy inhabitants of heaven had the first opportunity to behold one of this fallen, ruined race, brought to the enjoyment of heavenly glory. Thus, while they saw the first effect of the full operation of the gospel, and could sing worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive honour, and glory, and blessing, he first experienced this operation of redeeming love, and first raised in heaven that song of experience to him who had loved him, and given himself for him, and redeemed him from misery and death, and had made him a king and priest unto God for ever. By faith Abel had accepted the promises which God had given unto man; and offering, in this faith, a sacrifice which was indeed excellent and acceptable, he obtained witness that he was righteous; and by this instance of a living and sufficient faith, "he being dead, yet speaketh."

By Enoch, God was pleased again with great clearness to testify the coming of the Lord to establish the kingdom which was committed to him upon the earth. "The Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all." This may refer to any particular coming of Christ, and it cannot reasonably be confined to any one. But it speaks generally of his coming in the power and glory of his kingdom, and is fulfilled, both in his first coming to set up his kingdom on the earth, and his second coming to finish the salvation of his people and the destruction of his enemies. The coming of the Lord God of Israel to visit and redeem his people, and to place his enemies under his feet, forms the whole matter of the gospel. To this the faith of Enoch was directed; and while he prophesied of it to the men of his generation, he embraced it as the hope and comfort of his own soul. By faith in this appointed Mediator, he was translated that he should not see death; and was not, for God took him.

Noah also became a preacher of righteousness, and by the Spirit of Christ, preached to those whose souls were in captivity and bondage to the power of sin. The righteousness which he preached, and of which he became an heir, was the righteousness of faith, or the righteousness of the Mediator embraced by faith. With him God renewed his covenant of grace, and gave him a promise of peculiar blessings in the posterity of Shem. God accepted the sacrifice which he offered, and established with him and his seed after him, that everlasting covenant in all things well ordered and sure.

By faith in this one Mediator, who was to be peculiarly the seed of the woman, and by whose sacrifice a real satisfaction would be made for sin, and by whose obedience a perfect righteousness would be provided as an object of faith, all, from Adam downwards, who were saved at all, obtained redemption. To them, in every generation, the gospel was preached; and the great fact, which forms the gospel, the incarnation and sufferings of the Son of God, was held out to them as the one grand object of their faith. By this faith all the elders or patriarchs who were redeemed, have obtained a good report, and transmitted a name to posterity which is honourable to God, and honourable to themselves. This faith in the divine promise of a Saviour, was to them the substance of every thing they hoped for, and the sufficient evidence of their truth, although they were things not seen. Since the world began, God hath spoken to men by his holy prophets of the coming of the Redeemer, who is all our joy and all our salvation.

After we have thus traced the publication of the gospel from Adam down to Abraham, there will be no difficulty in understanding and acknowledging its clear and full revelation to him. The apostle Paul says, that God preached the gospel unto Abraham, in that gracious promise, "In thee shall all nations of the earth be blessed." The single object for which Abraham was called, and for which his family were separated from all others was, that the promised Saviour might be made a more particular object of faith, as coming from him. To him, in a new and more specific manner, the covenant of grace was revealed; and the rite of circumcision was instituted as the outward sign of that covenant established with his family. To former patriarchs God had preached the gospel in proclaiming a Saviour who was to come as the sinner's only hope. To Abraham he preached the same gospel yet more clearly, in promising a Saviour to come from his posterity. The glad tidings of a sufficient Mediator were clearly made known to him; and his faith in the promises of the gospel was so established and entire, that our Saviour says of him "he saw my day, and was glad." By faith in a coming Redeemer he was justified and saved. And the faith which he had in Christ, the sure confidence with which he relied upon his mediation and offering, are repeatedly adduced in the New Testament, as illustrating the faith with which we are required to embrace a Saviour who has finished the work which was given him to do, and has gone to the glory which he had before the world was.

To Isaac the covenant of God's mercy was renewed, and the promised Saviour foretold, as coming from his posterity; and to Jacob, still more clearly, was the gospel preached, while Esau and his family were rejected. In the ladder which was presented to Jacob, as connecting together earth and heaven by the ministration of angels, an incarnate Saviour was offered to his faith. An open way of salvation was thus exhibited to him in vision, while in the very time of the exhibition, God renewed that gracious promise of a Redeemer from his seed, upon which the faith of his fathers had rested.

Another most remarkable proclamation of the manifestation of God in the flesh for man's salvation, was given to Jacob, in his wrestling with God and prevailing in the contest, after his return from Padan Aram. Here was a representation to his faith of the whole scene of Christ's humiliation; God was shown to him as dwelling indeed upon the earth, and subjecting himself to the power of his creatures; and the all-important fact, that there was a way in which man might prevail with God and obtain a blessing, was established in his mind. So frequently had the covenant of promise been renewed and confirmed with Jacob, that his faith rested upon a Saviour with remarkable distinctness and comfort. And when upon his bed of death, he left his last blessing to his sons, the most precious and desirable of all blessings, a Saviour from sin, he bequeathed to them also. One of the clearest predictions of the time, and the success of the publication of the gospel, which the Old Testament contains, is in the last blessing of Jacob to his son Judah.

To Adam, the promise of a Saviour was given in the general expression, "the seed of the woman." To Noah it was annexed to the descendants of Shem. To Abraham it was limited to his posterity by Isaac. To Isaac it was confined again to Jacob; and when by Jacob it was transmitted to his children, the descendants of Judah were selected as those from whom the Christ should come. Judah was to be the ruler of Israel in the person of David and his successors on the throne. And "the sceptre shall not depart from Judah," said the dying Jacob, "nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and to him shall the gathering of the people be." Thus the light of the gospel shone more brightly in every succeeding age, as the time drew nearer in which all its promises were to be fulfilled, and its covenanted Mediator was to be manifested among men.

After this period it is hardly necessary to trace the history of the gospel. From the time of Moses the whole scriptures are full of the revelations of gospel mercy. Every sacrifice in the tabernacle or temple; every type of the Jewish institutions; every prophecy and promise of succeeding generations preached Christ to the faith of men. The wonderful visit for the purpose of redemption, which the Lord God of Israel was to make to the earth, in the fulness of his appointed time, was unceasingly proclaimed. The tide of prophecy swells from age to age, until in the time of Isaiah, it has grown into an unlimited flood; and the gospel is hardly preached with more clearness and power by St. Paul than by him. From the beginning of the world Jesus was made the one great object of faith; and the predictions of his character and office are multiplied until his time and place of birth, his miracles and instructions, his sufferings and the manner of his death, his resurrection and subsequent ascension to glory, are spoken of so particularly and so minutely, that the language of the later prophets, appears to be rather a history of what is past, than a prophecy of what is yet to come.

From this history of the gospel, you see that the sinner's ground of hope has been the same from the beginning of the world. The same Jesus who is preached to you for your acceptance, was preached to men from Adam down to Moses, and from Moses to the day in which we live. No child of man has ever passed into the heavens but through his redemption. His offering was equally availing and prevalent for Adam and Abel and ourselves. By his own obedience no man has ever found acceptance before God. But the same Almighty grace which has rescued the believing sinners in this congregation, brought the first ransomed sinner to glory, and every other one since his time. We offer no new commandment unto you, but that commandment which has been from the beginning, that you should believe on him who has been set up from everlasting, as the one Mediator between God and man, in whose blood alone there is redemption for your souls, even the forgiveness of your sins.

How elevated is the view which this subject presents of the character of Christ! His love how wonderful, that interposed for man in the moment of his transgression, when there was no arm that could save, and there seemed no possibility of finding any expedient by which the apparently inevitable punishment of sin could be turned aside. How great the power which has been exercised to accomplish this work of redemption in every age. Angels who have witnessed from the beginning his labours of love, know how worthy he is to receive blessing, and honour and glory for what he has done, and they gladly unite to praise him for all his goodness and all his mercy. Unnumbered multitudes of ransomed saints in the enjoyment of the glory which he has purchased, ascribe all the praise for their redemption unto him. He is the head of all things in heaven and on earth, and all living beings live through him. To the once crucified and now exalted Jesus, the universe, which is upheld by the word of his power, unites to render its thankful homage.

How unspeakable is the privilege which this subject presents to the true believer in Jesus Christ! The least in the kingdom of heaven is united by an everlasting bond to the glorious assembly who have been redeemed through the blood of the Son of God. The Redeemer has but one church. Angels, and living saints, and dead, but one communion make. The innumerable company of angels are subjected unto him. The ransomed believers in his power, from righteous Abel down to this day, are partakers of his glory; and to this holy and heavenly assembly, the weakest believer before me is eternally united. The poorest Christian on the earth is the constant subject of angelic protection and care. And though men may despise him, the hosts of heaven delight to watch over him, to minister to his wants, to console his sorrows, to defend him from dangers, and to bring him to the salvation of which he is made an heir. How delightful is the thought that we are never alone! In all our afflictions we have a great High Priest whom angels worship; who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and remembers whereof we are made. In our seasons of bodily suffering or family distress, in our periods of earthly adversity and wants, he will be a present and all-sufficient help; when the shades of death are gathering around us: he will stand by us to alleviate our distress and to elevate our hope. He will pass with us through the dark valley that we may be in perfect peace. In the great day of judgment he will own us amidst assembled worlds, as the satisfying travail of his soul. He will proclaim to the universe that we are the jewels whom he has purchased for himself, and over whom he will rejoice for ever. He will accept us, poor and worthless as we are, freely through the value of his own blood, and crown us with everlasting glory in heaven. How unspeakable is the privilege of being united to the whole company of the redeemed, through the precious and all-sufficient offering which is published to us in the gospel; and that privilege belongs to every one before me, who has sought for refuge in the precious blood of a divine and mighty Saviour.

How amazing is the conduct of those who persevere in rejecting the mercies which this gospel presents to universal acceptance! With what unutterable joy Adam must have heard of a hope of returning peace! With what transport Abel must have taken possession of that home of glory to which he was carried so suddenly from the trials of the world! And why should any of you who need a Saviour as much as they, and to whom the blessings of redemption are as freely offered as they were to them, take upon yourselves the voluntary and persevering rejection of all that Christ has done in your behalf. How much you will desire to see one of the days of the Son of man when the wish will be entirely vain! It is a fact with the unconverted sinner, despise the assertion of it as he will, that the hour will come, when, trembling and astonished, he will crouch before the Son of man, and beg and cry for the mercy which he has so often cast heedlessly away from him. How amazing is it that the man who knows that death, and judgment and eternity are spread before him, should be willing to throw away a hope, the sufficiency of which he acknowledges, while he has nothing to supply its place upon which he dare trust himself. And yet this is the conduct of every unconverted soul before me. There is not a man here, destitute of spiritual religion, but is rejecting what he knows to be a sufficient hope, while the rejection of this hope leaves his soul utterly without comfort and peace. How amazing in the sight of angels must be this course. They wondered when mercy was proposed to man. They must wonder still more when this mercy is again offered, after it has been rejected. They must wonder most of all, if sinners still persevere in this rejection, and finally determine to choose darkness rather than light.

LECTURE XIII.

THE WISDOM OF THE GOSPEL.

We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world unto our glory.—1 Cor. ii. 7.

The object which the gospel is to attain, the way in which it is to attain it, and the history of its attainment of this object in past ages, have occupied our attention in three former discourses. I wish now to speak of the several characteristics of the gospel itself, as a dispensation of divine grace and mercy to man; to show its unsearchable wisdom, as an expedient for man's salvation; its almighty power as an instrument for the accomplishment of this end; the grace and love which is displayed in the gift which it offers unto man, and its excellency and glory, as a revelation of the character and purposes of God in his relation to fallen man.

My present subject is the unsearchable wisdom of the gospel, as an expedient or plan for man's salvation.

The text which I have selected contains St. Paul's description of this wisdom, as proclaimed by him and his fellow apostles. When he carried the gospel of Jesus to the enlightened and philosophical inhabitants of Corinth, he was aware that they sought after wisdom, and expected him to develope to them some new scheme of philosophy which should furnish matter for their own speculations. In opposition to this desire of theirs, he professes to them the single determination with which he came to them, which was to make known to perishing transgressors, Jesus Christ, and him crucified, as the only foundation for hope or acceptance before God.

This preaching rejected all the enticing words of man's wisdom; all the false and delusive words of persuasion with which other teachers were accustomed to come to them, and depended for its whole success upon the demonstration of the Divine Spirit and the power of God. He did not attempt to flatter them upon their own powers of understanding, nor to submit to the decisions of their natural and darkened reasons, the truths which he was sent to teach. He told them of their sins and dangers, and he held out to them freely the remedy which divine grace had provided for their wants. Such preaching, which dealt only with men as poor and depraved creatures, which addressed them from an eminence of authority, as those who were lost, was regarded by them as foolishness, and their proud hearts despised him for the bold assertions which he made of man's necessity and God's abundant mercy.

But though he has often adopted their own scornful expression, and called the preaching of the cross of Jesus foolishness, he denies that such was really the character of his preaching. "We speak wisdom," he says, "among them that are perfect," or able to understand us, "yet, not the wisdom of this world;" no wisdom of man's discovery. "But we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery; the wisdom which has been hidden, but which God ordained before the world to our glory."

The apostle here, as in many other places, calls the gospel the "wisdom of God." He describes it as wisdom which reveals such things as eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived; as wisdom which is revealed to man solely by the Spirit of God; the Spirit which searcheth all things, even the deep things of God, and which the natural or unrenewed man cannot discern or understand.

"We speak," he says, "in preaching the gospel, the wisdom of God."

This display of Divine Wisdom, which the gospel makes, has before been "hidden in a mystery." It was not clearly revealed until the preaching of Jesus brought life and immortality to light. It was concealed in the types of the Jewish religion, and in the predictions of the Jewish prophets; and so hidden in the mysterious representations of the Old Testament, that none of the princes or wise men of this world knew it, but in their ignorance of it, crucified the Lord of glory.

But although the wisdom displayed in the gospel was hidden in a mystery before its full and perfect revelation, in the coming and sacrifice of the Lord Jesus, it was wisdom ordained before the foundation of the world. The whole plan of bringing from among men many sons to glory, through the sufferings of the Captain of their salvation, was devised and determined before the creation of man; and the gospel which Paul preached, and which we preach, is but the intelligence of that plan of mercy which God ordained then, for man, as a manifestation of the unfathomable depths of his own wisdom.

From this declaration of the apostle I derive my present subject of discourse.

The gospel displays the unsearchable wisdom of God which ordained a plan of salvation and glory for sinners before the foundation of the world, and concealed it in the mysteries of the Old Testament until he came, in whom all these mysteries were to be fulfilled and made plain.

I. The wisdom of the gospel is displayed in the extent of the difficulty which it was required to meet. In this view it may well be called the "wisdom of God in a mystery," for the extent of wisdom displayed is deeply mysterious.

In the fall and disobedience of man so many difficulties, and apparently such insurmountable difficulties were created, that all hope of his restoration would seem impossible. A holy being had become a polluted and guilty one. How should he be restored? The holy and denouncing law of God had been violated. How should the breach be made up? The majesty and faithfulness of an all-powerful God had been offended. How should it be appeased? It will be remembered that these questions were now agitated for the first time. All these difficulties had occurred in the case of the angels who had sinned; but there was no purpose to save them, and therefore there was no necessity to ask, in their case, how the difficulties should be overcome; with them sin had its perfect work, and the wages of sin was death.

In the case of man's transgression there was a previous determination to save them from the ruin in which they were involved, and the demand for wisdom was to solve the way in which it should be done.

We will suppose for a moment that it had been left to man to devise a way for his own restoration to the Divine favour, or that every created mind had been consulted by him for that end; and can you conceive that any way would have entered into the thoughts of any finite being, but an immediate and absolute pardon, by a single sovereign act of mercy? We may see many difficulties attending such an exercise of mercy; and whether it would have been at all consistent with the honour of God's character, it is utterly impossible for us to say. None but God can know what it is within the power of God to do. But we may safely say, even if we suppose such an act of mercy, under existing circumstances, possible, it was not the way which would the most highly honour the character of God, nor was it the way which was most suited to the wants of the occasion, and therefore it was not the way which a God of infinite wisdom thought best to adopt. Indeed, while I say we may see many difficulties attending an exercise of absolute mercy, under the circumstances of man, it appears to me entirely proper to say, such an act of mercy would be impossible. God, who delights in mercy, would have spared the sufferings of an innocent and holy Saviour, had the salvation of man been possible without their endurance.

How great was the difficulty which was here presented! and what wisdom was demanded to meet the necessities of the case! Every thing in the case was new. Every path to be trodden was hitherto untried. The breach which sin had made was infinitely wide. It was an ocean over which no created intelligence could travel; and the redemption of a single soul was so important and precious, that so far as men or angels were concerned, it must have ceased forever.

To meet this infinite demand; to make up all the difficulties which the case involved, and to bring God and man together across this unmeasured alienation, was required in the gospel, and here the wisdom of the plan by which it proposes to accomplish the purpose is gloriously displayed. When all created minds acknowledged that the case was hopeless, God brought forward to the view of his creatures the hidden wisdom which he had ordained before the world.

He made the fall of man an occasion of manifesting his own glorious perfections. This was his purpose and design, and the difficulty in removing man's guilt, and restoring a ruined world to his favour, and at the same time bringing eternal glory to the character of God, was met and answered in the abundant provisions of the gospel. There is not a question to be asked in reference to man's salvation, which the gospel does not answer. It abundantly saves the sinner, and brings the highest glory to God.

The wisdom of the gospel supplies all your wants. It makes a guilty being a pardoned and justified one. It converts a polluted and defiled creature into a holy and perfect one. It satisfies all the demands and denunciations of the law. It perfectly compensates the offended faithfulness and majesty of the Creator, and restores man to God, and reconciles God to man. The difficulty which existed in the case of the first transgressor remains in the case of every other sinner to be converted unto God; and the wisdom of the gospel as an expedient of salvation, is displayed in meeting and supplying this amazing difficulty whenever a sinner is brought home to God.

II. The wisdom of the gospel is displayed in the manner in which it glorifies all the divine attributes. While it manifests abundant mercy on the part of the Great Creator in his dealings with his creatures, it does not in the least degree compromise any other of his perfections in the exercise of mercy. If you will conceive of the relation in which man, as a sinful being, stood towards God, you will see how all the attributes of the divine character were at war with him. God had given him a law in the hour of his creation, and had bound that law upon him in the most solemn manner. He had voluntarily and unnecessarily broken that law, and now, in the presence of all beings, the Creator and his creature were at variance, as it were, in an awful contest, whether the Creator should be true to his word, in the punishment and destruction of the creature, or the creature should triumph in his rebellion over the instability of his God. Angels stopped to witness the result. Fallen spirits watched the progress of this conflict; and there seemed to depend upon the issue the one momentous question, shall God be the ruler of his creatures or no?

The holiness of God was called to express its abhorrence of sin, as it had done before. The justice of God was called to execute immediate vengeance on those who had committed sin, as it had done upon Lucifer and his host. The truth of God was called to fulfil the threatenings which had been denounced against sin; and yet, amidst all these difficulties, God so loved the world that he had determined the whole of men should not perish, but some of them should have everlasting life.

If the transgressor should receive an immediate and unconditional pardon, how should the holiness of God be displayed, or his justice honoured, or his truth preserved inviolate? Shall all these glorious attributes be despised and passed over utterly unheeded? The character of God is glorious, and must be glorified in the salvation of man; but how it should be so glorified, the wisdom of men and angels could never determine. No means had been provided for the restoration of fallen angels, and no angel could tell what means should be provided for the restoration of fallen man.

The attributes of God evidently required the punishment of sin. If the idea of a substitute had entered into any created mind, the difficulty was at once seen, how can an innocent being be punished for the guilty? Can God accept a substitute? Can it be imagined that he would inflict, with his own hand, sufferings belonging to the guilty upon one without sin?

Here the gospel displays its wisdom. It announces a substitute for the sinner. It exhibits the whole system under which this substitute was offered and accepted.

But if only the fact that a substitute would be accepted had been suggested, all creatures might ask, where shall one be found who can bear the punishment deserved by the millions of mankind? Were all the angels in heaven able to render such a service to mankind? Could any one less than the living God himself undertake such a work? Could it be conceived possible that God should be willing to do this for creatures who had trampled upon his laws? and if he were willing, how could it be done? How shall God endure sufferings for man? How shall any thing which he thus does be put to man's account? and if God were willing to become man, and to put himself in the place of man, and do and suffer what man was bound to do and suffer, how could it consist with the holiness and justice of God, to let the innocent suffer and the guilty go free? yea, to let the innocent suffer, that the guilty might go free?

The more we enter into the consideration of these things, and contemplate all the difficulties which the holy attributes of God inevitably threw in the way of man's recovery, and the impossibility that any created wisdom should devise a way in which they could be reconciled, we see the wisdom of the gospel the more wonderfully displayed. Here divine wisdom interposes; here the wisdom ordained in the councils of the Eternal Trinity, before the world began, is exhibited; and the intelligence of God's own determination unravels every obscurity and doubt, and throws new and infinite honour upon his own character.

Behold this glorious plan. God's co-equal, co-eternal Son, shall undertake for us. A body shall be given him. In the fulness of the time before appointed, he shall be born as man; as the substitute and surety for our souls, he shall bear our burden of sins in his own sacred body upon the cross. By his own obedience unto death, he shall work out an everlasting righteousness commensurate with the utmost claims of the law for all who believe. Thus every attribute of God shall be honoured, and God shall be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Christ Jesus.

Contemplate this "wisdom of God in a mystery." A mediator! That mediator God; that God man! That Deity incarnate, suffering! Those sufferings borne in the stead of man! His whole obedience, too, accepted for sinful man, and imputed unto him! Sinners by this rescued and reconciled to God. Sinners so reconciled, restored to the divine image, approved of God, justified before the assembled universe, exalted to the thrones of endless glory! and all this in perfect consistency with the honour of God; yea, glorifying in the highest degree, the divine perfections! This is God's plan for the salvation of a ruined world. This is the intelligence which the gospel brings. Surely in the contemplation of it we can only exclaim with the apostle, "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God; how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" And with him also, we may declare in reference to all who are ignorant of this wisdom, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard; neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." Would to God we could all say also with him, "God hath revealed them unto us by his spirit, that we might know the things which are freely given to us of God."

III. The wisdom of the gospel is displayed in its perfect adaptation to the accomplishment of the great purpose which it designs. The mark of true wisdom is in the best arrangement of means to obtain a desired end. The great object of the gospel is to seek and to save that which is lost, to convert sinners unto God, to make a time of restitution throughout the world, in which God shall return to bless his creatures, and men shall return to submit themselves to God. It operates upon a lost and ruined world; and from it, it wishes to bring many sons unto glory.

Its wisdom is manifested in its being perfectly adapted to accomplish this whole end.

The provisions of the gospel are the evidence and fruit of God's reconciliation to man. The one great offering for sin which it presents has made up every breach, has taken away every obstacle, has opened to the sinner a path of glory and blessedness. God is able to forgive and save every transgressor on earth in consistence with his own honour; and therefore as our last head showed, so far as he is concerned, the wisdom of the gospel is proclaimed in his acknowledgment that it is sufficient, and that he is willing that all should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth.

But man is yet alienated, and must be brought home to God; and the gospel shows the wisdom of its plan in its perfect adaptation to the great end of converting him. The great fact of the gospel, the incarnation and sufferings of a glorious Saviour, is the one great instrument of good to the rebel sinner; and the continued exhibition of this one great fact is the means, and the only means, of bringing back to God the hearts of his creatures.

Take the instance of the individual sinner converted unto God, and what has produced the effect upon him which is so manifest?

He was dead in his sins; cold, heartless and unconcerned. The one object, then, was to rouse him to reflection, and to produce a true sorrow for sin in his heart. But what could do it? No remonstrance of moral precepts, no appeal to the dominion of reason, no arguments founded upon his own ability to rise. No. Had these been all the instruments employed, he would have remained eternally, as multitudes do under such instruments, a dead and ruined sinner. But he heard of a crucified Jesus. He was made to look upon him whom he had pierced. He saw an agony and bloody sweat drawn out by his transgression. His conscience felt and owned the guilt. A crucified Jesus! This planted thorns in his pillow; this made him water his couch with his tears; this agitated his breast with grief and anxiety. The preaching of the gospel, the exhibition of the great fact of the gospel, convicted him of sin; ingratitude to a Saviour, contempt of his blood, neglect of a soul for which he died, filled him with anguish, and compelled him to ask forgiveness from him who had borne his sins and carried his iniquities. In this effect the wisdom of the gospel was displayed. It awakened and convinced a sinner who could resist every thing but this one instrument of God. It brought down into the dust of humiliation, a rebel who could harden himself against every other instrument and power, who could mock at all other solicitations as the horse mocketh at the battle.

When this rebel was awakened, convinced and made to cry out in the bitterness of his anguish, the next object was to elevate his affections to God, to bind him eternally to a Saviour, and to save him from going back to the captivity of Satan; but no instrument could do it save the same gospel. The same great fact which had aroused him, gave him peace. It was not the moral or natural perfections of the Deity; it was not the beauty of his service nor the holiness of his habitation that bound his heart to heaven, and led him to seek the inheritance of the saints in light. It was a bleeding Lamb, a suffering Emanuel, a Redeemer crowned with thorns, that took away the anguish of conviction, gave him peace in believing, and filled his soul with love to God. He was made alive by receiving Christ to live in him. He was brought to glorify God in his body and spirit, which were his, by feeling that he was bought with a price, and that Jesus had died for him. The life he now lives is sustained by the gospel alone; and being made one with Christ, through a cordial acceptance of his salvation, he brings forth fruit of holiness unto God.

This has been the one course of proceeding from the beginning; and millions of rebellious beings have been awakened, convicted and bound in an everlasting covenant to God, by the operation of this single instrument of good. Here the gospel has displayed its wisdom, and God has been infinitely honoured in the operation of this plan.

This is not the wisdom of this world. It appears to be foolishness in the carnal eye. Unconverted men can see no beauty in Jesus, no reason in the simple preaching of what he has done, no connexion between this and any change to be accomplished in the human character. In their proud language it is unphilosophical and absurd. But in spite of all their objections, and contentions, and pride, it does produce the effect desired when nothing else can do it; and thus shows itself to be the wisdom of God, though from the men of this world it is hidden in a mystery.

The apostles went out to tell the simple fact of the crucifixion and exaltation of the Son of God for the salvation of sinners; and though all the wise men derided them, their preaching made multitudes cry out together, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" and added multitudes to the church who should be saved. They feared no repetition; they expected no weariness; they provided for no love of change; they ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus Christ, and God confirmed his word every where by its glorious results. We have the same gospel, and it still produces the same effect. Though disputers of this world still deride, the more exclusively and entirely we preach Jesus Christ, the more abundant are the effects upon the hearts and characters of men. When we are willing to trust God's wisdom and to throw ourselves altogether upon the great fact of the gospel, to preach, not ourselves, but Jesus Christ the Lord, we are blessed; sinners are awakened and converted, and God is honoured in spite of all the exclamations of proud and captious men: "How can these things be?"

The gospel is the only possible instrument for this end. There is no sinner converted but by its power; and the wisdom of God is thus unceasingly displayed. Every song in heaven, and every true prayer and thanksgiving upon earth, unites to utter the same truth; we are washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb; and mysterious as this wisdom is to the princes of this world, it is wisdom ordained before the world to our glory.

These three views display the wisdom of the gospel as an expedient for man's salvation; the difficulty which it meets, the glory which it brings to God, and its adaptation to produce the end which it designs: "We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world to our glory."

How vain are the objections which men make to the system of grace and salvation! This is God's plan. It is marked with the wisdom of his character. It has glorified him, in an amazing degree, in the effect which it has produced throughout the world. Though many of you may see no reason in this system, and may persuade yourselves to believe that there is something in it which is contrary to your reason, rest assured, if you will throw yourselves with faith upon it, you will find it to be the power of God unto salvation to your souls. You have not a want which it will not supply. It will meet your whole necessities. It will abundantly answer your prayers.

This is the true and proper test of the fitness and wisdom of the gospel; the test of experience. Try this system. Taste and see that the Lord is gracious. To this point would I lead your affections and plans. I cannot stop to argue about the externals of this plan before the tribunal of man's wisdom. You may be speculatively believers, while you are practically unbelievers. You can know nothing of the wisdom or the fitness of the gospel, unless you are willing to receive it and try it under the shape in which it comes to you as a remedy for your diseased and ruined souls. If you are willing to be convinced of your necessities; if you are ready to acknowledge that you have deep and fatal spiritual wants, and are willing to lay yourselves down as a free offering to a crucified Saviour, this gospel will tell you all you can desire to know, and give you all you can need to possess.

Your purblind reasons may urge a thousand questions which God has not answered, and which man cannot answer, about this heavenly system; and you may be persuaded to say, I cannot accept it because I cannot understand it. This is no fair or accurate test of any remedy for evil. Go with a deep conviction that you are guilty, and deserve condemnation; that you are ruined, and have no help. Go with a penitent and sorrowful spirit, in remembrance of your sin, looking upon the load you have heaped upon a dying friend. Go with the language of unfeigned humiliation, with a sincere desire to obtain pardon and peace in the relation between your soul and God. Go thus to the feet of Jesus, and ask for the remedy which he bestows. If, then, you are sent back empty, if you find that the gospel can do nothing for you, that your load of guilt is unremoved, and your souls have no peace with God, then may you, with much greater show of reason, pronounce upon the unfitness of the gospel to answer your necessity. But until you have tried and found the trial vain, you cannot, with the least propriety, urge a single objection to the terms and operation of the gospel.

Are you willing to make this trial? Are you ready to test, by experience, the sufficiency of Christ? He invites you; he advises you; he warns you; he encourages you; he intreats you all to submit your wills, your desires, your characters, to him; and by his Spirit he will enable you to know and understand the things which are freely given you of God; and this acceptance of the gospel shall furnish you a salvation that can be obtained by no other instrument or method.

LECTURE XIV.

THE POWER OF THE GOSPEL TO SAVE.

It is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth.—Romans i. 16.

This is the reason which the apostle gives why he was not ashamed of the gospel of Jesus. Of an instrument of such power and so much good among men, he might well glory wherever he went.

In the eyes of the self-righteous Jews the gospel of Jesus was a stumbling-block, because it allowed nothing to human merit. And with the conceited Greeks it was accounted foolishness, because it paid no deference to the arrogant claims of human reason. But, notwithstanding it was inconceivable to those who confided in their own wisdom, that the salvation of man should be effected by any means apparently so unsuited to the end, St. Paul hesitated not to affirm, in the face of all opposition, that the gospel would be powerful for the production of the end which was intended, that it would operate as the power of God unto salvation to every one who believed.

The power of the gospel as an instrument of salvation, is the subject which I desire to present to your attention at this time.

It may be regarded under the two aspects of the power which is exercised for us, in the personal work of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the power which is exercised in us, by the operations of the Holy Spirit.

I. Consider the gospel as the great instrument of salvation in what it does for us.

The law held us in bondage, kept us under condemnation, bound us over to endure the everlasting wages of sin. This bondage the gospel has broken; it has released us from all condemnation; it has provided a sacrifice which can answer every claim of the law, and given a new and glorious hope to those who were without hope. In the obedience which Jesus has rendered to its precepts, and the satisfaction which he has made to its penalties, the law has been silenced in every demand, and the power of the gospel for salvation has been exhibited. And under the gospel, by this work of the Redeemer, as our substitute, God can exercise mercy to those whom the law has condemned, without setting aside, in any degree, the authority or sanctions of his law.

Again, Satan held us in captivity; we were under the power of the god of this world; and he exercised over the hearts and habits of all a ruinous dominion. From his power the gospel rescues us. The Lord Jesus has destroyed him that had the power of death. When he hung as a bleeding man upon the cross, and was to all appearance subdued and destroyed, then he triumphed over Satan and spoiled his principalities and powers, and made a show of his conquest openly. And this one fact, the death of Jesus upon the cross for sinners, has been the single great instrument by which Satan's kingdom has been demolished, and the Saviour's empire has been established throughout the world.

The power of the gospel for us is exhibited in heaven, in the accepted sufficiency of the Lord Jesus, in his prevailing intercession as our great High Priest, and in the continual crowning of the subjects of his redemption for his sake.

It is exhibited on earth in the providence which causes all things to promote the salvation of sinners; in the continual progress of truth, and its conquest over error throughout the world; in the justifying of innumerable multitudes of sinners, and giving the guilty consciences of men peace with God; in the unceasing triumphs which it accomplishes over death, and in the ransomed souls whom it brings to eternal glory.

It is exhibited in hell, in the restraint which it has put to the power of Satan; in the limits which it affixes to his designs of malice; in the subjection which it compels him to acknowledge to the Lord Jesus, as the head over all, and in the triumphs which it is attaining over him among men from day to day.

To the universe, the gospel is thus presented as the power of God for salvation in behalf of sinners. For them it has provided a satisfaction and righteousness sufficient for the whole world. For them it has opened a new and living way of salvation, abundant for their universal acceptance. For them it is daily finishing its works of grace, and adding new beings to the triumphant hosts of heaven.

This power of the gospel, as exercised for us in the offering and intercession of the Lord Jesus Christ, I pass over thus cursorily, because my chief object is to display the power of the gospel unto salvation, as exercised within us. Under this view,

II. It is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth.

When we consider the whole progress of the gospel in the world, and reflect upon the innumerable multitude of souls whom it has actually rescued from the bondage of sin by the power of the Holy Ghost, we behold the power of God more remarkably displayed in this than in all the works of creation.

We have seen the little stone cut out of the mountain without hands, as the gospel is called in the book of Daniel, grow into a mighty mountain, and establish itself in all the kingdoms of the earth. We have seen millions of sinners submitting their hearts to a doctrine, at first every where spoken against, upon the testimony of a few poor and despicable persons; to a doctrine diametrically opposite to the propensities of their own natures; involving unceasing self-denial, and the assumption of a severe and painful cross. We have seen this submission made in hope of a reward from one whom they have never seen, and in whom, if they had seen him, they would have found no beauty by a natural eye for which he should be desired; and this reward, too, whatever it might be, deferred for a long time, and offering, in the meanwhile, no ground of assurance to expect it, but a faith in his power who has promised it, and requiring a perpetual contest with persecution and suffering and death.

Having seen all this, how elevated is the view which is presented of the power of the gospel of Jesus. How many souls have been rescued from the power of that wicked adversary who leads men captive at his will! And by what means have they been delivered from its chains? Not by human eloquence or the powers of moral suasion in a single instance. Nothing but the gospel has ever emancipated a single soul, or brought one to the enjoyment of lasting peace. But this has been, in every age, quick and powerful, and sharper than a two-edged sword, and has turned thousands from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God. There have been multitudes in every age who were living witnesses of its power; who by its enlightening, comforting and sanctifying efficacy, have been created anew, and filled with joy and peace in believing.

These effects the world still beholds. It wonders at them, and is unable to account for them. They are seen wherever the gospel is faithfully administered. The simple exhibition of Christ crucified is still as truly and effectually as ever a hammer which breaks in pieces the rocks, and a mould which forms into the likeness of Christ those who are subjected to its divine influence.

Wherever you look abroad upon the Christian church, you see the power of the gospel displayed. In every year miriads are converted by its influence unto Christ; angels look with joy upon its operations, and the name and character of the Lord Jesus are glorified in its results. Extensive revivals of religion, under the simple preaching of its truth, show upon a large scale its power unto salvation.

With false systems of doctrine, all the talent and eloquence of men convert no sinner's soul, while the lifting up of a crucified Jesus, though feebly done by the talent of the preacher, is drawing all unto him. Under other preaching, religion dies, and hardly the form of godliness remains. Under the preaching of the cross, grace, mercy and peace are multiplied among men, and God confirms his word with the demonstration of his Spirit and with power.

III. The power of the gospel is displayed in that gracious operation which brings back every individual sinner to holiness and peace.

1. In the awakening and conversion of sinners, in the turning of their hearts from the power of Satan unto God, the gospel displays its power unto salvation. The natural mind of man refuses all subjection to the will of God. The strong man armed keeps his palace, and his goods are in peace. Without concern for himself, and in a determined conflict with his Creator, the sinner sets himself to oppose the grace of Jesus; and it is only as he is subdued by a power stronger than he, that his soul is spoiled of its rebellion, and renovated in love. In the accomplishment of this conversion, the gospel is mighty through God, to the pulling down of strong holds, and every imagination which exalteth itself against God. When Jesus stilled the tempest with two words, "Peace, be still," men wondered at the exhibition of his power, and exclaimed, "What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him?" The conversion of the sinner is a far greater work than the stilling of the ocean. The sea will sometimes be calm of itself; but the wicked are always "like the troubled sea when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt." To still the raging sea, and to subdue the sinner's soul into the calmness and beauty of a spiritual life, the gospel, as the word of Jesus, is the chosen instrument. It is made the savour of life unto life, and new-creates the sinner, not by the will of man or the will of the flesh, but by the power of God.

The minister of Jesus speaks in the ears of a dead man, whom no thunder could have awakened, and he rises up to give glory to God. Christ calls upon men to deny themselves, to part with their sins, which they have esteemed their ornament and subsistence; to stand at defiance with the allurements and opposition of the world, and to rejoice if they are counted worthy to suffer shame for Christ's sake, and they obey him without consulting with flesh and blood. Those affections which are bound to the earth are lifted up to heaven. That spirit which boasted in rebellion against God, yields to him with the submission of a lamb; and the same man who proudly said, "I will not have this man to reign over me; who is Lord over me?" now says, in an humble dependance upon Christ, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" This change of character and heart the gospel has accomplished; and thus, in the conversion of the transgressor, shows itself the power of God unto salvation.

2. In the free justification of the sinner before God, and giving him acceptance and peace of conscience, the gospel displays its power unto salvation. It comes to the penitent transgressor as a ministration of righteousness, as a word of reconciliation and peace. It opens the prison doors and bids the captive go free. The power of the law was great, as represented in the mighty thunderings with which it was given; but in comparison with the gospel, the law was weak, and could make nothing perfect. The power of the law was for destruction. The power of the gospel is a life-giving power. The law could only hold down the man who was down before; it could never give him life again. But the power to give life is far greater than the power to kill. The gospel is thus mighty to pass by transgressions and sins, to set at liberty the souls that are bound, and to give boldness in the presence of the King of Saints to the poor captives of Satan.

When the sinner's heart is brought under the influence of the gospel by the power of the Holy Ghost, it takes away the burden of guilt; it silences every accuser; it fills the believer with the confidence of hope; it forbids every weapon to prosper which is formed against him, and condemns every tongue which rises up in judgment against his soul. The justification which the gospel gives is a perfect and entire one. The sins of a life, however accumulated, however aggravated, are blotted out in one moment, and that for ever. A new and perfect righteousness is bestowed upon the pardoned sinner; and he stands before God, not only without a stain of guilt, but with a character as perfect, and a title to an inheritance of glory as entire, as if he had never transgressed against God.

In the justification of the believer, the gospel makes every thing sure. "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth; who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again; who is at the right hand of God for ever." And where he is his followers are also to be. In this total change in the relation of a sinner towards God, the gospel shows its power; it turns aside the edge of judgment, and rejoices in a victory over condemnation; and relieving a soul from fear, from danger, and from death, it shows itself to be the power of God unto salvation.

3. The gospel displays its power unto salvation in its progressive sanctification of those whom it has converted unto God, and justified in the righteousness of Jesus. It is the great and only instrument of making men holy. Thus the Redeemer says in his intercession to the Father, "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth." In the progressive exercise of its power to give life, it leads the converted soul every day nearer to the image of God. There is a heavenly teaching by the Holy Spirit, accompanying the word, which forms Christ in the believer's heart more perfectly; which writes upon his heart the divine law, and makes it his delight to do his will. There is here a continual exhibition of the power of the gospel. The impression upon an adamant, from a simple touch of the seal, would not be more wonderful than this transformation of an earthly and degraded soul into the divine image, by the preaching of the word of truth.

In the gospel we behold, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, and are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, by the Spirit of the Lord. The application of the great truths of the gospel to our hearts, by the power of the Spirit, destroys the temptations of sense and appetite; overcomes the allurements and terrors of the world; bruises Satan under our feet, and makes us, after the image of the Lord Jesus, holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners; and in this daily progress of our souls to God, we see new displays of the power of the gospel, and rejoice in him who, by its instrumentality, can make all grace abound in us.

4. The gospel displays its power unto salvation, in upholding and preserving those who are brought to a knowledge of its truth.

It is the great instrument of keeping every child of God through faith unto salvation. By the divine power attending its ministrations, it is able to keep us from falling, and to present us before the throne of divine glory with exceeding joy. For this it is styled an incorruptible seed; an abiding seed in the heart, and brings forth permanent and increasing fruit. It is a tree with perpetual fruit, without any variation for the difference of seasons. Like that tree which St. John saw in Paradise, which brought forth its fruit every month, of twelve different kinds. Thus Jesus promises that every branch in him which beareth fruit shall be purged and made to bring forth more fruit, and they who live in him shall have life more abundantly. This preservation of divine grace in the heart of man, is a glorious exhibition of power. It is like keeping a spark alive in the midst of the ocean, and sustaining a hope, even against hope.

The follower of Jesus is encompassed with innumerable difficulties. Many heavy loads are united in their pressure upon his soul. He must bear the weight of a wounded spirit; the sorrows of indwelling sin; the burden of a decaying body; the load of scorn and reproach from Satan and the world. But amidst all these, the gospel gives him beauty for ashes; the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. When fearfulness and trembling come upon him, and his steps are almost gone, this is his comfort in his affliction, that the word of God hath quickened him, and that God will perfect that which he hath wrought for his servant. In the midst of all his difficulties, the gospel leads the Christian not to lean upon any created strength, nor to look for the help of man, but to trust only in the word of divine promise, and to cast his whole care upon him who has begun a good work in him, and will carry it on, unto the day of the Lord Jesus.

This preserving power of the gospel is displayed in many instances through a long course of years, and in circumstances of great trial and distress. "Eighty and six years," said Polycarp upon the day of his martyrdom, "have I served Jesus of Nazareth." And what can be a more delightful testimony to the worth and power of the gospel, than that of an old man who has passed through all the sorrows of life, and at the period of gray hairs, when all the charms of earth have lost their power, can say, "I have been young and now am old, yet saw I never the righteous forsaken," to me Jesus is still precious. This testimony is given every day, and God is honoured in the power which his gospel exhibits, to sustain and preserve those who have entrusted themselves to it.

5. The gospel exhibits its power unto salvation, in the final crowning of the saints in glory. For every child of God before me, its work of grace shall be fully and eternally accomplished. As the ransomed of the Lord, they shall return to Zion, with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads. They shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away. Then, how wonderful is the display of power which has brought a child of wrath and sin to be an heir of everlasting glory! The sufferings of Jesus shall then have received their full reward. He shall be glorified in his saints, and admired in all that believe. He shall rejoice forever over the vast multitudes whom he hath redeemed and washed from their sins in his own blood. Countless armies shall assemble before him, with his mark upon their foreheads; all the fruits of his redemption, plucked out of the jaws of the lion; begotten again through his word, to the enjoyment of a lively hope, an everlasting possession, and permitted to dwell in the presence of the Lamb forever.

Then the salvation of each redeemed soul is finally accomplished, and the gospel has displayed its full and proper power in the conversion, the justifying, the sanctifying, the preserving, and the crowning every subject of the redemption of Jesus. The work in each instance has been the same. A vessel of wrath fitted for destruction has been brought to glory for the master's honour and use; and unnumbered millions who were by nature poor and miserable, and blind and naked, for whom, while they were without strength, Christ died, will be found rescued by the power of the gospel, and made to shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars, forever and ever.

This text teaches us the proper ground of hope. The power of God as promised and exercised in the gospel of Jesus. If you look upon your own characters, you find yourselves utterly weak and unworthy. All reflections upon yourselves will inevitably be of the most humiliating and painful character; and if you were compelled to receive the wages which you have earned by your own conduct, you could not sustain the load. You have nothing which you can offer unto God. There is no part of your lives which could furnish you a sufficient hope of acceptance before him, and if he should call you into judgment, it must be to condemn and destroy you. But while you are thus entirely deficient in yourselves, there is offered to you in the gospel of Jesus, a sufficient and abiding hope. There the divine power presents itself to your acceptance, as all-sufficient for your wants, and invites you to lean upon it, as a staff which can never be broken.

Will you then be persuaded to cast out all idea of trusting in yourselves; to renounce all dependence upon your own character and conduct, and to seek a righteousness beyond yourselves, in the perfect and spotless obedience of the Son of God. You are simply invited to accept the provisions of the gospel, and as Noah, believing God's word, sought refuge and protection in the ark; and as the persecuted Israelite, trusting the divine command, found a shelter in the city of refuge; so to flee to the work which the Lord Jesus has finished, and plead nothing but that for your acceptance before God. If you are convinced of your wants, and of your total inability to save yourself, and are ready to be freely justified, and freely saved by the power of Christ, every thing is ready for you. The sacrifice and obedience of Jesus have been accepted in your behalf. God is well pleased in him, and well pleased to save you, for his sake; and nothing is wanting, but that you, with a penitent and humble spirit, should receive the blessings which are so freely offered you in Christ Jesus. The gospel presents you all a foundation upon which you may securely build. Without fear or doubting you may embrace this glorious hope; and when you do embrace it in your hearts, all your guilt shall be removed, all your dangers shall pass away, and everlasting light and glory shall rest upon your souls.

Do not trust yourselves before a heart-searching God with any other ground of hope, for plead what you will, you will be inevitably condemned. When God riseth up in judgment you cannot answer him, or stand before him, but in the all-sufficient and prevailing merits of an incarnate and suffering Saviour, which have been thankfully embraced and dwelt upon by you.

You see to whom all the praise is to be given for the work of salvation. In this work man is nothing. He brings to it no strength, no merit, no claim of any kind. You are to ascribe the whole glory to that mighty Saviour who loved you, when you were dead in trespasses and sins, and interposed his power and his worthiness for you, when you were perishing, without strength and without hope. To him let your thanksgivings be every day addressed, as you are led on from strength to strength. In him let all your confidence be placed, for what he has promised to do for you, while you are passing the wilderness of life; and when you are brought to rest, in the presence of his glory, to him will you find yourselves constrained to offer all the honour and praise for what he has been pleased to undertake and finish in your behalf.

He is the great object of universal praise; all the angels of God worship him; all the spirits of just men made perfect, ascribe honour unto him; and from our hearts he asks the same tribute of thanksgiving and honour.

Give him glory before your feet stumble upon the dark mountains, and he turn the light which you look for into the shadow of death. Be wise in making him your friend while his mercies are offered you in his word, and let the power of the gospel be for you a power to save.

For reflect, I pray you, in conclusion, that the same power which the gospel has to save, it has to destroy. It increases the condemnation and misery of those who reject it, and it were far better, never to have heard its gracious invitations, than having heard them, to cast them voluntarily away. To this destroying power of the gospel, to those who reject it, Jesus refers when he says, "Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken, but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder." It has an irresistible energy. It comes with an overwhelming force upon those who have despised its mercies, and makes it better for such persons if they had never been born. This gospel must appear in the great day, as a witness for or against every child of man. It will bear testimony for all who have accepted its invitations, that justice is satisfied, and all condemnation must pass away; that the Lamb is worthy, and infinite honour and glory must be bestowed. It must witness against all who have refused its mercies, that they are without hope; the law must take its course, while their condemnation and ruin have been awfully increased, by choosing death rather than life. With a destructive weight it falls upon such, to grind them to powder, to consign them over to everlasting ruin, and to bind them in chains of eternal darkness and death.

Happy will it be, for all before me, to have this powerful gospel a witness of approbation and not of condemnation in that solemn day.

LECTURE XV.

THE GRACE OF THE GOSPEL AS A DIVINE GIFT.

The unsearchable riches of Christ.—EPHESIANS III. 8.

By this expression, I understand the unsearchable provisions of grace, which are contained in the gospel of Christ. These provisions the apostle Paul was sent to offer to the gentiles; and in the whole of his ministrations, he shows us the remarkable difference which there is between that view of the gospel which is the result of speculative examination, and that view of the gospel which has been formed from an experience of its life-giving power. The man who examines the gospel upon its exterior, sees much in it to admire, for its beauty of moral precepts, its attractive examples of personal character, and its peculiar revelations of the existence and character of God; and upon this ground he advocates and enforces the system of religion which he conceives the New Testament to contain.

The man who has experienced the power of the gospel to convert and sanctify, forgets these peculiar reasons for valuing the gospel, in his wondering admiration of it, as a system of unsearchable grace for the chief of sinners. Our minds will naturally dwell upon that aspect of this system, with the most constancy and delight, which we feel to be most suited to our individual wants; and if we have felt ourselves to be ruined sinners, and have sought the gospel as a remedy for our necessities, we shall pass over every minor characteristic, and adore the exceeding riches of grace which Almighty God has been pleased here to exhibit.

This view of the gospel occupied the thoughts and affections of the Apostle Paul. He seldom speaks of Jesus or his dispensation, except under the idea of a scheme of glorious salvation; of which, in infinite mercy, he had been made a subject, though he was before a persecutor, a blasphemer, and injurious. Paul's knowledge of the truth was the result of an experience of its power, and to the same experience he desired to bring all to whom he addressed himself, as an ambassador of Christ.

No view of the gospel is so honourable to God, or so comforting and suitable to ourselves, as this to which your attention is now to be directed: the riches of its grace as a divine gift to man. The apostle states to the Ephesians, that God especially designed, in the salvation which he had provided in the gospel, "to show in the ages to come, the exceeding riches of his grace in Christ Jesus;" and to further and promote this design, had commissioned him, though less than the least of all saints, to preach among the Gentiles "the unsearchable riches of Christ."

I have selected these words of the apostle as a text, because they show the fact, which it is my design to exhibit in this discourse, that the provisions of grace offered to sinners in the gospel, are truly unsearchable. They are adequate to supply every want; they are adapted to every circumstance and relation of man; they are sufficient for the necessities of the whole race of men.

I. The unsearchable grace of the gospel is displayed in the freeness with which it offers every blessing to man. It requires nothing to be done by us in order to merit its blessings. It never puts us upon earning an interest in the mercies which it has provided. To the utmost meaning of the terms, every blessing of the gospel is a free gift of God to man. They are as much so as the manna which was rained from heaven upon the Israelites, or the water which followed them from the rock in their wanderings through the wilderness. Under this character as free and unmerited gifts, the privileges of the gospel are presented through the whole inspired volume. The first promise of a Saviour is a remarkable illustration of this fact. That promise was not given in answer to any solicitations on the part of our first parents. They could hardly be supposed able to conceive of the possibility of such a promise. Indeed it was not literally given to them at all. It was included in the threatening which was denounced by God against the serpent who had deceived them, and not personally addressed either to Adam or Eve, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." The Saviour was thus a free gift of God, a gift unthought of by man; and every blessing which the Saviour brings is as entirely a free gift as himself. "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." The whole amount of mercies and privileges which the gospel bestows, are unclogged with any conditions. The gracious invitations which it addresses to men, are entirely unlimited in their application. "Ho! every one that thirsteth," it says upon the high places of the earth, "and he that hath no money, come buy and eat; yea, buy wine and milk without money and without price." And again, in the conclusion of its book of grace, it says again, "The spirit and the bride say come, and let him that heareth say come, and let him that is athirst come, and whosoever will, let him take of the waters of life freely."

Now here is exhibited the unsearchable riches of the gospel. It comes to creatures who can do nothing to deserve its blessings, or to acquire an interest in its glorious promises, and presents itself as perfectly suitable to their wants, by offering freely and unconditionally to their acceptance all the mercies they can desire. Fallen creatures can do nothing to restore themselves. The angels who are confined in chains of darkness can do nothing to obtain salvation from their ruin. They are utterly incapable of meriting God's favour, and we are equally so. No salvation would avail us any thing which required us to do any thing to deserve its bestowal upon us.

The whole scripture unites to caution us against the thought of earning grace: "Say not in thine heart, who shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring Christ down from above; or who shall descend into the deep? that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead. But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart; that is, the word of faith which we preach; that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe in thy heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation."

Yes, we do preach, as the Holy Ghost preaches throughout the whole Bible, that to receive every divine blessing by faith freely as it is freely offered, is the only office assigned to any child of man. After we have embraced the invitations of the gospel, we have much to do to honour and adorn it in all holy conversation and godliness; yet our first reception of its blessings must be altogether free, and we must stand indebted for them solely to the sovereign grace of God.

But while I merely say the gospel shows its riches of grace in offering every blessing freely, I say too little. St. Paul expresses the greatest jealousy upon this subject. He declares that if we attempt to do any thing, however good in itself, expecting by it, either in whole or in part, to merit our salvation, we make void the whole gospel. "Behold I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing." Salvation must be wholly of works, or wholly of grace. If salvation were of works, in ever so small a degree, there would be room for boasting; for we should have done something for ourselves. Whereas, under the gospel, boasting must be utterly excluded; and salvation from first to last must be received as a free gift of God for Christ's sake.

What unsearchable grace is this! and still more so, if you consider to whom such offers are freely made. The invitations of the gospel are presented and pressed upon the attention of beings universally depraved; beings who perversely reject all that has been done for them, who stand out to resist its gracious influence, and to fight against God until they are subdued and led captive by a power stronger than themselves. These gracious invitations of God follow these creatures through all the wanderings of their sinful lives, still pressing upon their attention the solemn call, "Turn ye, for why will ye die." The gospel of Jesus, in the tenderness of its compassion, literally persecutes the sinner with its entreaties that he would be saved. It will not give him up. It is like a rich and noble prince who follows a mendicant up and down, beseeching him to accept the assistance which he offers; and thus freely offering, and perseveringly offering, unsearchable riches to sinners who could deserve nothing, who despise and reject the mercies which are presented, and weary the patience of the Most High with their perverseness, the gospel displays its unspeakable grace as a gift of God to those who are really perishing in their sins.

II. The unsearchable grace of the gospel as a divine gift, is displayed in the full and perfect manner in which it communicates its blessings to man. There is not a want in the sinner which it does not abundantly supply. Are we by nature wretched and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked? It gives us, without money or price, gold tried in the fire, that we may be rich; and white raiment to cover us, that the shame of our nakedness may not appear; and it anoints our eyes with eye-salve, that we may see. It fills the hungry with good things, and exalts those of low degree. How beautifully, and in what lively colours, is this fulness of gospel provisions exhibited by the Spirit of God, speaking through the prophet Isaiah in that passage which our blessed Lord applied to himself in the first public discourse which he ever delivered: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn; to appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness, that they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified."

Now this passage precisely illustrates the aspect of gospel grace, which is before your minds, the fulness with which it supplies every want of man; because it takes a view of mankind in a vast variety of conditions, in every stage of sorrow and distress, and represents the gospel as adapting itself to every different state, and as supplying every want under which men are suffering.

Look then upon the fulness of these provisions; conceive of miserable man in every condition in which he can be imagined; conceive of him bowed down with a sense of guilt, or harassed with the temptations of Satan, or sinking under persecutions from men, or under the hidings of God's favour, or in the prospect of immediate dissolution; and in every condition the gospel presents him with all that he can want: pardon for all sin, strength against every temptation, support under every trial, comfort under every affliction, and life everlasting by the simple exercise of faith in Jesus, as life was given to the dying Israelite by looking upon the brazen serpent. If there were a possible situation for which the gospel would not yield a supply, if there were a single thing which it required us to furnish from our own store, it would display no unsearchable riches of grace, nor would it be adapted to our necessities.

When the Israelites wandered in the wilderness, if they had been provided with bread and water, but had been left to their own guidance, or no miracle had been wrought to preserve their clothes, or to keep their feet from the effect of long and wearisome toil, how evident is it that the want of any one blessing would have rendered all the others nugatory and useless. God must supply all their wants, for they had no ability to supply one themselves. Just so is it with us. Should the gospel leave a single necessity unsatisfied, all its other provisions, however rich and abundant, would be in vain. Go, for instance, to the bedside of a dying sinner, and say, "You must render such and such services to the Lord before you can be accepted by him," what hope or comfort would such tidings inspire? How cruelly would such a message mock the anguish of a man who feels that he can do nothing; who is conscious that he is sinking into perdition, and must be plucked by some powerful arm from the gulf which stretches beneath his soul! But tell him, or any other sinner, that "Christ died for the chief of sinners; that those who come to him he will in no wise cast out; that sins like scarlet may be made as white as snow; that there is a fountain which cleanseth from all sin;" and you offer hope and comfort which are entirely abundant; you present a foundation upon which the soul may build without fear, and may see a sinner made a precious jewel in the Redeemer's crown for ever.

Thanks be to God! there is not a desirable blessing for man which the gospel does not impart to us in our hour of need. Pardon, peace, holiness and joy, are all offered freely, and bestowed abundantly for the Redeemer's sake. We find all fulness to dwell in Jesus Christ. He is made our wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption; and receiving from him grace upon grace, we stand complete in him. When our hearts have embraced his sufficiency, we are rich, we are full; we drink of a fountain which destroys all thirst for every other one, and have no disposition to go from him to draw elsewhere. Jesus is all in all, an answer to every accusation, a remedy for every evil, a supply for every necessity, an eternal antidote to despair. In him we have life abundantly, and feel assured in the hope of treasures passing man's understanding, which he has laid up for us.

In this wonderful fulness of supply, the gospel displays riches of grace truly unsearchable; for ages have past, and no want has ever been found which it could not answer; and the Christian must still exclaim at the close of the longest experience of its power, "O the length and breadth, and height and depth of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge! How unsearchable! how past finding out!"

III. The unsearchable grace of the gospel is exhibited in the perfect security with which it bestows its mercies upon the sinner. The cordial embracing of the invitations of the gospel finally secures to every believer the everlasting possession of its inestimable blessings. The gospel offers us salvation with all its attendant benefits, as the matter of an everlasting covenant, in all things well ordered and sure, confirmed to those who truly believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. It represents that covenant as confirmed by God himself with an oath, in order that by two immutable things (that is, the certain faithfulness of divine promise and the additional solemnity of a divine oath), in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have strong consolation, who have fled for refuge, to lay hold of the hope set before us. It represents the Lord Jesus Christ as the mediator of that covenant, and all its blessings as treasured up in him for our everlasting benefit. It states these blessings to be treasured up in him, that they may be made finally secure; because if they were entrusted to the mutability and perverseness of our wills, they would be inevitably lost.

The statements of the scripture upon this treasuring up of a believer's hopes in Christ, and their infallible security, as laid up in him, are remarkably strong and expressive. The Lord Jesus Christ is said to live in the believer, and the believer to have died with him. "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." If this be our character, and Christ lives by his spiritual presence and influence in our hearts, while Christ lives we shall live also. But the apostle speaks in yet stronger language in another place, addressing himself to the Colossian Christians, "Ye are dead;" i. e. to the world and the flesh, "and your life is hid with Christ in God; when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Here Christ is not only called our life, but our life is said to be "hid with Christ in God;" and because it is so, we may hope that when he shall appear, we shall also appear with him in glory.

Let us examine, for a moment, the real meaning of these words.

When God first made man, he committed the life of the whole family to Adam as their head and representative, that they might stand or fall in him; but, notwithstanding Adam was made perfect, and had but a single restraint imposed upon him as a test of his fidelity, he fell; and by this one apostacy brought death and ruin upon his whole posterity. Now, in restoring men to his favour under the gracious system of the gospel, God says, "I will not commit your eternal interests into your own hands; if I do, so weak are you, so encompassed with temptations, so prone to disobedience, what can I hope but that you will cast them all away and perish. I will give you another covenant representative and head, even my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, and commit all your interests to him. He shall be your hope. He shall be your life. Your life shall be hid with Christ in God; then shall I be sure that no enemy shall prevail against you, for he is mighty to save, and none can pluck you out of his hands."

This I believe to be the true meaning of the passage referred to.

But this full and final security of a believer's hopes does not depend upon any single passage of the scriptures. I consider it the statement of the whole scriptures, and inseparably connected with the gospel as a system of unsearchable grace. Every truly believing soul is given into the hands of the Redeemer, that he may keep it by his own power, "through faith unto salvation." In his intercession to the Father, recorded in the 17th of John, he affirms, that of those who had been given to him, he had lost none; that they had kept his word, and he had bestowed eternal life upon them, according to the divine covenant.

St. Paul, in addressing the Philippians, was confident that he who had begun a good work in them would carry it on unto the day of the Lord Jesus. He knew that the same Lord would be the finisher who had been the author of every true faith; and from this confidence he pressed upon every believing soul the assurance that the Lord would never leave or forsake them, so that they might boldly say, "The Lord is my helper, I will not fear what man can do unto me;" and all might trust that what God had promised he was able also to perform.

This security which the gospel offers to every sinner who flees to it for refuge, gloriously exhibits its unsearchable riches of grace. It gives us an inestimable hope. It assures us that if we are ready to commit ourselves to Jesus "he is able to keep us from falling, and to present us before the throne of his glory with exceeding joy." It bids us be careful for nothing, but live the life we now live in the flesh, by faith in the Son of God, "who loved us and gave himself for us," to know and remember in whom we have believed, and to be assured that he is able to keep that which we have committed to him unto that day, and to preserve us blameless unto his heavenly kingdom.

Thus are the unsearchable riches of gospel grace displayed. It offers with the utmost freedom to every sinner, all the privileges and mercies which the Lord Jesus Christ hath purchased. If he is willing freely to accept them, it bestows upon him fully and perfectly a covenant title to salvation, and all things which accompany salvation; it communicates every holy habit and grace, and enables him to walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing; makes him humble, and watchful, and persevering; and to show its ability to save unto the uttermost, it secures to him finally and unalterably, the blessings which it has freely promised, and for the enjoyment of which it has fully prepared him.

These unsearchable riches of grace I desire with my whole heart and strength to press upon your acceptance. I would have you experience in your souls the worth, the unspeakable worth of the gospel of Jesus, and be able to comprehend with all saints, that love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that your souls may be filled with the fulness of God. These provisions of the gospel are sufficient for you all. They are perfectly sufficient for the comfort, the holiness and the full salvation of every soul in this assembly.

They are sufficient for your comfort. If there be any of you brought by a view of their own sinfulness to the very borders of despair, what can they need more than to hear that God himself has undertaken their cause, has assumed their nature, and expiated their guilt by his own sufferings unto death? What could they wish to add to this? What can, by any possibility, be added to it? If this be not sufficient, what can be? Your sins, though they were more and more aggravated than those of any human being, are but finite still; they are many, but they may be numbered. The atonement which is offered for you, and the righteousness which is wrought out for you are of value infinite. The blood of Jesus Christ will cleanse from all sin, and all who believe in him will be justified from all things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses. Let a man's sins be of ever so deep a die, they cannot be more red than scarlet and crimson, and these can be made as white as snow. We can hardly conceive of greater guilt than David's, after all the mercies which he had received; and yet he prays, and prays with success, "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow;" and then he acknowledges the abundant efficacy of the remedy. "Thou hast made the bones which thou hast broken to rejoice." What abundant instances the history of the church has given of the sufficiency of the gospel for the sinner's comfort. Behold three thousand Jews on the day of Pentecost, whose hands were yet stained with a Saviour's blood—scarcely one hour had they believed in this crucified Lord, before they "all ate their bread with gladness and singleness of heart, blessing and praising God." Thus, wherever Christ is preached and received, true joy springs up in the heart. "Though we see him not, yet believing in him, we may rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." This is, and is to be, the invariable effect of a proper acceptance of the gospel throughout the earth. "Sing, O ye heavens," says the prophet, in looking forward to this day, "for the Lord hath done it; shout ye lower parts of the earth; break forth into singing, ye mountains, O forest, and every tree therein, for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and glorified himself in Israel." Only let the gospel descend as the dew upon any place, or upon any soul, and "the wilderness will be glad, and the desert will rejoice and blossom as the rose;" for the Lord, by the ministrations of its unsearchable riches of grace, will comfort Sion; he will comfort all her waste places; he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord; joy and gladness shall be found in every habitation, and in every soul which receives this gospel, thanksgiving and the voice of melody. There is not a human sorrow which it cannot console; and if you will accept its invitations and offers, it shall be found an abundant source of comfort to you all.

These unsearchable provisions of grace are sufficient for the holiness of every sinner before me. Nothing can ever change the heart of man but the gospel of Jesus. Philosophy and moral precepts labour in vain to renew the character of the sinner. But where the gospel is truly preached, and truly received, the passions of men are subdued, their lusts are mortified, their habits are changed, their dispositions are made new, and they are turned from the power of Satan unto God. The gospel can make you all holy; it reveals to you a dying Saviour in all the wonders of his love, and thus will create in your souls a desire to love and serve him. It shows you that you are bought with a price! and then, for this reason, gives you a desire to glorify God in your bodies and spirits, which are his. To carry these new desires into effect, it brings down the Holy Spirit into your souls, and thus strengthens you with might in your inner man, and works within you every good work; sanctifies you in soul, body and spirit, and renders you meet to become partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. It will fill you with new principles, and impart to you new powers, and give you purposes and dispositions to which you have been entire strangers. Your characters may be entirely purified and cleansed if you are willing to embrace these unsearchable riches of mercy which are offered you in the gospel of Jesus.

And finally, these provisions of grace are sufficient for your full and complete salvation. You cannot be placed in a situation in which they will not afford you strength equal to your day. They will make you conquerors, and more than conquerors. They will render your very troubles a source of joy, and your conflicts an occasion for more exalted triumphs.

Like Paul, you may glory in infirmities while the power of Christ rests upon you. Like him you may rejoice in the prospect of death, when to depart is to be with Christ. Like him you may triumph in the inseparable love of Jesus, and the complete salvation which he affords, if you are ready to count every thing but loss for his sake; and with him the gospel shall so carry you through things temporal, that you shall in no wise lose the things eternal.

And now let me beseech you to receive these unsearchable riches of Christ. Here is bread from heaven for the famishing, and living waters for the weary and thirsting soul. Would to God you all felt your need of them, and would hunger and thirst for no other supplies than these! O let none despise this gracious supply. Whether you are old or young, learned or unlearned, rich or poor, Christ is alike needful for you, and will be alike sufficient for you. Do not persuade yourselves that he is unnecessary to you. Do not pour contempt upon him, as unsuitable. Do not attempt to add to him, as insufficient; but accept him, and live upon him as all your salvation and all your desire. Gather this bread of heaven as your daily portion, and refresh yourselves by this living fountain as your whole delight; and in the strength of this food, go on your way rejoicing. And as ye have received Jesus Christ the Lord, so walk ye in him; rooted and built up in him, and stablished in the faith as ye have been taught, abounding therein with all thanksgiving.

LECTURE XVI.

THE GLORY OF THE GOSPEL AS A REVELATION OF GOD.

And Moses said, I beseech thee show me thy glory. And he said, I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee.—EXODUS XXXIII. 18, 19.

The privileges granted to Moses in his communications with God were altogether peculiar. It is said the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend; and the testimony is added after his death, that there arose no other prophet in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, in all the signs and wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the sight of all Israel.

God revealed his will to other prophets before and after the time of Moses. But no one had the same view of the divine character, and knowledge of the divine purposes which was allowed to him.

This difference in his communications, God refers to in the controversy which arose from Aaron and Miriam against Moses. "And he said, hear now my words: If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house; with him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold."—Num. xii. 1—8. This "similitude of the Lord," or the apparent glory of the divine presence, Moses saw continually while he was receiving the law from God on the mount. The cloud into which he then entered was the cloud of divine glory that overshadowed the mountain. The request of our text was made after his having been forty days in the mount. It was presented at the door of the tabernacle.

Moses had pitched the tabernacle without the camp; and when he went forth to enter into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended and stood at the door of the tabernacle; and the Lord talked with Moses, speaking to him face to face, or in the most free and intimate communication as a man talketh with his friend.

The conversation which was then held, includes the request of our text.

"And Moses said unto the Lord, See, thou sayest unto me, Bring up this people, and thou hast not let me know whom thou wilt send with me, yet thou hast said, I know thee by name, and thou hast also found grace in my sight.

"Now therefore I pray thee, if I have found grace in thy sight, show me now thy way, that I may know thee, that I may find grace in thy sight, and consider that this nation is thy people.

"And he said, My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest.

"And he said unto him, If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence.

"For wherein shall it be known here, that I and thy people have found grace in thy sight? Is it not in that thou goest with us? So shall we be separated, I and thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth.

"And the Lord said unto Moses, I will do this thing also that thou hast spoken; for thou hast found grace in my sight, and I know thee by name.

"And he said, I beseech thee show me thy glory."

Moses' petition here, pointed to some more clear and significant exhibition of the divine character than he had yet received. What he had seen of God's purposes and government, in the revelations which had been made to him, impressed the conviction upon his mind that there was to be a further manifestation of God to man than any which he had yet distinctly understood, and excited the desire in him to behold these peculiar exhibitions of divine glory which should be made to God's people in subsequent ages. All that had been made known to him was in preparation for some future development of the glory of God; and that glory to which his institutions were thus an introduction, he longed to witness: "And he said, I beseech thee show me thy glory."

In answer to this prayer God promised to give him the exhibition of his glory which he desired; and in complying with his promise, he revealed to him, as the highest possible manifestation of his glory, those purposes of grace and love which were to be made known and accomplished by the gospel.

These remarks naturally lead me here to announce the particular subject which I design to consider, as connected with the prayer of Moses.

The glory of the gospel as an exhibition of the divine character.

That I do not here go aside from the real intention and meaning of the passage, it will be my object first to show.

Moses' desire was for some fuller exhibition of the character of God. In promising compliance with this desire, God does not direct him to the works of creation; although, from them the invisible things of him are clearly seen, even his eternal power and Godhead. He does not tell him to look upon the sun as it shined, and the moon walking in brightness, and there behold the glory of the Lord who hath created these things; who bringeth out their hosts by number; who calleth them all by names, by the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power, and not one faileth.

He does not tell him to look upon the awful thunders and earthquakes, and unearthly sounds with which the law had been given upon Mount Sinai, still trembling beneath the footsteps of a descending Deity; upon the solemn and awakening displays which were there made of the holiness of a God who cannot look upon iniquity; although here, as well as in the wonders of creation, it had been often declared that God had shown his glory to men.

Neither the glory of divine power displayed in the creation, nor the glory of divine holiness exhibited in the law, was that manifestation of the Deity, which God chose to style peculiarly his glory. And, passing by both these, were there no notice of what he did intend, we should be left to settle upon the gospel as the only remaining manifestation of the divine character which has been made to man.

But the Lord describes his purpose and design most significantly. He says, "I will make all my goodness pass before thee." But where has all the goodness of the Lord been exhibited, but in that wonderful dispensation in which was manifested the love of God, in that he sent his Son to die for us? and how could all the goodness of the Lord pass before any mind, from which the riches of gospel grace were concealed? "And I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee; and I will be gracious on whom I will be gracious; and I will show mercy on whom I will show mercy." But the name of the Lord, as bestowing sovereign grace and mercy, can be proclaimed only in that gospel which announces God manifest in the flesh for sinners, and the fulness of the Godhead dwelling bodily in a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. Under no other dispensation can God be gracious and merciful to sinners, for no other one makes atonement for sin.

Still more minutely describing his purpose, God assures Moses, that it would be impossible for any mortal to behold the full glory of his presence. "No man can see my face and live." He dwells in light inaccessible which no man can approach unto. No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son that dwelleth in the bosom of the Father, he hath manifested him; and referring to this new and lasting way of intercourse between himself and sinful men, God says, "There is a place by me, and thou shalt stand upon a rock, and it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, I will put thee in the cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand while I pass by." That rock was Christ, and here is presented the perfect security with which the glory of God is beheld under the gospel. The believer is hidden in a cleft of the rock; while even there, but partial displays are yet made of divine glory. "I will take away my hand, and thou shalt see my back parts, but my face shall not be seen." We know not yet what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is; and even now, though we see him not, yet believing in him, we rejoice with unspeakable and glorified joy.

Thus in answer to the request of Moses, the Lord promised to make known to him the rich grace which he had prepared and designed to reveal to men, in the gospel of Jesus, as the peculiar glory of his character, and thus made known that all-important truth, which angels united to repeat on the eve of the incarnation, that the dispensation which brings peace on earth, and proclaims good will to men, brings "glory in the highest," to the character of God.

This was the promise to Moses. It was to be fulfilled on the ensuing day; and early in the morning Moses rose up and went up unto Mount Sinai, as the Lord had commanded him. "And the Lord descended in the cloud, and stood with him there, and proclaimed the name of the Lord. And the Lord passed by before him and proclaimed, The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty; visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation. And Moses made haste, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worshipped."

Here the Lord proclaimed his name and his glory, and to do it he revealed his purposes of grace, which were to be accomplished in his Son Christ Jesus, recording it forever, that in nothing is the glory of the Lord so wonderfully displayed, as in the grace which passes by transgressions and sins, according to that exclamation of the prophet, in looking forward to the gospel revelation, "Who is a God like unto thee that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage? He retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy. He will turn again and have compassion on us; he will subdue our iniquities, and thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea."

If then God preached the gospel to Moses as the peculiar manifestation of his glory, which I think has been made apparent, I am warranted in speaking from this passage of the glory of the gospel, as the clearest and most glorious exhibition of the Deity which has been made to man. The Old Testament is filled with predictions and types, all pointing to the same glory in the gospel of Jesus. The temple of the Lord is called a glorious rest; a glorious high throne; a house of glory, of beauty, of holiness; and it is said, that at the dedication of it, "the glory of the Lord filled the house of the Lord." This glory was the cloud which manifested the especial presence of the Lord. But yet the glory of the latter house was to be greater than the glory of the former house, because there the sun of righteousness was to arise, with healing in his wings, and the gospel was to be preached, with the Holy Ghost, sent down from heaven.

In the gospel of Jesus, the dispensation of grace and mercy which has been made through him to man, God has revealed his character and will to us, in a peculiar degree, and therefore it is styled, in the highest possible language of honour, "The glorious gospel of the blessed God."

In all the works of God there is glory, because they are his. David for this reason employs the terms glory and handywork, promiscuously for the same thing. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handywork." Whatever he does is glorious from his own character. But the more he communicates of himself to any of his works, the more glorious they are; and therefore, in the very passage in which David celebrates the glory of creation, he shows the higher glory of the divine revelation and law. "The law of God is perfect, converting the soul; the statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart."

Men stand in higher rank than brutes, and the angels in heaven mount up in loftier grades than men, simply upon this principle, that the more of his own image God has bestowed upon any of his creatures, the higher in station and the more glorious in appearance they are.

Now, of all the manifestations of himself which the Deity has made, there is none in which he may be so fully known, communicated with, depended upon and praised, as the gospel of Jesus. This is a glass, in which the angels who surround his throne, see and admire the unsearchable riches of his grace; and in which they behold, in his mercy to men, a revelation of his character, that they never elsewhere witnessed.

In creation and providence, God is seen clearly and wonderfully; but it is only as a God of power and wisdom, producing and upholding all things to promote the glorious end for which he has designed them.

In the law, God is displayed solemnly and truly; but it is only as a God of vengeance and recompense, threatening and executing wrath upon those who offend against him.

But in the gospel he is exhibited as a God of boundless compassion, as a God of love; and his power and his wisdom, and his faithfulness, all come in as subservient to his bounty and grace. Here we behold his glory, full of grace and truth. We see him humbling himself, that he might be merciful to his enemies; suffering in himself, that he might bear the punishment of their transgressions; and removing every obstacle to their forgiveness and acceptance, that he might not only offer them pardon, but beseech them to be pardoned and reconciled to him again.

In the creation, he is a God above us; in the law, he is a God against us; in the gospel alone, he is "Emanuel;" God with us, God like us, God for us.

It is the gospel which reveals God to us as he is. He is invisible in himself; we cannot see him but in his Son. He is inaccessible in himself; we cannot approach him but through his Son. Would we therefore behold his glory, we must seek it in the acceptance and study of that dispensation which proclaims him to be "the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin!"

But while I make these general assertions of the gospel, as a revelation of the character of God, and proclaim its glory as a dispensation, on this account, it will be more satisfactory to look into its contents more minutely, and see how the gospel exhibits in their full glory the different perfections of the divine character.

The great object which God designed to secure by the gospel, was the salvation of men. To the attainment of this object, the attributes of God interposed serious obstacles. In the dispensation of the gospel, these obstacles have been removed, and the attributes of God displayed in consistent and glorious operation. Just in proportion in which there was difficulty in reconciling the divine perfections, does the gospel which has accomplished this reconciliation display their glory and manifest its own excellency.

By it the perfections of God are far more gloriously exhibited than they could be in any other method. For instance, suppose that man, with all his descendants, had been consigned to misery as the consequence of his sin. The justice of God would have appeared, and his truth would also have been seen; but it would not have been known that there existed in the Deity any such attribute as mercy; or that if it did exist in him, it could ever find a fit scope for exercise, since the exercise of it must necessarily involve in it some remission of the rights of justice, and some encroachments upon the honour of the law.

On the other hand, if free and full remission of sins had been granted unto man, it would not have been seen how such an act of grace could be consistent with the rights of justice and holiness and truth. In either of these alternatives, the character of God would have been but partially displayed, and his creatures would never have seen him as he is. But in the method of salvation which the gospel reveals, not only are all these perfections reconciled, but they are all enhanced and glorified; and a tenfold lustre is thrown upon them from the gospel, beyond what could ever have beamed forth in any other way. We will consider some of these distinctly.

The gospel exhibits the divine justice far more gloriously than it would have been displayed in the condemnation of the whole human race. Behold the view of justice which it presents. The Lord Jesus Christ, "God over all," puts himself in the place of sinful man, and undertakes to endure for man all that the sins of the whole world have merited. But will justice venture to seize on him? Will it draw its sword against him who is Jehovah's fellow? Will not the sword of justice, stretched out against him, refuse to execute its appointed work? No. Sin is found on our incarnate God. It is true, it is in him only by imputation; yet being imputed to him, he must be answerable for it, and endure all that it has merited from the hands of God. Behold, then, for the honour of God's justice, the cup is put into the hands of our blessed Lord, and the very dregs of its bitterness are given him to drink; nor is he released from his sufferings until he can say, "It is finished. I have completed the work thou hast given me to do." Contemplate this mysterious fact. The God of heaven and earth becomes man. By his obedience and death, he satisfies the demands of law and justice, in order that God may be just, and yet the justifier of them that believe in Christ Jesus. With nothing less than this could justice be satisfied. It could not consent to the salvation of a single human being on any other terms. Behold, then, how exalted is its character! how inalienable are its rights! how inexorable are its demands! In all that it inflicts upon men and angels, it is not so highly glorified as in this stupendous mystery.

But if the gospel so gloriously exhibits divine justice, see how it displays the divine mercy. This attribute would have been displayed, if man, by a mere sovereign act of grace, had been pardoned. But it would then have triumphed over the concealment of all other attributes of the Deity. It shall be brought to light, but only in such a way as shall consist with the honour of every other attribute, in a way by which God may be "a just God and a Saviour." God's dear Son shall be substituted in the place of sinners. The Creator of the universe shall become a man. He shall have the sins of a rebellious world laid upon him, that man, worthless man, may be spared. Shall mercy be exercised with such a sacrifice as this? Yes. Every thing but God's honour shall give way to it; and when that can be secured, no sacrifice shall be esteemed too great to save a perishing world.

Go now to Bethlehem, and see that new-born infant, your incarnate Lord, "God manifest in the flesh." Who sent him thither? Who brought him from his throne of glory into this world of wretchedness and sin? It was mercy struggling in the bosom of Almighty God, and prevailing for its development in this mysterious way.

Go again to Gethsemane and Calvary; behold that innocent sufferer prostrate upon the earth, bathed in a bloody sweat, suspended on the cross, agonizing under the load of his creatures' guilt, crying, in the depths of sorrow, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

Who has brought him to this state? It was mercy. Mercy would not rest; it would break forth; rather than not exercise itself towards mankind, it would transfer to God himself the penalty due to them; and write, in the blood of an infinite and holy Saviour, the pardon it designed for sinful man. How glorious is this display of mercy; and where but in the gospel of Jesus could it be beheld so honourably and so clearly exhibited.

Add to this glorious exhibition of justice and mercy, the manifestation which the gospel makes of divine faithfulness and truth, and you will see sufficient reason why, in answer to the prayer of Moses, "Show me thy glory," God should preach to him the unsearchable riches of Christ.

God had surely threatened death as the punishment of sin. When therefore man had sinned, what remained but that the penalty denounced should be executed immediately? The word had gone forth; it could not be revoked, nor could its sentence be reversed, consistently with the sacred rights of truth. What then shall be done?

If the sentence be executed on man, the veracity of God is undoubtedly displayed and honoured. But how can man be spared, and God's truth be preserved inviolate? In no other way than the substitution of God's own Son in the sinner's place. This proposal truth willingly accepts, gladly transfers the penalty to him, and joyfully inflicts on the voluntary sufferer the sentence denounced against the offender: Here "mercy and truth have met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." All the perfections of God are made to harmonize in the salvation of man, and all are displayed in a more clear and glorious manner than they could be in any other method. Justice is exercised in a way of mercy; mercy is exercised in a way of justice; and both of them are manifested in the way of holiness and truth.

This is one view of the glory of the gospel as a divine dispensation. The clear and sublime manifestation which it makes of the character of God. While all his works praise him and his saints give thanks to him, it is this dispensation which proclaims his name and his honour: "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin;" and for this revelation of his character, it is well called "the glorious gospel of the blessed God."

While this glory of the gospel should lead us to speak with all boldness, and never to be ashamed to declare its power and its worth, it should lead you to remember how worthy it is of all men to be received. This faithful saying is worthy to be accepted with all readiness of mind; worthy to be welcomed, like the star of the wise men, with exceeding great joy; worthy to be enamelled in the crowns of princes, and to be written in the soul of every Christian with a beam of the sun, "that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." The faithful have ever been ready to unite in the exclamation of the inspired prophet, "How beautiful are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, thy God reigneth." What man of sorrow would not open his heart and welcome the embraces of that messenger who was coming to him with more lovely and acceptable news than the very wishes of his heart could have framed for himself?

When Joseph was sent for out of prison to Pharaoh's court, and when Jacob saw the chariots which were sent to carry him to his long lost son, their spirits were revived and comforted after their long distress. When Caligula, the Roman emperor, sent for Herod (that Herod who was afterwards smitten by an angel of God), whom Tiberius had bound in chains and cast into prison, and placed a diadem upon his head, and for his chain of iron gave him a chain of gold of equal weight, the historian says, "Men could not believe the reality of a change so wonderful."

Now what are all good tidings to the gospel, which is a word of salvation, which opens prisons and releases captives, and gives a joy with which the world intermeddles not? "Your joy no man shall take from you." O how worthy is such a gospel to be accepted and improved.

If we suffer the loss of every thing for Christ, godliness is great gain after all. In a shipwreck, I throw my goods overboard, and count myself happy to get my life in exchange. O how willingly, then, should the man who is convinced of the danger of his soul, cast off every thing which presses him down; and rejoice, with unspeakable joy, to have his soul saved from an eternal shipwreck, and to be brought before God in peace!

Have you no desires to see the glory of God displayed in the face of Jesus Christ, or to enjoy the presence of God, made peaceful and happy for you by the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus? Can you deliberately make the choice, that while hereafter myriads of ransomed sinners rejoice in the glories of a full salvation, your souls should see God only as an avenger of blood? It is a painful alternative which is presented to you, but it is the only possible one.

God is dwelling among you in the riches of gospel invitations and in the fulness of spiritual strength. In the persons of the Son and the Spirit, he would be received into your bosoms, and rule over all your affections and purposes. But if he be rejected by you to the end, you will be constrained to see him appearing in the glory of his government, to take vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ."

The glorious gospel which is offered you now, forms the highest honour of your souls. It brings you a king having salvation, and makes you with him, kings and priests for ever. Happy are the people that know the joyful sound, they shall walk in the light of his countenance; and blessed will you be, though in the midst of reproaches and tribulations, if you are led to welcome salvation to your hearts, and to wash your robes and make them white in the blood of the Lamb.

LECTURE XVII.

THE GLORY OF THE GOSPEL FROM ITS METHOD OF PUBLICATION.

How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, thy God reigneth.—ISAIAH LI. 7.

No one would be led to doubt, probably, in the most cursory reading of this text, that it was intended to refer to the publication of the gospel of Jesus Christ. But if there should be such a doubt, St. Paul has decided the proper application of the passage in his epistle to the Romans, by adducing it as a reason for sending preachers of the gospel throughout the world. Speaking of the messengers of the gospel, he says, "How shall they preach except they be sent?" as it is written, "How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things."

It is then the gospel of Jesus, the ministry of which is said to be so excellent and desirable. This gospel, in its very name, is glad tidings; it is a publication of peace between God and his alienated creatures. It is good tidings of everlasting good through the mediation of a crucified Redeemer to those who return unto God and live. It is salvation, full, free, eternal salvation to every one who accepts its tidings with a thankful heart; salvation from present despair and misery; salvation from everlasting sorrow and punishment, the just wages of sin. It is a glorious annunciation to Zion, or the people of the living God, that their God, an incarnate God, a justifying God, reigneth for ever more.

He who proclaims to a ruined world that Jesus reigns as a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance and forgiveness of sins, in the proclamation of this one great truth, tells the whole system of gospel grace, publisheth salvation, bringeth good tidings of good, publisheth peace. The people who hear the joyful sound are a highly privileged people; the heart that embraces the glad intelligence is a converted and thankful heart. The man who welcomes the precious truth, finds it all his salvation and all his desire. And the community and nation upon which its beneficial influence is exerted, is converted from a wilderness into the garden of the Lord, a place in which the Lord delights to dwell.

In the text the prophet rejoices in a view of their happiness and glory who are allowed to minister this gospel of peace. He derives the figurative expression, "how beautiful upon the mountains," from the local situation of Jerusalem. That city was surrounded by mountains, which were considered alike its glory and its defence. The Psalmist adduces this peculiarity of its location as an illustration of divine protection to the people of God. "As the mountains stand round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people, from henceforth, even for ever." From whatever direction a messenger came to this city, his path crossed the mountains. In the text the prophet is carried forward to hear the publication of gospel mercies; and in the glorious prospect of this publication of grace, the circumstances of his own city furnish him an illustration of his feelings.

As the sight of a bearer of any joyful tidings to Jerusalem was delightful to those who watched him crossing the surrounding mountains, so in a still higher degree, beautiful upon the mountains, i. e. beautiful at the most distant point from which they can be seen, are the feet of him who comes with more joyful and valuable intelligence to men than they have ever heard before, who comes to proclaim to the waiting people of God, the tidings that their God, Emanuel, reigns as the Author of salvation, and the Prince of everlasting peace.

The text contains an extensive exhibition of the excellency and glory of the gospel, as a dispensation of God's goodness to man. The particular view of this glory, however, which it leads me to propose to your present consideration is,

The glory of the gospel arising from the method of its publication.

In considering this subject, I shall speak

I. Of the character of its various preachers.

II. Of the providence which has attended its publication.

III. Of its triumph over every species of opposition.

I. In speaking of the preachers of the gospel in various ages, the exclamation, "how beautiful, how glorious," may be most equitably applied.

The gospel has been at all times highly glorious and exalted in this aspect of its publication.

God himself, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, who created the world, visible and invisible, by the word of his power, was the first preacher of these good tidings of good. On the very day of man's transgression he descended with a promise of grace. In that promise he held forth to view a Saviour who should be miraculously conceived as man, and should be a bruised and yet a finally triumphant Saviour. This promise contained the elements of the whole gospel dispensation. And while Adam, as a sinner, trembled before the visible glory of his Creator, as a believer he was enabled to see with rejoicing a glory in this exhibition of the gospel far more excellent.

Through the whole patriarchal and prophetic ages the gospel was administered to the faith of men, by those who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost; and was glorious in its ministry from its being the peculiar subject and end of all intelligence from God to man.

In the personal ministry of Jesus, a Saviour miraculously born, a God incarnate for man, the most exalted glory was connected with the gospel. "Never man spake like this man," said they who were sent to apprehend him for punishment. All wondered at the gracious, or becoming and ennobling words which proceeded from his mouth.

All creation listened to his voice and obeyed his irresistible commands. Things animate and inanimate alike yielded to his control; the sea heard him, and was still; the earth heard him, and opened; the dead heard him, and awoke to life; the blood-thirsty multitude of the Jews heard him, and went backward and fell to the ground; the spirits of darkness heard him, and departed from men.

All this exercise of power elevated the character of the gospel dispensation, because it displayed his rank and glory who had come to the earth solely to declare it. Jesus appeared simply as the great preacher of gospel grace, and all the honour which appertained to his character as a messenger, was reflected upon the message with which he was charged. And highly glorious and excellent indeed was that dispensation which brought the Deity to earth, as a preacher of its truth.

His ministry was honoured by the annunciation of angels, and by the proclamation of a divinely appointed herald; and though he was despised and rejected by a portion of men, yet honour was paid to him in his humiliation by heaven and earth.

But during his earthly ministry he was comparatively in a cloud. His real glory was eclipsed by the burden of man's afflictions, temptations and sins; and it was in the subsequent ministry of his apostles that his divine power and sufficiency were really displayed.

Then, when the gospel was preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, and the Lord confirmed his word with wonders and signs following, the honour of the Son of man was gloriously exhibited. The apostles acted in the name of Jesus of Nazareth; and this name was every where the signal of divine and unlimited power. The miracles which Jesus wrought in person, while on earth, they wrought in his name after his ascension to glory. And in addition to all these mighty signs and wonders, the conversion of myriads of immortal souls from the power of Satan unto God, did honour to that dispensation of the gospel which had been committed unto them.

How beautiful, then, in the eyes of the multitudes throughout the earth, who were asking the way to life, were the feet of those who published with such authority and effect, glad tidings of peace and salvation through the merits of a crucified Lamb! And how glorious in their ministry was that gospel of the blessed God which triumphed over error, pardoned sin, consoled the disconsolate, and gave life from the dead, in the name of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ, to every believer in its truth.

But while through all these periods of time the glory of the gospel was displayed in the character and rank of its preachers, can we adopt the same assertion of the present ministry of the gospel? Now, the excellency of this divine treasure is committed to fallible, weak and sinful men; they have no miraculous powers entrusted to them; they have no signs and wonders to follow their utterance of the name of Jesus; they have no power to overrule or punish the disobedience of those who obey not the gospel; and, generally speaking, they have no excellency of speech or of wisdom to command the attention of those who cannot be attracted by the truth.

Is the gospel still glorious in the character of its preachers? And are the feet of those who publish it still beautiful upon the mountains?

Yes, there is still a preacher of the gospel among men, without whose influence, signs and wonders would be powerless, and the tongues of men and angels utterly unprofitable. He follows the sinner with a boldness which is always undaunted, and tells him hourly in his face, "thou art the man." He carries glad tidings with a forbearance which will not be wearied, and beseeches, "to-day, after so long a time, if ye will hear, harden not your hearts." He grasps the conscience with a hold which will not be shaken off, and awakens the transgressor with a solemn cry, "escape for your life." He binds up the heart which he has broken, with more than a mother's tenderness, while he leads the soul to Jesus, and says, "believe, and he will give you rest."

There is none who teacheth like him; and while we preach the gospel with the Holy Ghost and with much assurance, its ministration is glorious, and brings honour to the truth which it declares. This divine Spirit will be the great preacher of Christ crucified unto the end of the gospel dispensation. His power is unceasingly displayed in the instant conversion of the man who came under the word, cold and ignorant and careless; in the extensive revival of the power of godliness, in the community which has settled down into a dark and lifeless state; in the spreading before an individual sinner the startling view of his own iniquities, and in causing great searchings of heart among those who have held the truth in unrighteousness. And while the ministry of the gospel has such power, though the earthly minister be weak and ignorant, the gospel is glorified in the character of its preachers.

For nearly sixty centuries God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, have united to publish these glad tidings of peace, of good, and of salvation. In this divine ministry, great honour has been brought to the gospel dispensation, and it has been made glorious in the method of its publication.

II. The glory of the gospel in the method of its publication is exhibited in the Providence which has always attended it.

It is perfectly evident from scripture, that the existence of the human race, after their apostacy from God, was permitted only as a display of God's grace in their redemption; and the whole divine government of man has been a comment upon that promise, which was given to Adam, of a coming Saviour. Four thousand years were employed in preparing for this manifestation of God in the flesh. During this period the Divine Providence was unceasingly displayed in watching over the great purpose of redemption, and making provision for the fulness of time.

The division of nations in preparation for the final triumph of truth and grace; the call of Abraham to be the father and spiritual representative of all believers, the depositary of that everlasting covenant, which was in all things well ordered and sure, and the head of the earthly line from which the desire of all nations should be born; the separation of the Israelites, to keep those precious truths and promises, which constituted so much the treasure of the world; the various dispensations and revelations which were made to them, all pointing to more excellent things to come; the diversified events of their history and their relations to other nations of the earth; all these were arrangements of Divine Providence to prepare the way of the Lord and a highway for our God.

When the fulness of the appointed time was come, the same Providence was displayed in the subjugation of the temporal power of the Jews, that there might be no rival to that kingdom not of this world, which the Lord God designed to set up among them; in the universal empire which Rome had been permitted to establish through the known world, giving such free course to the divine word, and such opportunities and protection to the preachers of the gospel, as no age before or after could have afforded; in the establishment of a general language through all civilized nations, and that the language in which the New Testament was written; in the great literary cultivation and wisdom of that period, affording the most certain and scrutinizing examination of the claims of the new religion, which made such large demands upon men; all these are remarkable arrangements of that Providence which was ordering events to co-operate for the establishment of the kingdom of Christ among men.

In the whole period of time which has since elapsed, all human changes have been made to work together to promote the same intended results. The gospel of Jesus, its progress, its establishment, its triumph in the world, have formed the all-sufficient reason for the most wonderful alternations among the children of men. In the embracing and cultivation of this gospel, savage nations have been raised to civilization, prosperity, and temporal happiness and power. In the neglect and contempt of it, civilized nations have been reduced to degradation, barbarism, and ignorance. All desirable earthly blessings have been made to follow in the train of the Redeemer's gospel; and while no nation has been exalted without it, the sin of its rejection has been a permanent reproach to every people who have been guilty of it.

The great commotions of the world, the wars and tumults which have agitated the sons of men, have all been made to prepare the way for Jesus, as the fire, and the wind, and the earthquake in Horeb, introduced to Elijah the still, small voice of divine commands.

The present overturning of the nations of the earth, though feeding the plant of liberty and virtue with human blood, are overruled to establish the more widely the kingdom of the Saviour. Men fill the atmosphere with noise and confusion to gratify their own ambition. God rides upon the storm, and makes the clouds the dust of his feet, to bring to pass his great designs. They think to destroy nations not a few; he purposes to establish a dominion under another King, one Jesus, from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth.

This same Providence is to carry on the gospel to a final triumph. The north and the south are to give up the victims of ignorance and idolatry, that they may be made the children of God; and even now commerce has for this purpose brought together the ends of the earth, and the peaceful galley of the merchant has carried the ministers and the books of truth to most of the remotest nations of men.

This continued providence of God, watching over the gospel, preparing the way for its propagation, establishing it upon the ruins of human ignorance and vice, has thrown unceasing honour upon it as a dispensation from God to man. That God, by whom and for whom all things were made, is for this reason a glorious God, and that gospel for which the earth has been preserved and governed, and the promotion of which among men has been the object of a sleepless Providence, is for this reason a glorious gospel, and is honoured and made beautiful in the method of its publication.

III. The glory of the gospel, in the method of its publication, has been displayed in its constant triumph over every species of opposition.

In every age Satan has sought to destroy it among men, and to defeat the divine purpose to redeem and to bless them. His triumph over our first parents led to the promulgation of this glorious scheme of grace; and from that period his purpose has been to pervert its operation, and to destroy its saving efficacy.

He buried the nations in ignorance and vice in the antediluvian world, until the Creator was provoked to cleanse it with an universal deluge.

He involved the Israelites in the deepest and most degrading idolatry, until sometimes, as in the reign of Josiah, the divine law had become quite forgotten. He led them to a repeated forsaking of God, and despising of his ordinances, that he might annihilate the truth which had been entrusted to their keeping.

But notwithstanding all his power, the purpose of God to accomplish man's redemption kept on a steady and undeviating course; all things were made ready for its development in the appointed time; and though the heathen raged, and the people imagined a vain thing, God did set his King upon his holy hill of Zion.

When the Saviour was manifest in the flesh, he attempted to destroy him. He excited the jealousy of Herod to cut him off in his infancy. He attempted to persuade him to his own destruction. He arrayed against him the whole power of Jewish and Roman governors, so that in the expression of the apostles, "against the holy child Jesus, both Herod and Pontius Pilate and the rulers of Israel were gathered together." He finally succeeded, as he supposed, in his destruction, by nailing him to the cross. But still the gospel triumphed; and the very death which was to show the weakness and falsehood of the professed Messiah, was his full and perfect triumph over the gates of hell, and his open spoiling of the principalities and powers of darkness.

Foiled and defeated in this attempt, the enemy has pursued the gospel in every succeeding age like a flood. He raised the arm of temporal power and wealth, so that the most dreadful and bitter wasting of human lives was exhibited in the persecution of the apostles and all successive preachers. But the gospel triumphed over power, and in the reign of Constantine seated itself upon the very throne of the persecuting empire. Millions of lives have been sacrificed by the enmity of Satan because they were Christians, and yet increasing millions have risen up to supply their place.

He has inspired the wisdom and genius of man to write down the religion of Jesus in the books of infidelity, so that some of the mightiest efforts of the human mind which the world has ever seen have been displayed in hostility to the gospel. Age after age has furnished the same display; and yet this despised gospel has triumphed over the arguments and writings of infidelity, and still stands the monument of God's Almighty power, while the names and the former existence of many of these opposers, are known only by the answers which Christian writers have made to them.

He has in different ages thrown corruptions and heresies in practice and doctrine into the body of the church; has raised up secret enemies in the very camp, until the word of God appeared almost buried under the wickedness of men. But the gospel has thrown off successively corruptions and heresies, and still stands, after all these attempts, precisely the same living and life-giving truth, as when it was first revealed.

He has sent his agents and ministers to assume the Christian garb; to array themselves among the followers of Jesus, and thus to betray the cause which they professed to espouse. But though the tares have grown together with the wheat, there have been continually succeeding harvests in which they have been separated, and the gospel is still offered in its simplicity and purity to man, and embraced in its true character by thousands, while these false pretenders and preachers have gone to their own place.

No species of opposition which could have been aroused has been omitted. Every possible instrument has been called in requisition, and every instrument in its highest possible power; and yet over all, truth has prevailed. The gospel has set its foot upon the necks of its enemies; and still triumphs, and still will triumph, until its full dominion has been attained.

Opposition probably was never stronger or more serious than in the present day. The truth is every where spoken against. The doctrines and ordinances of the gospel are reviled by thousands. Bitter terms of reproach are appended to the names of those who maintain its truth, and the most unfounded calumnies are circulated in reference to their character and conduct; and yet the gospel establishes its throne in the very midst of those who hate it, and converts its enemies into friends.

Such triumphs reflect high honour upon the gospel of Jesus, and show its glory in the method of its publication. Men may raise insuperable difficulties, as they suppose; but beautiful in their triumphant march over all these mountains, are still the feet of those who publish the gospel of peace and preach glad tidings of good things.

From this view of the glory of the gospel, we may learn,

1. That whatever men may think of the dispensation of the word, the rejection of the gospel is really a rejection of God himself. Whoever may proclaim to you this message of grace, and however weakly and infirmly he may proclaim it, provided he be faithful, speaks the word of the Lord; and he that despiseth, despiseth not man but God. From God himself to you is the word of this salvation sent; and let all take heed that they receive not the grace of God in vain. In his name we demand the submission of your hearts to him. We offer you the fulness of mercy for perishing sinners, which is laid up in the Lord Jesus Christ; and by his authority require you to repent and believe the gospel. We leave it not to your choice whether you will accept the provisions of divine mercy or not. You may reject them indeed, but you will reject them to your eternal ruin. Brethren, Almighty God demands his own. He made you not to be destroyed; he has bought you with an inestimable price; he commands you to return to him and live; and you will answer it before him in a solemn final judgment, how you have received and improved the precious opportunity of salvation which he has so long allowed you.

2. The way in which you should receive it, not as the word of man, but as it is in truth, the word of the Lord, which worketh effectually in you that believe. The word of God profits you not if it be not mixed with faith in them that hear it. Listen to the gospel as a personal message to yourselves; hear it describe your necessities and offer you a full and perfect remedy, with the humble acknowledgment of your want, and a cordial embracing of the mercy proposed; appropriate with thankfulness the privileges which God offers here to sinners, and learn to come with your whole heart to the fountain of blessedness and mercy which he has laid open. The Lord Jesus invites you in great kindness to receive his love. By his ministers he calls you, and by his spirit he strives with you, that you may not be permitted to destroy yourselves. Believe in him with your hearts, and it shall be well with you; he will pardon your unrighteousness, and your iniquities will he remember no more. He brings you this day good tidings; he publishes to you peace and salvation. O let your thankful hearts rejoice that there is a Saviour so worthy to be received, admired and loved, presented to your embrace; and come unto him and he shall give you rest.

LECTURE XVIII.

THE GLORY OF THE GOSPEL FROM THE SUBJECTS WHICH IT PROCLAIMS.

How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, thy God reigneth.—ISAIAH LI. 7.

Such we have seen is the divine description of the ministers of the gospel of Christ. Whether men justly appreciate their office or not, they are sent as messengers of God's chief blessing to a fallen world. Coming with intelligence of pardon from on high, to the penitent and contrite their approach is welcomed, their feet are beautiful. God is pleased to put high honour upon their office, and to show himself personally interested in the acceptance and respect which they receive.

But why are they thus styled beautiful? Not for any personal merit or worth in themselves. They are infirm and imperfect. Not for any dignity or power which they possess or which they can exercise. They are like other men, altogether weak, sinful and unprofitable. God honours them, and they are welcomed by man, altogether on account of the message which they are commissioned to proclaim. This message contains the highest possible benefit to man, and reflects unceasing glory upon God. The text exhibits this message at large, and introduces to your notice the subject of the present discourse.

The glory of the gospel, arising from the intelligence which it communicates to man.

1. It brings "good tidings." This expression is a general designation of the revelation made by Jesus Christ. It is the title by which we know this glorious system, and which is thus called the gospel, because it is altogether a communication of good tidings to man.

The good tidings of the Christian system of truth involve many particulars, adapted to all human circumstances and conditions. It appoints every where to them that mourn, to give them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. It speaks in language of consolation to all who suffer, of security to all who are in doubt, of encouragement to all who fear, of promise to all who seek for mercy. There is no condition of man under the Providence of the God of Truth, for which the gospel of Christ will not bring relief and comfort. He cannot be placed under such circumstances as shall shut him out from security and hope, if he be willing to accept the offers which are here made. Whenever the sinner is destroyed, he has destroyed himself, though God has offered him abundant help.

But the good tidings of the gospel may all be comprized in its one offer to man of universal pardon for sin. It exhibits a Saviour, who has accomplished in his own person a full salvation for the sinful posterity of Adam, and the riches of whose grace are truly unsearchable; and it offers simply through him, and in the acceptance of him, universal forgiveness to those for whom he died. I say universal forgiveness, for not a single sinner is personally excepted from the offer which it makes. Whosoever will, may come and drink freely of the water of life: Jesus has offered himself once for all. And there is not a man living who can say with truth, "for me there is no redemption, God has shut me out of life." No, brethren, we do injustice, great injustice, to the free and unbounded grace of God, if we suppose that it is not honestly proposed to all, and proposed with a sincere desire on the part of its great author that all should partake of it and live. Whatever theoretical difficulties may be imagined in reconciling God's purposes of love defeated, with his unlimited and resistless power to do his will, we cannot lay the blame of man's destruction upon him. Nor in searching through the whole catalogue of offenders against him, can we find one to whom we are authorized to say, that no atonement has been made for him, and no pardon is offered upon his return to God.

This offer of forgiveness is universal in regard to the transgressions of each individual. No sinner can be too guilty to be pardoned. No man can have fallen to a depth which is beyond the reach of Almighty grace. Is he the chief of sinners? Has no one ever passed beyond the limits of his transgression? Then is the faithful saying true for him, that Christ Jesus came into the world for his salvation, and is able to set him forth as a pattern of divine long suffering. All the offences of previous life are pardoned, when a sinner embraces the provisions of grace in Christ Jesus; one act of divine mercy restores him to the favour of his God, and removes forever all charge of guilt against his soul. It is true that the sinner's forgiveness is dependant upon his return to God. If he continue in a persevering rejection of the Holy Spirit, and determine to sin because grace abounds, he commits indeed a sin for which there is no forgiveness, either in this world, or in the world to come. None in this world, because he thus casts finally away the only possible means of pardon. None in the world to come, because all exercise of pardon is confined to the present life. This sin against the Holy Ghost cannot be forgiven, not because its guilt is too great, but because it is final impenitence; and no impenitent sinner can be pardoned. But for all classes and degrees of guilt, if the sinner truly repent and submit himself to God, there is forgiveness offered in the gospel. And thus the gospel is a message of good tidings to man, bringing him back to God and restoring him again to the divine favour and love.

2. It "publisheth peace." The transgressions of men have excited the just anger of God against them, have exposed them to necessary punishment, and made it the inflexible rule of his government, that there should be no peace to the wicked. This is the relation in which by nature you stand to God; your souls are forfeited to his divine justice. Should he carry forward his anger against sin to final execution, and cast you all into everlasting ruin, no one of you could have the right to complain. Your own consciences would unite with his holy determinations, and proclaim that God was just though he thus took vengeance. You could make no offering to him which should purchase peace, or deserve the remission of the punishment denounced against sin. Under such circumstances the worth and glory of the gospel are displayed. God has accomplished and proposes reconciliation, and his gospel declares it to you in his name. It is an offer of peace altogether worthy of God; it compromises not the justice or integrity of his character, but confirms and glorifies his whole government of man.

Peace between yourselves and your Creator is thus proclaimed. You are allowed to come before him with your prayers and offerings without fear. He looks upon you in the righteousness of his Son with acceptance and favour. He invites you to become united to him in the spirit of new and holy obedience, and to forget that there has been any separation between you in your experience of the future manifestations of his love. The gospel exhibits the character of God to you under the most attractive aspect. It shows you that he is desirous to pardon and save you; and invites you to commit all your cares and ways to him in the assurance that he will be a friend and beloved to you forever.

Beside this relative peace between your souls and God, the gospel publishes peace in the experience of your own hearts. When you receive by faith the Saviour whom it offers, and he is allowed to dwell in your hearts as your hope of glory, there is then bestowed upon you the peace which passes understanding. Your troubled and anxious minds have rest. Tranquillity and assurance forever establish their dominion in your souls. The accusations of guilt are hushed by divine testimonies of pardoning love. Your hope is fixed calmly and surely upon the promises of God; and resting thus in love for him, and in his love for you, you are filled with peace in believing through the power of his spirit. Peace is thus thrown over all the changes and prospects of mortal life. All things work together for good to those who love God; and he keeps them in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on him. There is real worth, beloved brethren, in this gospel offer of peace to the sinner's soul, and you will exhibit true wisdom in embracing it for your own comfort in the present world, and your eternal joy in a world to come. God makes it his glory to pass by transgressions, and gives glory to his gospel in constituting that the instrument of proclaiming his riches of love to every sinner truly repenting and believing in his Son.

3. The gospel brings "good tidings of good." It not only restores the sinner by the offer of free forgiveness to the condition of an innocent man, removing all penalty, and rescuing him from condemnation, but it adds also positive and infinitely valuable benefits. It offers him in the righteousness of God his Saviour everlasting life and glory. It bids him lift up his eyes and his hopes, for God hath provided for him such good things as pass man's understanding. The present good which results from a cordial acceptance of the gospel is important, but it is partial. The following of Christ may involve, with all the peace and comfort which it promises, the endurance of much suffering and trial. The Christian may pass through many and great tribulations in entering into the kingdom of God. But the future good which is set before him is all-sufficient, and the final result of his obedience will make abundant reparation for any conflicts by which he must be tried. But what is this future good? What offers are made to be fulfilled in a world to come? Continuing life to beings who deserve to die. Unceasing enjoyment for those who merit only sufferings and woes. Perfect acceptance with God, for rebels against him, with whom he was justly angry every day. Everlasting honour and glory for those who have been degraded and destroyed by sin. The fellowship of Jesus and his saints, the society of all who are holy and perfect, the approbation of the Ruler and Judge of all, for beings who were cast out in their sins ready to perish. Such is the good which the gospel offers. It is a spiritual and permanent good, which, like its author, has no variableness nor shadow of changing. Such honour, such recompense have all his saints.

This everlasting provision of good answers all the reproaches of the world, while it shows that the Christian, in counting all things as loss for Christ, acts with wisdom and prudence, and that he lays up his treasure securely where moth and rust do not corrupt, nor thieves break through to steal, and builds his house upon a rock which shall stand the assault of every tempest and abide firm forevermore. It answers all the temptations of the world, while it presents more than a counterbalance for every sinful joy, and excites a faith and hope which shall overcome every allurement to transgression. It applies itself to all the changing circumstances of life, bringing encouragement and treasure from God, wherever its possessor may be placed. It is so satisfying, that its messenger is always welcome to those who understand its worth. To the poor, the afflicted, the sick, the dying, the glorious gospel brings good tidings of good. It takes man by the hand when all others forsake him. It can speak with power when all others are silent. And shows itself thus useful and desirable, however low and desperate may be the condition of the individual to whom its gracious offers come.

4. The gospel "publishes salvation." It proclaims to every believer final security from the punishment of sin, and from the power of Satan. It encourages him with the assurance of victory, even while he is in the midst of his warfare. It bids him remember the Almighty power which is engaged upon his side, and under whatever circumstances of danger, to be not faithless but believing.

The salvation which the gospel offers is a salvation already finished and completed. Man is invited to partake of that which God has freely provided for him; and the great office of the gospel is to publish to man this glorious salvation, and to invite him to an enjoyment of the bounties which have been thus prepared. This salvation it proclaims in exhibiting an all-sufficient sacrifice for sin offered by God's dear Son. It shows that the burden of human guilt was actually laid upon him, and that his death upon the cross was borne as a required punishment in the sinner's stead.

In such an exhibition of the death of Christ, it displays a full and final atonement made to God for human transgressions, and publishes salvation in the assurance that every barrier which unexpiated guilt interposed to the acceptance of man has been thus removed. It proclaims this salvation in displaying the resurrection from the dead, and the subsequent exaltation of the glorious Redeemer who had humbled himself even to this death upon the cross for man, and thus shows that Almighty power is enlisted in behalf of all who come to him, and that he is able to save them unto the uttermost, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. While the gospel proclaims the united exercise of the power of God and the sufferings of man, in the person of Jesus Christ the Lord our righteousness, it publishes salvation in a method which removes every difficulty and commends itself to the enlightened judgment of man as perfectly adequate to his wants, and precisely suited to his condition as a guilty and helpless being.

But though it thus publishes to man a complete salvation, it does not leave him to obtain for himself, and by his own power, a personal interest in this salvation. It comes to him attended by the same Spirit who has proclaimed its intelligence to the world, as a personal gift to his soul, to enable him to see his dangers, and to take advantage of the mercies which are offered to his acceptance. It brings this Holy Spirit to dwell within his heart as a comforter and guide, to encourage and to lead him in the path to life eternal. By the ministration of the Spirit, it applies to him the salvation which it publishes abroad, and thus completes the gracious design of God of bringing the sinner from the power of Satan to himself and glory everlasting.

It displays the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost united in the work of man's redemption; shows the office which each person of the Deity exercises to attain this end; and having proclaimed the whole scheme of grace, it publishes as the result a full and eternal salvation to all who believe the intelligence which it communicates.

5. The gospel "saith unto Zion," to the people of God, "thy God reigneth."

This personal designation of God as connected with his people, shows us that Emanuel, God manifest in the flesh, is especially referred to. Of him, the righteous are by the same prophet represented as saying, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us." The God of Zion is an incarnate God, our "great God and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The gospel declares his reign, his everlasting dominion as God over all, blessed for ever. It proclaims his exaltation as head over all things for the church, as Lord of lords and King of kings, making his enemies his footstool. It declares this reign of Christ as joyful intelligence to his people, assuring them that their cause is safe under his extensive and resistless dominion.

He reigns in the government of the present world, ordering all things according to the counsels of his own will, and constraining all beings and all events, to promote his glory and the good of his people. In this assurance Zion rejoices in the prospect of a final victory for his truth, and fears not that his cause is safe, whatever may be the assaults of the ungodly. However men may fill the earth with confusion and sin, he rides upon the whirlwind and the storm, and makes the clouds the dust of his feet. He brings light out of darkness, and makes crooked things straight. And he will accomplish his purpose of the universal dominion of righteousness and peace among men, through whatever opposition and conflict he must pass to gain the end.

He reigns in the heart of every redeemed sinner, and will keep each one, therefore, to the enjoyment of his eternal glory. In this intelligence, too, his people rejoice; they have put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and they stand complete in him. Whatever may be the temptations of sin, and the difficulties of obedience while he reigns in their hearts, they shall be made more than conquerors through his divine power. The world shall be overcome, Satan shall be bruised under their feet, self shall be crucified and destroyed, and grace shall triumph finally and eternally, because Christ rules in those whom he has redeemed.

He reigns amidst the hosts of heaven, and Zion rejoices in the prospect of reward which his dominion there ensures. His presence constitutes the happiness and glory of his people. They look forward with delight to another world as an everlasting home, because he is there. The single promise of recompense which the gospel makes is an enjoyment of his favour and a dwelling together with him. In the hope of this the believer's heart rejoices with joy unspeakable and full of glory; and having counted all things as loss for Christ's sake, he looks forward with triumph to the day when he shall be like him and see him as he is. Jesus reigns in heaven, and, therefore, for those who love him, heaven must contain a desirable and ample reward.

Such is the glorious intelligence which the gospel brings you; such are the communications which it makes to a world of sinners. It brings good tidings, it publishes peace, it brings good tidings of good, it publishes salvation, it declares to Zion, thy God reigneth. These gracious communications throw a glorious light over the whole message, and constitute it, by their excellency, the glorious gospel of the blessed God.

How important is the obligation which arises from such intelligence to constrain sinful men to accept with thankfulness these heavenly offers! The immediate duty required of you all is the reconciliation to God which the gospel proposes, and for which it has made provision. All things are ready for the return of sinners unto Christ, and I would beseech you, brethren, to welcome the ministers of reconciliation, to receive the pardon which is offered, and to place yourselves under the dominion of this glorious and merciful King. Kiss the Son in token of your cheerful submission to him, and let not his wrath be kindled against you, even but a little, lest you perish from the right way, and lose for ever the hopes which are offered you through his grace.

How important also is the obligation upon Christians to press upon all others the acceptance of these messages of divine love! To you who have believed, the Lord has committed the treasure of his grace, that you may offer it to others. In your conversation and your conduct, and in direct efforts to lead sinners unto Christ, much influence is to be exerted to publish this salvation, and to spread abroad the knowledge of the truth. The worth of this glorious intelligence marks the amount of your responsibility; and while it teaches you what Christ has done and suffered to open the way of salvation, it impresses upon you how much you should be willing to do and to suffer to make this way plain and profitable to others. Let no effort be spared which can be made effectual to bring men from the darkness of their sins, to the light of the glory of God which is seen in Jesus Christ.

LECTURE XIX.

The gospel magnifying the law.

The Lord is well pleased for his righteousness sake, he will magnify the law and make it honourable.—Isaiah xlii. 21.

The connexion of the different divine revelations with each other, forms an important subject for our consideration in closing this series of lectures.

Faithfulness and immutability are attributes inseparable from the divine character. With God, there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning. He illustrates the unchangeableness of his own nature by contrasting with it the transitory existence of the most splendid of all his works. Like a vesture and a garment, they are to change, and to be folded up, but he is the same for ever, his years have no end.

This immutability of his character and purposes he adduces as the reason of all his forbearance towards those who have disobeyed his commands. "I am Jehovah, I change not, therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed," and again, "I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger, I will not return to destroy Ephraim, for I am God, and not man."

The same unchangeable character, is asserted in the New Testament to be the attribute of God manifest in the flesh. "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day and forever." And Jesus says of his own revelation, "heaven and earth shall pass away; but my word shall not pass away."

This immutability appertains to all the divine purposes and plans. He is from everlasting to everlasting, ONE GOD. He does not change the purposes which he forms; nor is he frustrated in the accomplishment of his own designs.

The connexion of this attribute with our text, will become immediately apparent.

God has made successive revelations to men, and has placed them by these revelations under distinct dispensations of government. Now are not these dispensations contrary the one to the other? and is not the divine immutability compromised and destroyed in the various declarations which he has thus successively made?

This is the important subject or thought which I would present before you at this time.

Is the law against the promises of God? or do we make void the law, through faith? To each of these demands the apostle returns the same answer, "God forbid," and asserts the same fact, that the law and the gospel are designed not to destroy, but to confirm and establish each other.

Our text declares, that God was perfectly satisfied with that everlasting righteousness which the Messiah has brought in, under the gospel; and that in the acceptance of this righteousness for man, he would magnify the law, and make it honourable.

The honour which the grace of the gospel reflects upon the divine law is the subject here presented to you.

In remarking upon this subject:

I. Our first object must be to recall the distinct and clear views which we have already taken of the law and the gospel. And then,

II. To consider the assertion of the text, that the righteousness of the gospel magnifies and makes honourable the law.

I. We must first recall the clear views which we have taken of what the law and gospel are.

1. The law of God, is simply the revealed will of the Creator. It was first made known, when the first creature was formed. It required in every creature unqualified submission to the Creator's will, whenever and however that will should be proclaimed. By all the angels in heaven who delight to do their maker's will, it is fully obeyed. It was communicated to man at his creation, requiring from him simply this entire submission to God, and fixing the trial of his obedience upon a single and comparatively unimportant precept. It was revealed anew to the Israelites upon Mount Sinai, with many additional particulars, some of which were entirely national and local. It is as much binding upon every soul, under the gospel, as it was before Jesus appeared as the Saviour of men.

This law governs throughout the universe. It will govern forever. There can be no creature exempted from obedience to it; nor can its authority ever be annulled. While the Creator reigns, every created being will be bound to submit unconditionally to his will, which is his law, however and whenever that will shall be published.

So soon as any being disobeys this law, he comes immediately under condemnation, and is at once a lost and ruined being. He is without protection and without hope. God is turned against him, and none can be on his side.

Thus it was with the angels that sinned. Thus it was with Adam, and thus it is with every man born into the world. None of us are keepers of the law. And therefore the whole family of man have come under the curse, and every man living is condemned by the divine law, as a transgressor against God.

Let it be further remembered that this law cannot be set aside or annulled. It demands an obedience and satisfaction adequate to its own character, and it will not release from condemnation any transgressor who does not produce them. If no such obedience and satisfaction can be obtained by sinners, whether men or angels, no fallen being can be restored or saved.

This is the view which we have taken of the divine law. It is not the Jewish law, nor the command given to Adam particularly. It is the original, divine will of God, requiring simply unqualified submission in his creatures under all the circumstances which he shall see fit to place them.

It was made known in some precepts to Adam, and in others to the Israelites, and in others still by the Lord Jesus. So far as now revealed, it is contained in the Scriptures, which are given by inspiration of God. It may be made known in new precepts, to the creatures of God, throughout eternity: and to whatever labour or duty God shall ever direct,—this universal law will require unconditional obedience.

Neither the gospel then, nor any other dispensation from God, can make void or annul this law,—because whatever is revealed or commanded by him, becomes from that moment a part of his law; and comes to man with the same authority which has attended all previous revelations.

They cannot be inconsistent with the law, because God cannot deny himself; he is always the same, and changes not, nor can his purposes contradict each other.

2. The gospel is a free offer of salvation to man under the condemnation of the law, it was designed as a remedy for existing evil, and was intended to restore the transgressor of the law to his former situation of security and peace. It makes its gracious proposal of salvation, through the sufferings of a divine substitute; it is the annunciation of a Saviour, who has assumed the sinner's place, and rendered for him the obedience and satisfaction which the divine law required.

It is not, then, a system which has originated from another being than the one who gave man his law, and which was intended in its operation to set aside that law: but one which has flowed from the divine lawgiver himself, to restore the violated majesty of his own government, and to provide for man that satisfaction to the law, without which he could never have been saved.

The intelligence of the gospel was first revealed to man after his transgression, as his all-sufficient remedy. It provided salvation for him, and offers it to him freely as a lost creature. But it does not and cannot give him salvation, in opposition to the demands of the law; it first satisfies the law, and makes it perfectly whole, and then freely and fully justifies and saves the sinner whom it had condemned.

Here then is no opposition, but a perfect unity of action, and mutual agreement: As if a creditor should imprison his debtor for default in payment, and another individual should come forward voluntarily to discharge the claim and set the prisoner at liberty, the latter could not be said to be opposed on this ground to the former, or in any way to deny or destroy the legal justice of the claim which he thus discharged, but both would unite in releasing the man whose debt had thus been paid; so while the law of God held man in bondage, as a transgressor of its precepts, and the gospel provides a full discharge of the penalty, and bids the ransomed soul go and sin no more, it does not on this account show itself opposed to the law's demands. It honours the justice of the law by satisfying it fully, and in no degree annuls it.

The same divine being has given the law as the rule for all his creatures, and the gospel as the hope for fallen man. In both these dispensations he is the same, and there is in him no shadow of turning.

When he first created man, he placed him under his law, as he had done all other beings, and when man transgressed the law and sinned against him, and of necessity was condemned by the law, then he revealed his gracious purpose to save him in perfect consistence with the majesty of his own law, and provided and offered a righteousness in the Lord Jesus, with which he was well pleased, and which would magnify the law, and make it honourable.

II. We now proceed to consider the assertion of the text: That the righteousness of the gospel does magnify the law, and make it honourable.

This part of our subject deserves peculiar consideration. In preaching the gospel of the Lord Jesus, we offer a free and full salvation to those whom the law condemns, and that to be obtained simply by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. In such a system we appear to many to set aside the claims of the law, and still more so, when we further state that the law cannot justify any man; that it is not to be observed with any view to obtaining justification by it; that we must not so much as lean upon it in the slighest degree, and that our placing the smallest dependence upon it will invalidate our whole interest in the system of the gospel. In these assertions, we are supposed to be Antinomians in our principles, and our doctrines are thought to be subversive of moral obligations.

It will be remembered that the apostle Paul was obliged to contend with the very same difficulties, and that his doctrines were obnoxious to the very same reproach, and against this reproach he was compelled to vindicate himself in repeated instances.

But what is the real ground which we occupy in this matter? The law you will remember requires perfect obedience to all its commandments. It denounces a curse against every one who shall violate them in the smallest degree. Now it is manifest, that every man living has violated them in ten thousand instances, and is consequently obnoxious to the heaviest judgments. And yet, in preaching the glad tidings of the gospel, we say to those who believe in Jesus Christ, that they have nothing to fear, for there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. Do we in this system of preaching set aside the law, or act in contrariety to its established principles?

This is the point before us. In reply, we say, by no means; we establish, and confirm, and honour the law, to the utmost possible extent. We announce a salvation which God has provided, and in which he is well pleased; which satisfies every legal demand, makes the sinner perfectly secure, and, at the same time, infinitely glorifies the majesty and character of God.

1. The gospel honours and magnifies the law in the voluntary obedience of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It would have been honoured by the personal obedience of man, had he continued upright, as it is by the obedience of the pure spirits of heaven. In the universal submission to God, which is there displayed, the cheerfulness with which all unite to glorify the divine Creator, and the love and communion which is maintained among themselves, the purity and glory of the divine law, are unceasingly beheld. Had man remained in his first estate, such would have been the character of earth; and here, in all the intercourse of men with each other, the perfect law of God would have been the controlling principle. This obedience would have magnified the law, and displayed its wrath. But the voluntary submission of God the Son to its commands, has magnified it far more highly. He over whom it had no control, and whose will constituted the law itself, yielded himself to be commanded by the law, for those who were under its condemnation. His perfect obedience to every precept, is the righteousness with which God declares himself well pleased. As man, he fulfilled every command; from childhood to death he was constituted under the law: he thus wrought out a spotless righteousness, by which the majesty of the law is perfectly sustained, while the subjects of its condemnation are released and set at liberty.

Now, how can the law be more glorified, or set upon higher ground, in the view of the intelligent universe, than by this voluntary humiliation of God himself? With what authority and sanction must it have pressed itself home, upon the thrones, and dominions, and principalities, and powers, in heavenly places, when they beheld such regard paid to it by the Creator himself! The personal obedience of Jesus honours the purity and holiness of the law from its undefiled and spotless character, showing how holy must be that law which was made the rule of such perfection in one who was governed by it. The same obedience also honoured the majesty and authority of the law, because it was the voluntary submission of a being so elevated and glorious, over whom it could have had no necessary control.

2. The gospel honours the law, in the voluntary sufferings of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The righteousness which the law required was not only a righteousness of obedience to its precepts, but of satisfaction also for past transgressions. Had the law been violated, and the transgression remained unpunished, its authority would have been utterly overthrown; instead of being magnified and made honourable, it would have been dishonoured and despised. Had the transgressors of the law all been punished, it would have been honoured, and the Creator would have been seen to be a being glorious in holiness and justice.

But it is far more highly magnified, when the mighty God himself consents to bear its penalties, rather than it should be despised. The sufferings which he sustained were a satisfaction to the violated law. They were the wrath of God against sin. How far they were the same which sinners unpardoned must sustain for themselves, and how far they were only a full equivalent for their sufferings, we cannot precisely determine.

The bodily suffering, the darkness of mind, and the violent death which the Lord endured, were certainly parts of that express penalty which the law had denounced against transgression. While the hatred of God, and the unquenchable despair which are also parts of the sinner's own punishment, were not found in Christ. This question it is not necessary for us to decide. The infinite dignity, and the infinite capacity of the Saviour, affixed a worth and an extent to his sufferings, which made them an equivalent for man. They answered the demands of the law. They made it whole and honourable, and thus opened a way for the salvation of a single sinner, or for all sinners, as one or all should accept the offers of salvation.

Thus the Lord Jesus honoured the justice of the law, and its faithful character, in submitting both to obey and to suffer for man, under its requisitions.

3. The gospel honours the law in the acknowledgment of guilt which it requires every sinner to make, on whom it bestows a pardon. The honour which Jesus gave it, is but a part of that which it receives. The gospel offers mercy to man in a method which requires him to acknowledge the justice of his condemnation under the law, before he can receive it. Every one who asks for pardon, must confess himself a sinner ready to perish. He must not only declare in words, but feel it also deeply in his conscience, that he deserves to be cast into outer darkness, amidst weeping and gnashing of teeth, and if God should avow that he had no pleasure in him, and should refuse for ever to accept him, it would be just and right. He must go to Christ, as one who feels himself exposed to imminent and awful danger, and cry to him for mercy, as a cast-away sinking into destruction everlasting. He is to plead nothing for himself, but the full satisfaction which the obedience and sufferings of the Lord Jesus have made to the demands of the law, and must found his whole hope upon the perfectly sufficient and honourable offering which was thus made. He must not desire that the demands of the law should be lessened even for his salvation. But while he feels condemned, and acknowledges himself to be condemned, he must still proclaim that the commandment which destroys him is just and good. He must acknowledge, that without a righteousness which fully answers the demands of the law, he cannot be, and ought not to be, accepted before God. And while he laments his own inability ever to render this righteousness, he must plead the merit of his incarnate God, as all his salvation and all his desire. Thus, in the very entrance on the way of salvation, the gospel provides for the honouring and magnifying of the law, in the acknowledgments which the sinner makes. It will save none who do not feel and will not confess this guilt and danger under a previous condemnation. There must be a deep humiliation for sin, and conviction of his lost estate in the sinner's mind, before he can obtain pardon in Jesus, and receive the gracious blessings which the gospel offers. Where this state of mind is found, and the sinner comes to plead the obedience of his Saviour for himself, the Lord is well pleased for his righteousness sake, and the law is magnified and made honourable. No precept has been set aside, and no principle has been overturned. The sinner acknowledges the justice of God in his condemnation, while he sues for the exercise of mercy in his forgiveness. And God is consistent with himself, in hearing and answering the penitent's supplication.

4. The gospel honours the law in the new obedience, through which it leads every one whom it has pardoned. It allows none to sin, because grace abounds; but forgives all who seek for pardon, that, as the result of their forgiveness, they may serve God in newness of life, and walk according to his holy will. It is true, the man who has embraced its offers of pardon does not expect that he shall perfectly obey the commands of God; still less does he expect by any such obedience to commend himself to the favour of God. But he has in his heart as a divine gift, the love of holiness, and the desire for holiness; he approves of the precepts of the law in his inner man; he has the law written upon his heart, and the grace of God, which has brought him salvation, teaches him to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world. His whole effort and object in regard to himself is, that he may perfect holiness in the fear of God, and walk in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. Thus the law is magnified and made honourable in his experience and in his character. He has been made free from guilt, that he may be a servant to holiness, and delivered by the gospel from the condemnation of the law, that he may obey and honour it in its precepts; and while he is accepted solely for the righteousness sake of God his Saviour, his whole life is an exertion to be holy as he is holy.

Under these four aspects of the work of the Saviour for the sinner, and of the Spirit in the sinner, we see how perfectly united are these two holy systems from God, and that the later one has established and honoured in a high degree, the one previously revealed. The views which I have given you of these dispensations in the discourses which have now been brought to a conclusion, and the outlines of which I have here recalled, have exhibited this perfect agreement between the divine revelations, as well as the everlasting benefit which arises from them for man, and the glory which they bring to God.

The subjects which we have considered in these lectures, are such, that their importance cannot be overstated; and the more you reflect upon the statements regarding them which I have made, the more will you become convinced, I am sure, that these have been scriptural and just. I have desired to avoid all points of needless controversy among true believers in the gospel, while at the same time I have desired to state most clearly and decidedly what I believe to be the truth of God, however it may be opposed by those who would set aside the spiritual, heart-changing character of the religion of Jesus. I pray you to compare the views which I have presented to you, with the declarations of the divine word; if they speak not according to its testimony, I shall allow there is no truth in them. But the more studiously you make this comparison, the more will you see the accordance of all you have heard with the Lord's sacred communications, and I trust, also, experience their convincing and renewing power in your own souls.

These are the truths which the apostles preached in the demonstration of the Spirit, casting down all man's native pride and wisdom, and exalting the Lord alone, as his righteousness and salvation. They are the truths for which the venerable reformers of the church sacrificed themselves under the hatred of antichristian bigotry. They were embodied by them in the formularies of the whole protestant church, as the doctrine of the oracles of God. In every land in which the power of the reformation was felt, the same system of doctrine was simultaneously drawn from the divine word, and that system is the one which I have attempted to display to you in these discourses. They are, further, the truths which, by all faithful teachers of the gospel of Christ, are proclaimed now in the various denominations of orthodox Christians; the truths by which the doctrine of Christ is triumphing among men, and under which alone the souls of sinners are or can be converted unto God. They are, finally, the truths which our church every where teaches, and by her fidelity in declaring which, she shows her worth to us, and the honour she gives to God. May they be the truths which in this house you shall always hear, as the wisdom of God, and the power of God unto salvation. Prize them as your treasure; cling to them as your hope; proclaim them as the blessed instrument of universal good, and may God cause them to bring forth in you the abundant and eternal fruits of holiness for his sake. And all the glory be to the BLESSED TRINITY, the FATHER, the SON and the HOLY GHOST, ONE GOD, world without end. Amen.

A GENERAL VIEW

OF

IN WHICH

THE UNERRING TRUTH OF THE INSPIRED NARRATIVE OF THE EARLY EVENTS IN THE WORLD IS EXHIBITED, AND DISTINCTLY PROVED, BY THE CORROBORATIVE TESTIMONY OF PHYSICAL FACTS, ON EVERY PART OF THE EARTH'S SURFACE.

BY GEORGE FAIRHOLME, Esq.

PREFACE.

In presenting the following pages to the judgment of the world, I have reason to fear, that the very title of the work will excite, in the minds of some, feelings by no means favourable to an unprejudiced perusal of it.

I am fully aware of the objections which have frequently been raised to the endeavours to connect physical facts with the details of scripture; and I am, also, aware of the mischief that has sometimes ensued to the cause of religion, from the imprudent or unskilful defence made by those whose wishes and intentions were the most friendly to it.

The course of every science must be progressive; beginning in faint attempts to dissipate the obscurity of ignorance, and gradually advancing towards the full light of truth. To this usual course, the science of geology cannot be considered as an exception, having already passed through some of its early stages, which were avowedly marked with obscurity and error. During these stages of geological ignorance, I am free to admit, that the attempt to connect the supposed discoveries in the physical phenomena of the earth, with the truths announced to us in the sacred record, could not but tend to injure either the one cause or the other; because, it is impossible that any concord can exist between truth and error. In this case it unfortunately happened that the assertions of philosophy were uttered with such boldness, and so supported by the deceptious evidence of physical facts, seen under a false light, that it was difficult for the supporters of revelation, ignorant, as they generally were, of the nature of these facts, to hold their ground with success, or not to weaken their own cause by an apparent failure in its support.

The necessity which has, however, been acknowledged, of rejecting the geological theories of those days, opposed, as they were, to the Mosaical History, was, therefore, a fair source of hope and encouragement to such as advocated the unerring character of Inspired Scripture. It, at least, left that Mosaic Narrative uninjured by the assault; and encouraged a hope, that, as in all other cases, the truth would finally appear and prevail.

It has been well remarked, by the able author of a work which has lately appeared, full of information, and written upon the soundest principles,—"It is now thirty-five years since my attention was first directed to these considerations. It was then the fashion for science, and for a large part of the educated and inquisitive world, to rush into a disbelief of all written Revelation; and several geological speculations were directed against it. But I have lived to see the most hostile of these destroyed by their own as hostile successors; and to observe, that nothing, which was of this character, however plausible at the moment of its appearance, has had any duration in human estimation, not even among the sceptical."*

Of late years, accordingly, fact after fact has been gradually accumulating; each tending to temper the wild character of an hypothetical philosophy; and every day produces some new evidence of the hasty and erroneous conclusions from physical facts, to which the friends of Revelation had found it too often necessary to succumb.

Each of these errors in philosophy has been a source of triumph to the cause of truth; and the time is gradually approaching, if it be not yet fully come, when the trial must be brought to a positive issue, and when those undeniable physical facts, seen in a new and more correct light, will lend their aid to the support instead of to the destruction of our confidence in scripture; and when the simplicity and consistency of the geology of Scripture, will make us regard with astonishment and contempt, schemes that could so long have exerted so powerful an influence over our reason and understanding.

I am not vain enough to suppose that I am myself qualified to bring about so desirable an end: but, as it is the duty of every one to lend a hand to the demolition of ERROR, and to the encouragement of TRUTH, I propose, in the following pages, to endeavour, in as clear and concise a manner as the subject will admit of, to account for the geological structure of the upper surface of our earth; taking the Mosaical History for my guiding star, to be kept constantly in view throughout my course.

A great part of my object will be attained, if I can succeed in bringing any one of those able minds, who are now so influential in the geological world, to view, in the same light as myself, the phenomena presented to our examination on the earth. I am persuaded, that many of those individuals, so distinguished in science, are not so wedded to a party or theory, as not to acknowledge and retract an error in judgment, if they are convinced of its existence.

Amongst the many unquestionable physical facts, therefore, which I hope to be able to produce in the course of this treatise, supporting, in a remarkable manner, the Sacred History of the early events in the world, should any thing be found sufficiently strong, and sufficiently pointed, to shake the foundations of many of the present received opinions in geology, I hope that some one, or more, of those gifted individuals, may be found with sufficient candour to retrace his steps, and to lend the aid of a powerful and active mind to the cause of Revelation.

It is, however, to be feared, that there are many geologists, (if indeed they are deserving of the name,) whose great delight in this subject arises from the play of fancy its consideration, under a false view, gives rise to; and who would, consequently, be unwilling to yield so pleasing a source of argument and hypothesis to the plain and simple course of events which the Mosaical History unfolds.

Notwithstanding, however, the opposition I may meet with from such theorists, and in the absence of more able advocates for the support of this view of the subject, I propose to follow the course I have laid down; and I feel perfectly confident, that any failure in the proposed plan will not arise from the defective nature of the plan itself, or from the materials within my reach for the completion of it; but merely from the inability of the builder, which defect may, at any time, be remedied, by the same materials being placed in the hands of a more able, though not more zealous advocate for the cause of truth.

It must, however, be kept in view, that it is not the object of this treatise to enter minutely, or in detail, into the nature and history of each particular formation in the upper strata of the earth. We must first lay a solid foundation for our views, by an enlarged and general system; and when this great and primary object has been perfectly attained, we may then, with safety, examine in detail the many interesting objects presented to our inspection, without, at any time, however, losing sight of the great first principles by which we had found it expedient to be guided in our course. We may thus hope to be led, by the full light of day, through those devious paths, over which so complete a twilight has hitherto been spread; and we shall, undoubtedly, have the gratification of finding, that the same dignified simplicity and truth which have always been remarked as the characteristics of the other parts of Inspired Scripture, are not less remarkable, in the concise but emphatic details of the early events of the world.

INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER.

The very high interest and importance of the history of the globe which we inhabit, will be admitted by all whose minds are capable of entering beyond a mere superficial consideration of the objects around us; and the principles of curiosity, and the innate love of truth, so inherent in the human mind, lead us, step by step, from the consideration of objects themselves, to the GREAT FIRST CAUSE from whence all things have originally sprung.

I have always felt an ardent desire to study, and endeavour to follow up, the theories which, from time to time, have been formed by philosophy, respecting the original formation and subsequent changes of the globe which sustains us; and [illegible] every thing that has been advanced on those important subjects. In the course of repeated travels over a great part of Europe, I have also had many opportunities of practically forming a judgment of the more visible and tangible evidences adduced in support of those theories. I have never felt, however, either on the subject of the primitive or secondary formations of geology, that firm conviction of the truth of the doctrines taught by the great leaders in science, which is the necessary consequence to be looked for in sound and truly logical reasoning. In the very opening of the subject, in treating of the mode of first formations, and in the numerous revolutions which are said subsequently to have left unquestionable traces upon the earth, I have never found any argument advanced which did not leave the mind in a bewildered and uncertain state; and in but too many of the theories of philosophy on these subjects, we find opinions broached by the very ablest men, so extraordinary, and so repulsive to our reason and common sense, that we are compelled at once to reject them, and not without losing, at the same time, some portion of that high respect, with which a sound philosophy ought always to inspire us.

In the course of these studies, I have never been able to exclude from my mind those lights and beacons held out, as it were, for our guidance, in tracing the more obscure portions of the history of the earth, by the inspired writings, of the truth of which, on other subjects, the unprejudiced mind can entertain not a shadow of doubt, strengthened as they are by the great and wonderful events which have been foretold in prophecy, and, subsequently, literally fulfilled in history.

"The great problem of creation has been said to be, 'Mat[illegible]' and the presumption of man has often led him to attempt the solution of this absurd problem. At first, philosophers contented themselves with reasoning on the traditional or historical accounts they had received; but it is irksome to be shackled by authority, or for the learned to be content with the same degree of information on so important a subject as the most ignorant of the people. After having acquired, therefore, a smattering of knowledge, philosophy began to imagine that it could point out a much better way of forming the world, than that which had been transmitted by the consenting voice of antiquity.—Epicurus was most distinguished among the ancients in this work of reformation, and produced a theory on the principle of a fortuitous concourse of atoms, the extravagant absurdity of which has alone preserved it from oblivion. From his day to the present time, there has been a constant succession of systems and theories of the earth, which are now swallowed up by those of a chaotic geology, founded on chemistry; the speculations of which have been attended with many useful results, in so far as they proceed on the principles of induction; but when applied to solve the problem of creation, or the mode of first formations, will only serve, like the systems of their forerunners of antiquity, to demonstrate the ignorance and presumption of man."*

Unfortunately for the cause of truth, and of sound philosophy, the study of geology was begun, at no very distant period, in a school where the only history which could be consulted on such a subject was neglected and despised, on points incomparably more important than scientific inquiries. We cannot, therefore, feel surprise, that the philosophy of that period should have excluded from its view the concise but most important geological information given us in the first part of the Mosaical history.

Misled by the theories of the earth set forth by the continental philosophy and infidelity, theories so wild and absurd, that sober reason now looks upon them with contempt; many zealous and able men of our own country have been hurried away by the torrent, and have been induced to follow out their own researches, under the delusive and prejudiced impressions of their early studies.

Even some of the most learned divines, without any knowledge of geology, have considered themselves bound, in translating and explaining the sacred record, to submit to the dictates of philosophy, and by taking liberties with the original text, which would not be tolerated in translating any classic author, have thus unintentionally aided the cause of scepticism and unbelief. They have admitted a doubt upon a great and fundamental point, in which the inspired history, fairly translated, directly opposes them; viz. in conceding to the theories of philosophy the duration of the six days of the creation. As it was contrary to these theories to admit the perfect CREATION of all things, at the first, by an Almighty Power, it became necessary to search for such secondary causes, as would, by the mere laws of nature, as they are called, have produced the primitive rocks, as we now find them.* These supposed causes were discovered in chemistry; and as it was found by chemists that various substances, under certain circumstances, formed themselves into crystals, and, by geologists, that granite, and other primitive rocks, had a crystalline appearance and formation, it was assumed as a fact, assisted by the heathen notion of a chaos, that all matter once existed in a confused and imperfect mass, from which, in the course of some indefinitely long period of time, our globe, in all its crystalline beauty, must have formed itself. We are no where informed by this chaotic philosophy whence the material atoms, of which this imperfect compound was formed, were produced; how the liquid mass was held together before the laws of attraction and of gravity were ordained; or by what power the laws of nature, by which crystallization takes place, were first instituted.

By some philosophers of the French school, this theory of gradual perfection was extended even to animated beings. They considered that life, in its lowest shape, was first generated in this fermenting mass, and that the present variety and perfection, so remarkable in the animal world, gradually arose from those species of marine creatures called zoophytes, resembling, as their name denotes, the order of plants. It is not easy to determine the original ground-work for so extraordinary and impious a theory; but it probably arose, in some degree, from the erroneous conclusions from fossil remains, which have been the fertile cause of so much misconception during the last century. It has been remarked by geologists, that the only fossil remains of animated beings to be found in the earliest secondary rocks, are of this description of zoophytes; and it has therefore been concluded as a positive fact, that zoophytes were the first and most imperfect of animated beings, from which, by a living principle in nature, all other improvements have gradually sprung up. It may easily be imagined to what absurdities such theories must have led, and from them we may trace the systems of Lamarck, who held, amongst others, the following extraordinary opinions. He considered that all the forms of animated beings, as they now exist, must have been gradually developed, as their wants and necessities demanded. For instance, the deer, and the antelope tribe, had not originally the delicate forms and nimble activity they now display; these qualities were produced by the necessity of flying from their enemies, and of seeking safety by rapid flight. The aquatic birds and beasts having webbed feet to assist them in swimming, had no such helps in their primitive condition, but by constant action and exertion of the toes, the membrane connecting them at length became extended. But one of the most whimsical of these ideas, perhaps, relates to the unusual length of neck exhibited by the cameleopard, which is described as being originally much like other animals; but by the habit of feeding on branches of trees, it gradually assumed the form we now look upon with admiration. Such glaring absurdities as these have long ceased to find supporters; but it is no less certain that the idea of gradual creation, or production of successive species of animated beings, is still to be found in the principles of our modified philosophy; and that the tribe of zoophytes, or sea animals, resembling plants in their form, is still looked upon as the first link in the great animated chain. It will, therefore, not be considered unworthy of our attention, if we take a more extended view of the argument, and endeavour to show that such an arrangement in nature is not only derogatory in the highest degree from the Almighty power and wisdom, but completely at variance with a correct view of the animal kingdom. We find it correctly stated in the following extract from one of the most instructive and able works of our times, that the various tribes of zoophytes subsist upon the minute species of animalcula, so abundant in the sea as well as in all the other waters of the earth, and which have been called infusoria, from the well known circumstance that scarcely any vegetable substance can be infused in pure water, without, in a short time, exhibiting, under the microscope, myriads of such wonders of the creative power and wisdom. "Zoophytes appear to feed principally on infusoria, (or sea animalcula,) and they required ONLY the existence of that class to prepare the sea for their creation. Their remains form the oldest fossil animals met with in the strata of the earth."*

The latter part of this passage, from the pen of a learned professor, shows that its author directly pointed towards the above mentioned notion, grounded on French philosophy, although the case is not expressly stated in words; but, as in all similar doctrines of an unsound philosophy, this passage contains the antidote as well as the poison, for it fixes upon a class of animated beings as food for this first link of the animated chain, of all the wonders of creative wisdom, that which is, perhaps, best calculated to excite our most profound admiration.

That all created beings present to our admiring view a great chain of various parts, each link connected with its fellow by easy shades of similarity of structure, is a fact admitted by the most cursory student in this wonderful book. But what link of this chain is to be looked upon as less wonderful, or incomprehensible, in its origin, than another? And if, which it would be difficult to do, we can discover one more imperfect than another, for the performance of the great ends to which it is decreed, are we to fix upon this apparent imperfection as the first attempt and failure of the Almighty hand? The wonders displayed by the microscope ought for ever to obliterate from our minds any such impious and unworthy notions. That instrument exhibits to us the great fact, that if perfection of design, combined with what we consider difficulty in formation, is to be looked for in the creation, it is amongst the minutest of the insect tribe that we shall find displayed the most wonderful wisdom of the Creator. All that the most profound genius is capable of inventing, presents but a feeble image of the structure and actions of these minute creatures; and yet the tribe of zoophytes, as the most imperfect of created animals, "ONLY required the existence of the class infusoria to prepare the sea for their creation!" Such ideas of imperfection in the works of the Almighty, are quite unworthy of our enlightened times; and the streams of knowledge flow to little purpose, if the head-springs are tainted with such impurities.

Our notions of the power of the Creator never can be more elevated than in contemplating the more minute portions of the animated chain, the wonders of which make it appear as if he wished to veil his most perfect works from human eyes, and to lavish them on beings the most obscure, and, in appearance, the most vile; for, according to our finite and imperfect ideas, there would be less difficulty (if we may so speak of the works of the Almighty,) in forming the large members of the whale, or of the elephant, than the delicate fibres and minute vessels of the gnat or of the spider. But as we descend in the scale of magnitude, we seem to ascend in that of perfection and incomprehensible difficulty; for by the aid of the microscope, we discover new wonders at every step of our investigations, and find that our unassisted vision can perceive but one half of the living beings which adorn the earth. The mind is lost in wonder, and is incapable of conceiving what the tongue can so easily express, that there are, in almost all fluids, animals as perfect as ourselves in bodily structure and action, so minute, that it would require millions of them to form the compass of one single grain of sea sand?* But when we thus arrive at the verge of power in our instruments, we have still no reason to conclude that we have reached the utmost limit of animated creation. Future instruments may possibly exhibit wonders as great as those we are now considering; and we thus find, as astronomers have done in the opposite extremity, that we can discover no bounds to creative power and wisdom.

* In the understanding which has, in a manner, been tacitly agreed upon in science, carefully to exclude every allusion to the Deity, in the contemplation of his works, we constantly find the unmeaning name of nature introduced, even in pages where the admiration of HER works would make it appear impossible to avoid an acknowledgment of him from whom all things have arisen. In a posthumous treatise by Milton, we find the following just reflections on this subject.—"Though there be not a few who deny the existence of God, for 'the fool hath said in his heart, there is no God,' (Psal. xiv.) yet the Deity has imprinted on the human mind so many unquestionable tokens of himself, and so many traces of him are found throughout the whole creation, that no one in his senses can long remain ignorant of the truth. There are some who pretend that nature, or fate, is the supreme power; but the very name of nature implies that it must owe its birth to some prior agent; and fate can be nothing but a Divine decree, emanating from some superior power."

We must, however, in justice admit, that, in the minds of many, the exclusion above alluded to has been acceded to with the very best intention, though this admission may be looked upon as a proof of that very tone in philosophy in general, which is so often opposed to the great truths of Revelation; for, in the obscurities under which many of the phenomena of creation are still viewed, and under the impression of such obscure and erroneous theories as have been put forth by philosophy, men of the soundest faith must have found themselves so constantly involved in contradiction to the records of inspiration, in the course of their scientific researches, that it would be found more advantageous to the cause of religion to accede to this entire exclusion, than to confound and shatter both, by such continual collision as must occur, till the views of creation become more enlightened, and complete concord is established between Revelation and the phenomena of the world around us. This desirable and inevitable concord is every day advancing with rapid strides; for, however the theories of philosophy may change, the Rock of Revelation stands for ever immovably fixed.

It may also be remarked, that the balance of animal and vegetable productions is so admirably arranged, that the removal of any one link would serve to throw the whole chain into confusion. We come, then, in conclusion, to the same point from whence we at first set out, viz. that zoophytes could not exist without the animals on which they feed; and as the same may be concluded, with regard to any other individual species, that all must have been the spontaneous creation of an Almighty power, at one and the same period, and not a gradual production, by the mere laws of nature. We shall have a future opportunity of showing why zoophytes could not but be the earliest fossil productions found in the secondary strata of the earth.

The supposed chemical process, however, which we were before considering, must have required a much longer period than the inspired writings have given us, to bring it to perfection. The days of the Mosaical history, (which history never could be entirely excluded from the minds of men,) with their evenings and their mornings, were, therefore, forced into the indefinite periods necessary for the operation.

Geologists, without any knowledge of the original text, and learned men, without any knowlege of geology, have, therefore, unintentionally formed a species of coalition, the effects of which strike deep into the very root of our confidence in scripture, and sap the foundation on which our belief in the Omnipotence and Omniscience of an Almighty Creator ought to be founded.

With whatever pleasure and interest, then, we may follow the more plausible theories of secondary formations on the surface of the earth, it appears impossible for our reason to enter, even in the slightest degree, into the hypothetical systems taught by the highest scientific authorities with regard to first formations. We are taught, both by scripture and by our reason, that the earth, as but a small part of an immense sytem, was intended as a temporary abode for immortal souls in their mortal bodies. We have no reason to suppose that we are misled by history, when we are informed that but a very few thousands of years have elapsed since the creation of mankind: we are taught to believe, from what we read in a part of scripture, which it is not so much the object of science to dispute, that a very considerable portion of the historical events of the world has already passed away, and, consequently, we may infer, that the scene on which we now act a part, will not be of immense duration. Now, in considering the laws by which events are brought about, and the changes of this world are effected, we never discover so great a disproportion between the means and the end, as would be the case, if we admit, with but two many geologists, that millions of years may have been necessary for the preparation and ripening of this earth from chaos, to fit it up as a stage on which so brief a drama was to be acted. This is one of the first difficulties our reason has to encounter in considering the gradual formation of the globe from secondary causes: but our difficulties are only then beginning, for even if we admit this theory, we do not, in the least degree, advance towards the object of our search; we are as far as ever removed from a GREAT FIRST CAUSE, to which our reason is as true as the magnet to its pole. We cannot close our eyes upon the great truth so deeply impressed upon our minds by every thing around us, that, even admitting a chaos, that chaos must have been CREATED in all its component parts. The chemist, in his laboratory, may compound the various substances and fluids, from the qualities of which he is aware that crystals will be formed; but he is obliged to exercise the knowledge acquired from study and experience, and to apply the heat necessary for their formation. Although he may thus form the compound, can he create the materials of it? Though he may produce crystals, can he enact a law by which these beautiful forms shall be arranged? No. The potter may form the vessel, but he cannot create the clay.

Amongst the many inextricable difficulties in which we become involved, by a departure from the guidance of the sacred record, and by supposing, with the continental philosophy, that the solid globe was a chemical crystalline deposit from an aqueos chaos, we have to overcome this certain fact in these same laws of nature; viz. that as we know of no other source of heat, and, consequently, of fluidity on our globe, and, probably, in the other members of the solar system, than the sun; as we know that there are parts of our planet around the poles where no water can exist in a fluid state, for the greater part, if not the whole of the year, from the absence of that sun's influence, nor, indeed, ever could have existed since the solar system was arranged; and as we know that without that solar influence no fluidity could exist on any part of the earth's surface, by the mere laws of nature, (as even mercury becomes solid at a higher temperature than exists at the poles,) how are we to suppose a chaotic AQUEOUS fluid, held together in empty space, and without the melting influence of a sun, which, consistently with this philosophy, we must conclude was not yet precipitated or crystallized into perfection within its own chaos; for if we adopt the chaotic principle, with regard to our own planet, we cannot, in fairness, refuse it to the other heavenly bodies.

In adopting secondary causes, then, or the theory of the formation of the earth by the mere laws of nature from an aqueous chaos, we must account for fluidity without heat, an effect without a cause, and directly opposed to all the known laws of nature.*

In advocating, then, the chaotic philosophy, we must account for the creation of the crude materials of which that chaos must have been composed, and also for those wonderful laws to which matter has been subjected, and by which it is forced to assume those crystalline forms which we so much admire; and being thus forced to acknowledge a Creator so wise and powerful as to be able to form even a chaos out of nothing, ("for if God did not create the first thing, then there is something besides Him that was never made, and then there are two Eternals,"†) we come to the consideration of his power to create things in a more perfect form. We find that created matter is divided into three kingdoms, as they have been called, of animal, vegetable and mineral: there are few who would now dispute that the first and second of these great divisions must have been at first formed in a perfect and mature state, although both have since been submitted to laws, through which they must pass from the embryo state to perfection. We cannot for a moment suppose the first man to have been once an infant, or the first oak tree to have

* The author has lately had an opportunity of demonstrating, in the most unequivocal manner, that it would require from one to three millions of some active animalcula to form the bulk of a grain of sand. This distinct measurement is made by means of a vegetable graduated fibre, accidentally discovered in a greenish scum on a gravel walk.

* The greatest degree of natural cold that has hitherto been observed in the open air, is about 50 degrees below zero; but at the actual poles, and more especially at the south pole, which is surrounded by ice, and inaccessible by ships for upwards of 1000 miles on all sides, is, probably, at a much lower temperature. Mercury freezes at 39 degrees below zero, and then becomes malleable like any other metal. Thus, at the poles, mercury never could have existed in a fluid state, any more than water; and the strongest spirits are frozen at a still higher temperature.

"All substances in nature, as far as we know them, occur in one or other of three states; that of solids, of liquids, or of elastic fluids.

"In a vast number of cases the same substance is capable of assuming each of these states in succession. Thus, sulphur is usually solid, but at 218 degrees it becomes a liquid, and at 570 degrees it boils, and is converted into an elastic fluid. Water is a liquid, but at 32 degrees it freezes into a solid, while at 212 degrees it boils into an elastic fluid.

"All solids (a very few excepted) may be converted into liquids by heating them sufficiently; and almost all liquids by cooling them sufficiently, may be converted into solids. The law of nature then, is, that solids by heat are converted into liquids and elastic fluids; while elastic fluids and liquids by cold are brought into the state of solids."—Edin. Encyclop. Chemistry, p. 36.

"From what has been advanced respecting the situation, properties and manner of formation of the ice surrounding the pole, we may naturally conclude that a continent of ice-mountains may exist in regions near the pole, yet unexplored, the nucleus of which may be as ancient as the earth itself, and its increase derived from the sea and atmosphere combined."—Scoresby's Arctic Reg. vol. ii. p. 319.

† LETTER FROM JEREMY TAYLOR, TO JOHN EVELYNE, ESQ.

"To your question, 'How it appears that God made all things out of nothing,' I answer, it is demonstrably certain, or else there is no God. For if there be a God, he is the one principle: but if he did not make the first thing, then there is something besides him that was never made, and then there are two Eternals. Now, if God made the first thing, he made it of nothing.

"Your obliged and affectionate servant,

sprung from an acorn, though all subsequent individuals, in both species, must now pass through these stages. If this perfection of form is admitted, then, in the first creation of the animal and vegetable world, are we to suppose that the mineral productions of the earth were exceptions from this rule? or that a Being so wise and so powerful as to be able to create a man or a tree, with all the wonderful contrivance and design discoverable in each, and above all, endued with a living principle, was yet obliged to form an imperfect mass, and to wait the fermenting or crystallizing process from which its more perfect form was to arise? The idea is revolting to reason; and when we have rejected it as improbable, as impossible, then comes inspiration, with its lofty and imposing simplicity, to assist our weak understandings, and to assure us that "in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

Having, by this line of reasoning, come to the conclusion that the theory of a chaos, or imperfect formation of the earth, is not only contrary to our reason, but also in direct opposition to history, our belief in the truth of the inspired writings is strengthened and confirmed; and we feel equally disposed to question those theories of philosophy which account for the present appearances and stratifications on the earth's surface, by a numerous succession of accidents and revolutions which are supposed by some to have occurred previous to the creation or production of mankind, but subsequent to the earth's having assumed that perfect crystalline form we now discover in the primitive rocks. The demand for time is here again advanced by geologists, who support this theory of alternate revolutions; and as time is as nothing in eternity, they make whatever draughts they have occasion for upon this inexhaustible fund. It appears that history, as well as the consideration of the present course of things upon the earth, are equally considered as nothing in this philosophy. The minerals of the earth have been likened to coins stamped with unknown or difficult characters; and it is the business of the geologist, as of the antiquary, to decipher and arrange them in chronological order. But as it may safely be presumed that the antiquary would make little advance in his work, if he neglected to consult such histories as were within his reach, so we may come to the same conclusion with regard to the geologist. Ancient coins, minerals or fossils are all equally unintelligible, if we have no guide from history to lead us to an explanation of them.

In entering, then, upon our geological inquiries, it appears the more natural course to proceed upwards, from material things as they are now presented to our senses, to the First Great Cause, by which alone they could have been produced; and then, consulting such history as may be within our reach, to retrace our steps downwards, from the beginning of all things to the present time.* We may thus entertain a confident hope that all the appearances on the surface of the earth, upon which the theories of philosophy have been founded, may be accounted for by an attentive and unprejudiced, and above all, a docile consideration of the three great events recorded in history, viz. the creation of the earth; the formation of a bed for the primitive sea, with the natural causes acting within that sea for upwards of sixteen centuries; and, lastly, the deluge, with its crowd of corroborative witnesses, together with the subsequent action of natural causes from that time to the present day, or for upwards of four thousand years.

With regard to the character of Moses himself, and the books of scripture which were written by him, under the guidance of inspiration, by which alone he could have pronounced the remarkable prophecies which were afterwards so strictly fulfilled, it would not be to my purpose in this place to enter into discussion. It is enough to say that he is acknowledged by all as the most ancient historian whose works have come down to our times; and that the frequent notice taken of him by ancient writers, would serve to confirm the truth of his own narrative, even if events foretold did not vouch for his veracity.

If the great events thus recorded in the inspired writings, with all their necessary consequences, were as studiously adopted as foundations to build upon, as they have hitherto been studiously set aside in geology, we should soon find in all classes, ardent students in this most interesting science. But when an ordinary mind, anxiously searching after truth, finds itself launched into a sea of clouds and thick darkness, without star or compass as a guide, it must either desperately proceed from doubt to infidelity, under the guidance of unassisted reason and philosophy, or must give up the subject in despair of ever reaching the desired object; happy if it escape the too common taint of unbelief on points incomparably more important than geology. For if the sacred scriptures are the unerring dictates of divine inspiration, which prophecy so fully determines, we must consider them as infallible in every point. If, on the contrary, we find at the very threshold a statement demonstrably FALSE, we should have the strongest possible ground for refusing our belief to the subsequent history.

"Infidels have always imagined, and believers have too generally conceded, that the Mosaic account of the early ages of the world is the weakest of the outworks of Christianity. But, on the contrary, we may be persuaded that the firmest ground which even a philosophical believer can take, is the Mosaic record."—Edin. Encyclop. Antediluvian.

It is in vain we look for this line of reasoning in the works of those who are generally considered the great leaders in science. Both parties into which geologists have ranged themselves, the supporters of the theories of fire and of water, are equally opposed to the simple and unadorned narrative of the sacred historian; and both parties have, consequently, led themselves and their followers into an inextricable maze on the subject of primitive formations. It is, indeed, a melancholy proof, if any such were wanting, of the natural turpitude of the human mind, that notwithstanding the bright instances which have been and still are found in the opposite scale, so large a portion of those who search deepest into, and who ought, therefore, to be best acquainted with, the works of the Creator, have been so little inclined to give him the credit due to his omnipotence and wisdom, that philosophy and scepticism have been but too often and too justly looked upon as almost synonymous terms. What advances have been made in every branch of science and of arts since the days of Newton, and even since those of the great Linnæus! yet we do not always find a proportioned increase either in faith or in religious zeal. Any attempt to mix up science with religion has, indeed, been openly condemned by many able writers; yet the time, it is to be hoped, will come, when the Linnæan systems will be followed, as well in religion as in its union with the knowledge of the works of the Creator. The great and good Linnæus lost no opportunity of expatiating on the wisdom and goodness of the Almighty. In such expressions of admiration his breast seemed to glow with warmth, and he became truly eloquent.*

"Awake, upon the earth," exclaims he, "I have contemplated an immense, eternal, all-powerful, and omniscient God! I have seen him, and fallen prostrate in astonishment at his very shadow. I have sought out his steps in the midst of his creatures, even amongst the most imperceptible. What power! what wisdom! what inexpressible perfection! I have observed the animals nourished by vegetables; these, again, by earthly bodies; the earth rolling in its unalterable orb round the sun, the burning source of its life; the sun itself, turning on its axis, with the planets that surround it, forming, with the other stars, indefinite in number, an immense and boundless system. All is ruled by the Incomprehensible Prime Mover, the Being of Beings, as Aristotle has called him, the Cause of Causes, the Eternal Architect of his magnificent work."

Even the heathen philosophers have set us an example on these great and important points, which the most humble Christians must acknowledge with admiration. "Do you call him Fatality? you are not wrong," says Seneca, "as every thing depends upon him. Do you prefer him under the name of Nature? you are right; all things are born from him. If you name him Providence, you are equally right; for by his orders and councils the world displays its wonders. He is all eye, all ear, all soul, all life; and human intellect is incapable of comprehending his immensity." "That Being," says the same heathen, "that Cause of Causes, without whom nothing exists, who has constructed and organized all things; who is every where present, and yet escapes our view; has veiled his August Majesty in a retreat so holy and impenetrable, that it is in thought alone that we can reach it.

In a beautiful hymn of Cleanthes, as preserved by Sto-

* In the sixteenth century, the astronomer, John Kepler, of Wirtemburg, presented a work full of wild theory, to the great Tycho Brahe, who, after perusing it, returned it with the following advice:—"First, lay a solid foundation for your views by actual observation; and then, by ascending from these, strive to reach the causes of things." The whole philosophy of Bacon was thus compressed, by anticipation, into one short sentence.

* This great naturalist and philosopher inscribed over the door of his lecture room at Upsal:

bæus, we find the following sublime address to the Deity, under the title of Jupiter:

"O God, from whom all gifts descend, who sitt-th in thi-k darkness, dispel all ignorance from the mind of man; deign to enlighten his soul, draw it to that eternal reason which serves as thy guide and support in the government of the world; so that, honoured with a portion of this light, we may, in our turn, be able to honour thee, by celebrating thy great works unceasingly in a hymn. This is the proper duty of man. For surely nothing can be more delightful to the inhabitants of the earth, than to celebrate that Divine Reason which presides over the world."

To such magnificent acknowledgments of a true God, by those whom we call heathens, we may add the beautiful creed of the great Pliny: "We must believe," says he, "that there exists an Eternal, Infinite, and Uncreated Divinity."

The light of day, however, begins to dawn upon this philosophic night; and there are many whose eyes begin to be opened, by the very excesses of hypothesis which have been promulgated by their scientific leaders. The great end of the study of geology ought to be, a moral, rather than a scientific one; the numerous practical and economical uses to be derived from it, should be, comparatively, subordinate, and would be fully gained in the course of the inquiry. The study carried on upon this principle in the present day, when science has made such rapid advances, as to have, as it were, shed a new light upon our benighted minds, would have the effect of settling our fluctuating opinions, which may have been shaken by the suggestions of a false philosophy. Let but a small portion of the brilliant talent be displayed on the science, viewed in this light, that has been expended and lost in hypothetical reasoning for the last half century, and we may confidently trust, that the coalition thus formed between science and religion, will bid defiance to the utmost efforts of infidelity and scepticism.*

POSTSCRIPT.

Since this work was completed, the "Principles of Geology," by Mr. Lyell, have appeared; a work of very great talent, and full of interesting research and information on the secondary causes in constant action upon the earth. This able writer has, however, taken, in some respects, a new line of theory, and is as desirous of accounting for the phenomena on the surface of the earth, without the aid of any unusual or preternatural convulsion, as other geologists have been to press into their service a constant repetition of deluges and disasters. He sets out upon the principle of Playfair, "that amid all the revolutions of the globe, the economy of nature has been uniform, and her laws are the only things that have resisted the general movement. The rivers and the rocks, the seas and the continents, have changed in all their parts; but the laws which direct those changes, and the rules to which they are subject, have remained invariably the same."—Title Page.

Thus we find, that while Cuvier inculcates the doctrine of numerous deluges, alternately of salt and of fresh water, Mr. Lyell endeavours to account for all things without the aid of any general deluge, though he considers local deluges as amongst the ordinary occurrences of nature, and producing violent local effects. The Mosaic deluge appears to be looked upon either as a fable, or as a less general catastrophe, than it is usually conceived to have been; and, as a supporter of the Mosaic account of it, it is probable that I shall be classed among those "physico-theological writers," who, in the early days of science, wrote, it is true, but little worthy of saving them from the contempt with which they are here treated.

As may easily be conceived of a theory wherein all things are to be accounted for by the slow and gradual march of natural secondary causes, Mr. Lyell's system requires an unlimited period of time for its completion; and in tracing the errors into which other philosophers have fallen, he thinks there can be no wonder if such should be the case, when hundreds of years are often reckoned instead of thousands, and thousands instead of millions. Mr. Lyell accounts for the elevation of mountain ridges, by successive up-heavings of volcanic force, small in degree, but of frequent repetition; and, having time at command, he finds no difficulty in this process.

But notwithstanding this theoretical argument in the "Principles of Geology," so distinctly opposed by so many facts in nature; and, with regard to at least one deluge, so totally opposed to history, and the traditions of all nations, Mr. Lyell has taken a very learned and extended view of secondary causes and of secondary formations. On the evidences to be derived from the fossil remains of quadrupeds, however, he has encountered the same difficulties as professor Buckland, without having succeeded in throwing any greater degree of light on the obscurities of that subject. His mode of accounting for the remains of elephants in the icebergs of the polar seas, and for the other tropical remains of animals and vegetables over the temperate and polar regions, proceeds upon the same principle, and is open to the same glaring objections as the theories of Dr. Buckland and baron Cuvier.

With regard, however, to the actual age of the world, and the actually short period during which secondary causes have been in action on the portions of the globe we now inhabit, we may safely refer the subject to the powerful evidence produced in such abundance, and with so much industry, by this author himself. I have had occasion in a note, in another part of this treatise, (see Chapter V.) to notice the startling facts produced by Mr. Lyell, with respect to the quantity of mud daily imported into the sea by the single river, the Ganges: it is there admitted by Mr. Lyell, that even at the lowest estimate, viz. one part in a hundred, of mud, in the waters of that river, there is imported daily into the Bay of Bengal, "a mass more than equal in weight and bulk to the great pyramid of Egypt."* It does not suit the theory of Mr. Lyell to admit the correctness of major Rennell's estimate, in which it is shown, with much clearness, that the daily deposit of that single river, in the flood season, instead of only once, is nearly equal to SEVENTY-FOUR times the weight of that gigantic monument. If we even divide the difference between these two authors, and admit the amount to be not more than than from thirty to forty times the size of the pyramid per day, and if we extend our view of a similar action to all the rivers of the earth, and then consider the comparative actual extent of the whole mass of secondary formations over the surface of the primitive globe, we shall at once perceive that such violent transporting powers, acting for a million of years, must have produced a mass of secondary formations, infinitely greater than what actually exists upon the earth, which may, probably, be considered as of not greater medium thickness than about one mile. But one million of years is not sufficient for those who advocate the view of the subject adopted by Mr. Lyell; no author of that school has ever yet been able to bound his views within any nameable period; and we may, with much truth, transpose their own animadversion, and consider it as not very wonderful if they find themselves involved in inextricable confusion and difficulty, when they calculate upon thousands of years, instead of hundreds, and millions instead of thousands.

Our ideas of the real extent of objects on the Earth's Surface often erroneous.—True height of Mountains.—Depths of the Ocean.—Of Mines.—Of Volcanic Foci.—Eruptions of Mud containing Fish.—Volcanoes only in Secondary Formations.—True Scale on which to view the Earth.—Form of the Earth.—Newton's Demonstrations.—Gravity and Centrifugal Force.—False inferences drawn from Newton's Hypothesis.—True Primitive Creations.—Density of the Earth.—Reflections arising from the Subject.—The Days of Creation.

On entering on a subject so extensive as the consideration of the entire globe, and with the intention of first viewing it in a

* It may be said of this, and of all other philosophical inquiries, as has been eloquently observed with regard to christianity. "It is delightful to have every doubt removed, by the positive proof of its truth; to feel that conviction of its certainty which infidelity can never impart to her votaries; and to perceive that assurance of the faith which is as superior in the hope which it communicates, as in the certainty on which it rests, to the cheerless and disquieting doubts of the unbelieving mind. Instead of being a mere prejudice of education, which may be easily shaken, belief, thus founded on reason, becomes fixed and immovable; and all the scoffing of the scorner, and speculations of the infidel, lie as lightly on the mind, or pass as imperceptibly over it, and make as little impression there, as the spray upon a rock."—Keith's Evid. of Proph. p. 4.

* Principles of Geology, vol. i. p. 284.

general way, before we proceed to the examination of its particular parts, our first object ought to be to attain the necessary elevation from whence this full and general view may be obtained.

Man, in his little sphere of action, on a minute portion of its surface, finds his ideas so confined, that he is constantly misled by them, in forming conceptions of objects beyond common, every day observation. Thus, when traversing the stupendous Alpine regions of the earth, the mind of a stranger is overcome with the unusual appearances of things; and it is in such scenes that the geologist but too often forms erroneous notions of the "fracture and ruin of the solid crust of the earth."* In like manner, an idea of immensity is attached to the fathomless abysses of the great deep, or to the profound sources of volcanic fires. These objects, however, great as they may appear in the common scale of human comparison, almost vanish when the larger and more correct scale, on which the whole globe has been framed, is applied to them. The entire diameter of the earth is computed at about 8,000 miles. Now, the loftiest peak upon the earth's surface,† though it rises to the enormous elevation of upwards of twenty-six thousand feet, is but five such miles above the general surface of the ocean. In like manner, the greatest depths of the ocean sink into comparative insignificance, when this scale is applied to them. For although the actual measurement of these depths is, and ever must remain, beyond the reach of human art, yet we have the strongest reasons (almost amounting to certainty) for supposing, from analogy, that the form and surface of the bed of the sea have no greater variation from the general level than those of the surface of the dry land ;‡ and, consequently, that while there may be depths in the ocean extending to four or five miles, by far the greater portions of it, as of the dry land, do not vary more than from a few hundred feet to half a mile, from positive smoothness.§

The greatest depths that have ever been reached by actual soundings, have seldom exceeded one mile. Captain Parry, however, in latitude 57 degrees 4 minutes north, longitude 24 degrees 34 minutes west, and about one hundred leagues from any land, found no bottom with the deep sea clamms, and a line of 1020 fathoms, or one mile and 280 yards, being more than a quarter of a mile deeper than was reached by lord Mulgrave.

Mr. Scoresby sounded in latitude 75 degrees 50 minutes north, longitude 5 degrees 50 minutes west, with 1058 fathoms; and in latitude 76 degrees 30 minutes north, longitude 4 degrees 48 minutes west, with 1200 fathoms of line, or one mile and 640 yards, in neither instance finding the bottom. This last is, probably, the greatest depth of soundings ever attempted.

The deepest mines that man has yet been able to form, do not reach, in perpendicular depth, much beyond two hundred fathoms, or not more than about a quarter of a mile. M. Humboldt saw, in 1803, a mine, in Mexico, which was to be sunk to the great depth of 1685 feet, or 280 fathoms, and which was to require twelve years for its completion, which, however, appeared very doubtful.

In viewing even volcanic action on the same great scale by which we have measured the mountains and the depths, we cannot consider these awful phenomena of burning mountains as more than superficial pustules on the mere skin of the earth. It is now pretty generally understood, and acknowledged, that water is one of the most active agents in the production of volcanic fires; and when we consider the number of volcanoes in the interior of our continents, which have, to all appearance, become extinct from the want of that communication with the waters of the sea, which obviously must, at one time, have existed; and that almost all the active volcanoes now known are situated near the sea coast, and rarely, or never, far in the interior of large continents, we have very great reason to conclude, that the utmost depths of volcanic action are not much, if at all, greater than those we have found reason to assign to the ocean itself, that is, from one to five miles.

Catopaxi, in South America, is, perhaps, of all volcanic mountains, the most distant from the sea; and yet it is only 140 miles from the shores of the Pacific. This remarkable volcano, which is nearly 19,000 feet above the level of the sea, presents us with a very strong corroboration of what has been said, that water is the great agent in volcanic action; and that the deepest source of this activity is not greater than has been above supposed. This volcano, from time to time, throws up, not only great quantities of mud, but also innumerable fish. The almost extinct volcano of Imbarbara, has also frequently thrown up fish in such quantities as to cause putrid exhalations over the whole neighbouring country. The species of fish thus thrown up, is that called by the natives of Quito, permadilla; it is about four inches in length, and is almost the only fish found in the lakes and waters of Quito: but the great numbers occasionally thrown out, give us reason to suppose that there must be very considerable subterraneous lakes in the calcareous caverns of that country in which these fish are bred, and from which the volcanic action of these mountains so far from the sea, is supplied with the necessary quantity of water. In this case we are certain, that those lakes cannot be at any very great depth below the general surface of the country, as the fish could not exist deprived of atmospheric air.

According to Humboldt, the volcanoes of America scarcely ever threw out lava; but chiefly slag, ashes, pumice, and vast quantities of water and slime. We consequently never hear of burnings in the tremendous eruptions of Quito, but only of overflowings of slimy mud. During the great earthquake of the 4th of February, 1797, 40,000 human beings were destroyed by the water and mud that issued from the mountains. In the description of the mud volcanoes in the island of Trinidad, given by Dr. Furguson, in the Edinburgh Transactions, one of the party who was examining them picked up a white sea shell of the turbinated kind, in the act of being thrown out along with the mud; a very sufficient proof of a subterraneous communication with the sea.

It has been remarked, that no known volcano is seated in granite, nor is it found near any volcano, except in very low situations. The same may be said of primitive rocks in general. The volcanic formation of Iceland is, probably, the most extensive in the world, covering a space of, at least, 60,000 square miles; yet there is no appearance of primitive rock in the whole of that island, though the mountains reach an elevation of nearly 6000 feet above the sea. One eruption of Ætna covered a space of fifty leagues in circumference, and one hundred and twenty feet in thickness, with calcareous sand or dust; and as calcareous earth enters very sparingly into the composition of what are considered primitive rocks, though it forms a large proportion of the secondary, we have thus another strong reason for supposing that volcanoes are not very deeply seated in the earth.

* "In the midst of such scenes, the geologist feels his mind invigorated; the magnitude of the appearances before him extinguishes all the little and contracted notions he may have formed in his closet; and he learns that it is only by visiting and studying these stupendous works, that he can form an adequate conception of the great relations of the crust of the globe, and of its mode of formation."—Edinburgh Encyclopædia, Mineralogy.

It has been well observed, that greatness is only a comparative quality. It is true, that Alpine scenery is well calculated to enlarge the mind, and to extinguish notions, formed on a more contracted view of the earth's surface. But even this enlarged view becomes contracted in its turn, unless the earth be viewed upon its own proper scale.

† Dhawalageri, in Asia. Mount Blanc is not quite three miles above the same level. On taking the mean height of twenty-nine of the greatest elevations in the Old World, it is found to be only one mile and three-quarters. The mean height of an equal number in the New World is nearly two miles above the level of the sea.

‡ We find it a general rule, probably without any material exception, that where a country is low, and the shore flat, the neighbouring sea is shallow in about the same proportion. On the contrary, where a coast is mountainous, and the cliffs high and precipitous, there we find the sea of very considerable depth, and nearly of the same form under water as above. We have this point ably illustrated in the survey of the German Ocean, with sections of the depths, in six different lines, from the shores of Great Britain to those of Holland, Denmark, and Norway, by Mr. Stevenson, in 1820. We come to the same conclusion on a small, but generally correct scale, by considering any fresh-water lake, the shores of which present a variety of scenery. In all the Swiss lakes it is very striking; and in some, where the immediate shores are of great elevation, the bottom of the lake has not yet been found.

§ In the course of some late experiments at sea, on board H. M. sloop Trinculo, captain Booth, by order of the lords of the admiralty, in order to find soundings at unusual depths, Mr. Massey made use of several newly invented machines for this purpose.

He sunk a copper globe, capable of sustaining great pressure, with a line of 840 fathoms. The globe was enclosed in a strong net of cord, and was fixed close on the line, at about 40 fathoms from the lead. Neither globe nor lead returned to the surface; the globe had exploded, by the high pressure, and the line appeared as if blown off by an air-gun. A second globe was sunk, with a greater weight, and the same quantity of line, and it was inclosed in a still stronger netting, made of log-line, and not fixed so close to the line as in the former trial. In this instance the lead returned without having reached the bottom; but the globe had exploded, and the net was blown to pieces. These experiments proved, to the satisfaction of Mr. Massey and captain Booth, the impossibility of counteracting the effects of high pressure offered at great depths in the sea.

The whole volcanic formation of which Vesuvius forms the focus, reposes upon the secondary lime stone, of which the Appenine range is there formed. Of this we have various direct proofs, the most remarkable of which is the frequent projection of calcareous bodies from the crater, either in an unaltered, or in a modified state. When we connect this fact with the probable, and almost obvious communication with the waters of the neighbouring sea, we cannot but consider it as highly probable that the focus of this volcano is at a depth below the surface of the land, not much, if at all, greater than the thickness of the secondary strata, or the depth of the adjoining sea.

When we have thus reduced to their true and proper scale those objects on the earth's surface which we consider greatest; and when we further consider that the theories of philosophy on the formation of the whole earth, are formed on a view of the minute portions of its diameter to which we have access, these portions, not being more than, at the very utmost, five miles in height, and, by analogy, five in depth, out of 8000 miles; how trifling does the theorist appear with his cabinets of minerals on which his theories are founded. Let him cast his mind's eye along the diameter of a section of the globe, and say if he is justified in forming theories of the mode of first formations on so slight a view of its mere surface.*

Having thus corrected any false notions we may have formed, as to the comparative extent of objects within our view; and having thus attained the proper elevation from whence we may consider and study the globe as a whole, let us now proceed to an attentive and unprejudiced consideration of it, from the earliest times of which we have any record, and examine whether that record is contradicted, or corroborated by the appearances we may discover.

We find, then, that the most remote history opens with the assertion, that, "in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth; but the earth was invisible and unfurnished, and darkness was upon the face of the deep."

I shall here adopt the corrected translation of the Mosaic record, from the numerous authorities, and unanswerable arguments brought forward by Mr. Granville Penn, in his admirable work, entitled, the "Comparative Estimate of the Mineral and Mosaical Geologies." That estimable writer has proved, in the most satisfactory manner, that the tohu vabohu of the Hebrew text, the 'without form and void' of our translation, was uniformly translated, both by the Septuagint, and by the Jewish and Christian churches, for 600 years subsequent to the Septuagint translation by the terms invisible, (from being covered with the waters) and unfurnished, from having, as yet, no vegetation.†

It is one of the great triumphs of human intellect, that the globular form of the earth is proved to demonstration; and to this has been added, by the immortal Newton, the certain knowledge of that remarkable fact, that the globe is slightly flattened at the poles, and may, therefore, be termed rather an obtuse spheroid, than a perfect sphere.

This great and wise man, in considering the nature and origin of all things, has said, "it appears probable to me, that God, in the beginning, formed matter, in solid, massy, hard, impenetrable, and movable particles, of such sizes and figures, and with such other properties, and in such proportions to space, as most conduced to the end for which he formed them.

"All material things seemed to have been composed of the hard and solid particles above-mentioned, variously associated in the first creation by the counsels of an intelligent agent. For, it became him, who created them, to set them in order; and if he did so, it is unphilosophical to seek for any other origin of this world, or to pretend that it might rise out of chaos by the mere laws of nature; though, being once formed, it may continue by these laws for many ages."*

"When Newton had remarked, that the planets present to the sight figures of obtuse spheroids, and not of perfect spheres; when he had reflected upon the nature and properties of that particular figure, and had contemplated those orbs, as subjected in their revolutions to the opposing actions of gravity and centrifugal force, his penetrating mind at length discovered, that the rule of harmony and equilibrium between these two contending powers was only to be found in the figure of an obtuse spheroid.

"In order to render this fact plain to the understanding of others, he imagined this hypothetical illustration. If," said he, "the earth were formed of an uniformly yielding substance; and if it were to become deprived of its motion," the law of attraction or gravity, acting equally, and without resistance, from all points of its surface, towards its centre, would cause that yielding substance to settle into the figure of a perfect sphere. But if it were then to receive a transverse impulse, causing it to revolve upon its axis, this new impulse would cause a centrifugal force, counteracting the force of gravity, by urging the particles, composing the yielding substance, from the centre towards the circumference; and thus would produce an alteration in the figure of the sphere. For this new force would tend to elevate the surface, and would have most power at the equator, and least at the poles; whereas, the opposite force of gravity would tend to depress the surface, and would have most power at the poles, and least at the equator. The result of this inequality of gravitation must necessarily be, that the original sphere, becoming elevated at the equator, but not at the poles, and the power by which this elevation was occasioned gradually diminishing from the equator to the poles, the figure would be eventually changed into that of an obtuse spheroid.

"It being thus shown that such would be the necessary result of the compound power of gravity, and centrifugal force, it followed, that those two antagonist forces, acting at the same time in the earth, (SUPPOSING it to have been formed of an uniformly yielding substance,) would have worked themselves into harmony and equilibrium, by assuming that figure, which they would thenceforth maintain. Whereas, if we suppose the case of a true sphere, which should consist of a solid and resisting substance, the two opposing forces would act in perpetual and violent discord, with a constant tendency to disunite and rend the texture of the fabric. Now Newton having maintained, that God, in the beginning, formed all material things, of such figures and properties as most conduced to the end for which he formed them; and having demonstrated that the property of an obtuse spheroid was that which most conduced to the end for which God formed the earth, viz. to revolve with regularity, and with perfect harmony in all its parts; he left it to the capacity of every one to draw the obvious inference, in conformity with his known principles, viz. that it is highly probable that God has formed the earth with the same figure, which it is manifest he has given to the other planets, and for which an adequate reason is thus rendered plain to the intelligence: and he confirmed this argument of probability by adding the positive fact, that unless the earth actually was flatter at the poles than at the equator, the waters of the ocean constantly rising towards the latter, must long since have deluged and overwhelmed the equatorial regions, and have deserted the polar; whereas the waters are now retained in equilibrio over the whole surface of the globe."†

Maclaurin, in his account of Sir Isaac Newton's philosophy, ‡ thus draws his inference from the above clear and beautiful demonstration:—

"What we have said of a FLUID earth must hold good of the earth as it is; for if it had not this figure in its solid parts, but a spherical figure, the ocean would overflow all the equatorial regions, and leave the polar regions elevated many

* It is not, perhaps, surprising, that the general views of mankind are, on such subjects, so very confined; for the globe itself is as much too large as the best artificial globes are too small for general use.

In order to obviate, in some degree, both objections, I have occasionally formed a section of the earth upon a flat sandy beach, upon the scale of one inch to a mile; and I have found that such a scale materially assists the mind, in correcting false judgments on this extensive subject. We have thus a circle of 8,000 inches in diameter, or of 222 yards, which, when marked out with small stakes, upon a smooth surface, appears an immense area. Placing ourselves upon any part of this circumference, we have an opportunity of taking a just, though microscopic view of things as they are. The very highest mountain is, then, fully represented by five inches! the greatest depth of the ocean by the same little span! while we cannot calculate upon more than one inch as the medium variety of sea and land over the whole of this vast surface! In order to form an idea of smaller objects, we must examine an inch scale, finely graduated, and that, too, by the aid of a microscope; and we shall thus find, that man would occupy about the 880th part of an inch in his proudest stature, or about the size of the smallest animalcula observed in fluids!

† Comp. Estim., vol. i. p. 173.

I must here acknowledge the very important services that have been rendered to science by this most able writer, who is the first that has clearly exhibited some of the most important, but obscure, truths of Scripture, in connection with physical facts, open to our examination. It is only to be regretted, that the necessarily controversial character of the comparative estimate, renders it a work more suited to the mind of the learned than of the general reader.

miles above the level of the sea; whereas we find that one is not more elevated above that level than the other."

The supposed figure of a globe of an yielding substance, made use of by Newton, merely to explain the effects of the two great forces which are constantly in action upon the earth, has been construed, by the continental philosophy, into an argument in favour of the actual primitive fluidity of the globe in a chaotic state;* and thence it has argued, that that particular form which was given to all the revolving heavenly bodies, by the great wisdom of the Creator, to obviate the effects of two contending powers, was assumed by the globe itself while in a fluid state, by the mere laws of nature.†

Nothing, however, could be further from the ideas of Newton, who had previously stated his belief, that "as God had formed matter with such figure and proportions, as most conduced to the end for which he formed it; and as the end, in this instance, was regularity and harmony, it was unphilosophical to seek for any other origin, either for the substance, or the shape of the globe; or to pretend, that it could have risen out of a chaos by the mere laws of nature."

From the announcement, then, of the sacred record, that "in the beginning, God created the earth;" and from the preceding considerations, from the great mind of Newton, on the subject of this announcement, we are to conclude, that, "in the beginning" our globe was of the same solid, spheroidal figure, we now find it to be; and, consequently, that granite, and all other rocks, which do not bear the stamp of subsequent formation from the effects of those laws, commonly called of nature, but in reality those of God, and to which the earth, and all things upon its surface, have been subjected since the first creation, are to be considered as primitive creations; and, also, that the elastic fluid, forming the firmament or atmosphere, and the waters, which were at first spread over the whole surface, but were afterwards collected "into one place," at the command of the Almighty, are to be included in our minds as primitive creations.

It appears strange, that the consideration of air and water, (we may, perhaps, also, include fire,) has been hitherto omitted by those philosophers who have formed theories on the chaotic formation of the earth. In those theories we hear of nothing but the formation of rocks by natural or secondary causes; and though, by some, fire was considered the chief agent in these formations, and by others, water, we have no account given, or attempted, of how these two important elements first came into existence. Thus, in the systems of the chaotic philosophy, out of the four elements of which the system of our globe is composed, three remain utterly unaccounted for; and we may justly add, that the origin of the primitive elements, from which the fourth is supposed, in those theories, to have arisen, is equally concealed from the reason and understanding.

Some philosophers, undeterred by the apparent impossibility of any satisfactory result, have attempted to ascertain the mean density of the earth. This problem only admits of an approximated solution, derived from the principles of universal gravitation. For our actual view of the interior of the earth does not extend, as has been before said, to more than one-sixteenth thousandth part of the whole. The calculations of Dr. Maskelyne, from observations on the attraction of the mountain, called Schehalien, in Perthshire, followed up by Hutton, Playfair, and Cavendish, lead us to the same conclusions, which, a priori, we should have expected; viz. that the central parts of the earth abound with some species of heavy and solid matter; and as our inquiries, with regard to the surface of the globe, are in no way affected by the question of its interior structure, which will probably remain forever unknown to us; and as the above result is in no way contradictory, either to our reason, or to history, we may safely assume the internal solidity of the earth, as a fact, until stronger reasons are adduced in opposition to it.‡

We have, then, presented to the mind, on the first day of the creation, and created out of nothing, by the incomprehensible power of the Almighty, a solid mineral globe, with its surface invisible, (from being covered with a thin coating of water, and there being as yet no light, for "darkness was upon the face of the deep.") And here, it is not without effort, that the mind is restrained within the limits to which our present inquiries must be confined. For when we consider that this great globe is but a small member of a stupendous system; and that even that system is lost in the immensity of other systems throughout boundless space, the apparent similarity of all which suggests the probability of each revolving sphere being destined to the same ends as our own;* the mind is overwhelmed with the extent of the prospect, and with our own incomparative insignificance, which would almost induce a doubt of the reality of those numerous blessings which we feel have been conferred upon us by our Maker. There is, indeed, nothing that so completely overwhelms the finite mind of man, as the discoveries which his genius and his reason have enabled him to make in astronomy; by which he finds, that, great as our solar system is, the immensity of space is filled with such systems, each moving in its own sphere, and all retained, in the most wonderful regularity and order, by the laws to which the Creator has submitted them. When we raise our thoughts, from our own little planet, to the contemplation of so boundless a creation, it is not without the utmost effort of the mind that we can connect time, and more especially a short time, with such immensity. But we must keep in mind, while dwelling on such subjects, that man's most erroneous notions of creation, arise from the necessity he experiences of connecting length of time, with extent, or difficulty of operation in his own finite labours. We must not forget that most of our great astronomical discoveries have been founded on our own earth, and its single satellite, as a base: and if, in the study of this earth, we find it revealed to us in the most unequivocal manner by history, and corroborated by physical facts, that our planet has not existed more than what may appear to us infinitely too short a time for the formation of so great and so perfect a body, we have no power to limit this discovery to an individual member of the solar system; we must extend it to the whole, upon the same principle of analogy on which so many astronomical discoveries have been suggested, and subsequently demonstrated to be true; our reason must bend, with whatever difficulty, to so conclusive a corollary. But this is a field much too wide for our finite comprehensions. We cannot proceed far on such inquiries as the present, without the conviction being pressed upon us, that "the ways of God are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts." We feel the necessity of curbing our curiosity respecting the state of other planets, and of other systems; and we must be satisfied and thankful for the merciful dispensations it has pleased the Almighty to bestow so abundantly upon our own.

We must feel satisfied, however, from what history announces, and our reason corroborates, that not only our own earth, but the whole of our solar system, started into being at the same instant, and by the same incomprehensible and Almighty power; and that the laws by which the revolutions of the various members of our system are regulated and preserved, were enacted on this, the first day of the creation; when, though the sun had not yet actually shone forth, it yet produced the effect of light, and of the "evening and the morning," which "were the first day."

It is here scarcely necessary for us to dwell upon that most remarkable part of the first day's creation, the fiat that light should appear, as it has no very intimate connexion with the geology of the earth, and has been most justly admired by all who are capable of reading, or expounding the sacred volume. The remark, however, ought not to be omitted, that the distinct mention of the evening and the morning, forming each particular day, has always proved an insurmountable difficulty in the theories of a chaotic philosophy, which, in acknowledging the days of Scripture, though it assigns to them a much longer period of time than one revolution of the earth on its axis, has yet been unable to give any reasonable explanation of the terms evening, and morning, as forming one day.† The idea of assigning unlimited periods to the

† "The spheroidal figure of the earth, its crystalline and stratified structure, and its numerous petrifactions, are proofs of its original fluidity. The fluidity, according to Werner, was aqueous; and he conjectures that the various rocks were originally suspended or dissolved in water, and gradually deposited from it."—Edin. Encyclop. Mineralogy, p. 408.

It has been already shown, that this Wernerian theory of primitive formations is entirely at variance with these very laws of nature, to the agency of which alone these formations were attributed.—(See page 17.)

‡ The terms so commonly used in geological writings, the crust of the earth, is but too well adapted to mislead the mind as to the true nature of the globe, which, as far as we know, or can understand, is solid throughout. The above term would seem to imply a mere outer shell, covering a hollow interior. Of the many false or problematical ideas of men, there is, perhaps, none more common or unfounded than that which attributes to the globe a hollow interior.

* We may say of the universe, what Pascal has so beautifully expressed of the immensity of God: "C'est un cercle infini, dont le centre est partout, et la circonference nulle part."

† There is a very general traditionary notion amongst all nations, days of creation, as recorded by Moses, has only arisen from the necessity [illegible] completion of so great a chemical process as the supposed production of the earth from chaos. But if first formations were not the consequence of a chemical process, which Newton considered most unphilosophical, and which our reason, and common sense most decidedly condemns, then the extension of the period demanded for their production becomes unnecessary.

It may here be objected, that if an Almighty power were able to create the universe in a perfect state, why should the work have occupied a period of six days? Why should not all things have started into being, as light is described to have done, instantaneously? The only answer that can be made to such objections, is simply, that it was the will of God, who, in his wisdom, appears to have had, in this, an ulterior moral view for the good of mankind, and for the commemoration of his own power and glory by his creatures. Time has accordingly been, by his express command, subdivided into six days of labour, and one of rest: and so much of the divine wisdom may be traced in this arrangement, that it has been generally admitted by the wisest men who have considered the subject, that no human ingenuity could improve upon it.

There is also a strong argument to be found in the divine command which establishes the hebdomadal division of time, against the theories which demand an extension for the days of the creation:—"Six days shalt thou labour, and do all that thou hast to do; but in the seventh day thou shall do no work; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that therein is, and rested the seventh day; therefore remember this seventh day, to keep it holy." In this commandment the days of creation, and working days of twenty-four hours, are so completely identified in the sense and construction, that nothing but that species of force, so often resorted to by philosophy, in support of a week, but favourite theory, can separate them.

Now, a creation by an Almighty power may as easily be the work of one moment, as of a thousand years; and though the laws of chemistry are now found to produce crystals, under the hands of the chemist, the great mind, even of a Davy, has never yet produced either a vegetable or an animal formation; and there is, consequently, no ground for this demand for time, with respect to any of the Mosaic days on which these creations were first called into being. But we have no reason to suppose that there was any variation in the length of the Mosaical days, which are each defined in a manner so similar and distinct. We can, therefore, come to no other conclusion, than that the Mosaical days were such periods of 24 hours, as have ever since continued in succession, and will continue till "time shall be no more."

CHAPTER II.

The Second Day of the Creation.—The Firmament, or Atmosphere.—Atmospheric Phenomena.—Magnitude and Elasticity.

We now come to the consideration of the second day of the creation, in which it pleased the Almighty to create, and set in order, the firmament, or atmosphere, by which the whole globe was to be surrounded.

"And God said, let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters; and let it divide the waters from the waters: and God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament," (or upon the earth,) "from the waters which were above the firmament," (or in the clouds,) "and it was so."

It were as vain to inquire into the mode of the creation of the atmospheric firmament, or firm support, by which the whole globe is embraced, and, in a manner, hermetically sealed, as into that of granite, or of water. We have, therefore, nothing left us, but to receive the fact as recorded, as this is a part of our earth to which the principles of crystallization will not apply, and which the chaotic philosophy has not yet accounted for by secondary causes. It may be permitted to us, however, to form some idea of the state of the new earth at the termination of the "first day," and of the effects produced by the fiat of the second. We have already arrived at the conclusion, that as the "evening and the morning" had formed the "first day," the sun was already created, although nothing more than its effects of light had yet appeared. The power of the sun must now, however, have begun to act by those laws, by which it has ever since been regulated; and this power, acting upon the earth, with its watery envelope, must have produced the effect of a thick fog, which was now to be evaporated, and raised high into the new atmosphere, thus dividing "the waters which were under the firmament" from the aqueous vapours which were, from hence forward, to be suspended "above," (or in the higher parts of) "the firmament."

Although the consideration of the atmosphere does not, strictly speaking, come within the scope of a geological inquiry, yet it may not be altogether irrelevant to our subject to make a few observations, in this place, upon this highly important portion of creation, by the action of which the decomposition of a portion of the earth is continually proceeding, and, consequently, the materials for secondary formations are as constantly being produced.

The atmosphere, or firmament, is that elastic fluid which surrounds the earth, and encloses it on all sides. This fluid, so little understood by the ancients, has occupied much of the attention of modern philosophers, and has given birth to some of the most remarkable discoveries of modern science. Its weight was first ascertained by Galileo, and applied by Torricelli to explain the rise of water in pumps, and of mercury in the barometer. Its elasticity was accurately determined by Boyle; and the effects produced upon it, by heat and moisture, have been explained by Halley and Newton. That atmospheric air is a heavy, compressible, and elastic substance, has been proved by many simple and direct experiments; and, in consequence of its weight, the portion of it nearest the earth is compressed by the whole of the superincumbent mass, and it is thus much more dense in the lower, than in the upper regions.

The air, in the higher regions, therefore, must be extremely rare, from its elastic nature not being opposed by any pressure from above; and, in this state, it becomes gradually unfitted for the support of animal life, as has been painfully experienced by those adventurous travellers who have ascended the highest mountains. Some attempts have been made to calculate the height above the earth to which the atmosphere extends. If the density of air were uniform, it would be easy to ascertain this point, by means of the data placed within our reach, by the discovery of the barometer; and, upon this supposition, the height of the atmosphere would be found to be a little more than five miles. But as this is not the case, and as the air gradually diminishes in density, its utmost height must be much greater. From observations which have been made on the duration of the twilight, or reflected light which we enjoy from the sun, after that luminary has itself disappeared, and before he again rises, the atmosphere has been calculated to extend to about thirty-six miles above the surface of the earth; and it is even probable that it exceeds that elevation, which, though it appears great to us, is, in fact, not so, when compared with the diameter of the whole globe; and not more in proportion, than a few coats of varnish on a common artificial globe.

The atmosphere, then, is like a thin transparent veil around the earth, which multiplies and propagates the light of the sun, by an infinity of reflections; and it is by means of these that we enjoy day-light before the sun has risen, and after he has set. If the atmosphere did not exist, each point upon the earth's surface would only receive the light from the rays which fell upon it, direct from the sun. Wherever the sun did not actually shine, complete darkness would reign. On the tops of the highest mountains, it has been observed, that the sun's rays are so little reflected, that, when placed in the shade, one can see the stars at noon-day; and what appears blue sky, in the lower regions, seems there almost black.

It is upon the same principle of reflection of the rays of the sun, in our atmosphere, that we, and other inhabitants of the temperate and high latitudes, enjoy more of twilight, both in the evening and morning, than the inhabitants of tropical countries, where, as soon as the sun has set, and until he again rises, there is almost total darkness, except from the light of the moon and stars. Our longer twilight arises that darkness preceded light. In Otaheite, the natives consider that darkness was the origin of all things.

Aristotle says, "the theologians argue that all things spring from darkness: philosophers say that all things were mingled together."—Metaph. l. 14. c. 6.

"As darkness preceded light, so the night of the Hebrew computation always preceded the day; thus in a manner perpetuating a commemoration of the transactions of the first day of the creation."—Comparative Estimate.

from the inclined position of the earth's axis, from which position the sun's rays not falling so vertically, as in tropical regions, pass through the atmosphere in a slanting direction, and, consequently, through a longer extent of air, and with a greater variety of reflections, thus producing light long after the sun has set, and before he has risen.

It is within the range of this firmament, that all the meteoric phenomena, in constant action around us, are generated. Rain, dew, hail, and snow, are all occasioned by moisture imbibed by the atmosphere, from the evaporation of the liquid portions of the earth's surface, and acted upon by various degrees of heat from the sun.

The winds, in all their various degrees, from the gentle zephyr to the raging storm, are all produced by the action of heat upon this elastic fluid: and when we consider that the mineral surface of the earth is constantly and violently acted upon by the circulation thus kept up by means of the atmosphere, we can have no difficulty in understanding how materially it must effect geological secondary formations.

Amongst the latest discoveries of science connected with the phenomena of this vital element, is the very intimate connexion now found to exist between magnetism and electricity. There is, perhaps, nothing in the whole range of natural phenomena which has excited more the admiration of mankind, and, at the same time, been obscured with more complete darkness than the principle of magnetism; and it may be considered as a distinct proof of the difficulty of the subject, to observe, that few have even been the theories produced in order to account for it. A ray of light has now, however, been shed upon the subject, by the discovery of a few remarkable facts; and it is probable that in a few years more the active mind of man may overcome this hitherto insuperable problem.*

On the second day, then, of the creation, this most vital part of the earth's system was ordained, and submitted to those laws which have ever since continued in action. The moisture exhaled from the newly created waters, by the newly created sun, was elevated from the surface of the globe, still hid under its watery covering, and was suspended in the higher regions of the firmament, to descend upon the future dry land in fruitful showers.

The sun itself, however, was not yet made to appear through the clouds, although its light again produced a second morning, which, with its preceding evening, formed "the second day."

CHAPTER III.

The gathering together of the Waters.—The Sublimity of this Fiat of the Creator not sufficiently understood.—The Transition Rocks.

We now come to the consideration of the events which took place on the third day of the creation, viz. "the gathering together of the waters unto one place," and the consequent appearance of the "dry land."

"And God said, let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear; and it was so."

And this great fiat of the Almighty was to produce the first great geological secondary formations which we find upon the earth's surface; and as the laws which were, in the course of time, to give rise to all the other secondary formations, were from this time forth to come into action, it will be necessary for us to give our utmost attention to the consideration of this great change upon the surface of the earth.

We have before remarked, that, during the first and second days of the creation, the earth must have presented to the view (had any human eye existed to look upon it,) a solid globe of spheroidal form, covered with a thin coat of aqueous fluid, and already revolving on its axis as a member of the solar system. We are fully authorized in coming to this latter conclusion, from the distinct mention made in the record, of the days, comprising, like our present days, the evening and the morning, with the darkness and the light following each other in regular succession. The sun, it is true, had not yet been made visibly to appear, or to shine through the, as yet, cloudy atmosphere; nor had the moon yet become visible, from an additional, and yet more interesting and remarkable reason, which of itself, ought to be looked upon as confirmative of this view; and that is, that supposing her to have been placed on the first day of the creation, (when we are to conclude that the whole solar system started into being,) in the relative situation as to the sun and the earth, which she has ever since held at that period of her course when we give her the title of a NEW moon, it was not possible she could have been seen from the earth "until the third evening of her revolution, according to our computation, which exactly answers to the fourth evening of the Mosaical days; our computation connecting the evening with the preceding day-light, but the Mosaical computation with the succeeding day-light:"* and on this very day, accordingly, and not till then, she was made to appear at sun-set, to rule, or lead on the night, as the sun was ordained to rule and conduct the day.

It was now the will of the Creator that the earth should no longer be "invisible" under its watery covering; and, accordingly, the command was given, that "the waters should be gathered together unto one place," that the "dry land" might appear. In considering this great event, it becomes a natural and fair question, as it has been left open to us by the record, as to the mode or means by which it must have taken place. The well-poised earth had already begun to revolve upon its axis; and the laws of gravitation and of fluids had consequently began to act in our system. By these laws, it was impossible that the waters could have been gathered together by accumulation, or above the general level, as the solids of the earth might have been. We can, therefore, come to no other conclusion than that to which we are also led by various parts of the inspired writings, viz. that God did "rend the depths by his intelligence," and formed a depression, or hollow, on a part of the solid globe, within which, by the appointed laws of fluids, the "depths" were "gathered together."

And here we should naturally feel disposed, if the inquiry could be expected to lead to any satisfactory result, to inquire how a hollow could be formed in so solid a mass as we must conceive the primitive earth to have been. But, in this inquiry, we should be adopting that very hypothetical reasoning which has so often led to error, and which we have already found such reason to condemn. The record is distinct; the fact of water requiring a hollow bed is undeniable. The means of forming that bed, we may safely refer to the hands of him who could create the ocean himself which it was to contain.† It were equally vain and futile to enter here upon the disputed points respecting the solidity or the hollow nature of the globe; because, when we apply to this bed of the ocean the true and proper scale by which we have already examined other parts of the earth's surface, we shall find the depression necessary for containing the whole waters of the earth, so very trifling compared with the globe itself, as not in any way to be affected by either side of such arguments; for we have found reason to conclude‡ that the very deepest abysses of the ocean are not more than from four to five miles below the level of its surface; and that the mean depth over the whole sea cannot be considered more than from a few hundred feet to half a mile.

In considering, then, such comparatively diminutive depressions upon the earth's surface, it is by no means necessary either to imagine the "vast disruption and depression of the solid frame-work of the globe;" or to enter upon the question as to the solid or cavous state of the 7990 miles of

* A most remarkable accident, which occurred on the 15th of April, 1832, has served to throw some light on the intimate connexion between electricity and magnetism. A gentleman and lady, whilst travelling in Worcestershire, on the hind box of their own carriage, were overtaken by a violent thunder-storm, and both were struck by the electric fluid so violently, that their lives were in great danger for some weeks afterwards. A minute and most interesting account of this accident and its effects, is given in the "London and Edinburgh Philosophical Magazine," for September, 1832. It is only necessary here to allude to these effects on the steel and iron work through which the electric fluid had passed in its course. It was found to have communicated a highly magnetic power to all these articles. The balance-wheel of the gentleman's watch was, amongst others, so highly magnetized, that it has since been mounted as a compass.

In further illustation of this most interesting subject, it has lately been discovered that a vivid spark of fire is produced on the sudden removal of a steel point from a powerful magnet. This effect is now exhibited in London, in the National Gallery of Science in the Strand.

its diameter, which must for ever remain concealed from our view.

The following beautiful reflections on this part of our subject are from the enlightened mind of Mr. Granville Penn, who may, indeed, be called the first great advocate for the Mosaic Geology, amongst the men of science of our day. "The briefness of this clause (Genesis i. 9,) and the nature of the subject, have caused it to be little contemplated in proportion to its importance, and to the fulness of the instruction which it conveys; and, therefore, it has not been observed that the same sublimity which is universally perceived in the clause, 'Let there be light, and there was light,' subsists equally in this clause; 'Let the waters be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land be seen, and it was so.' The sentiment of sublimity in the former clause, results from the contemplation of an instantaneous transition of the universe from the profoundest darkness to the most splendid light, at the command of God. All men familiarly apprehend the sadness of the former, and the delight of the latter; and they are, therefore, instantly sensible of the glorious nature of the change which was then so suddenly produced. But the nature of the change which must necessarily have taken place, in suddenly rendering visible a part of a solid globe, the universal surface of which had been overflowed and concealed by a flood of waters, is not so familiarly or so instantly apprehended; the mind, therefore, does not care to dwell upon it, but is contented with receiving the general information that the sea was formed. Hence, both commentators and geologists have equally failed to draw the immediate and necessary inference from the revelation of that great and undeniable geological fact."*

There is, besides, this further reason for our regarding the creation of light with more wonder and admiration than that of the "gathering together of the waters;" that however great and stupendous the latter operation must have been, it comes more easily within the scope of our intelligence than the former. We can imagine to ourselves secondary causes which could produce hollows in the surface of the earth, but the creation of light is far beyond the reach of our finite understandings. Although we can study its effects, and although science has made many brilliant discoveries with regard to these effects, yet we can in no way comprehend its origin. Its nature is beyond our reach: its creation, therefore, excites our admiration, in proportion to the difficulty we feel in comprehending it; but we are not, on this account, to form an erroneous estimate of the great operation which we are now to consider; for the formation of a bed for the ocean could be the work of that intelligence alone, which was able, at the first, to create that ocean.

This depression, small as it proves to be, compared with the diameter of the whole earth, was sufficiently deep and extensive to cause vast changes in the structure of a great part of the surface of the globe. In whatever mode the bed of the ocean was sunk, it is quite certain that the shores of the newly gathered waters must have been left in a rough, broken, and precipitous state. The descending portion of the solid earth, which was to form the bottom of the new sea, must have been subjected to extensive fracture and derangement, and must instantly have been acted upon by that continual movement, and circulation, which were then decreed, and have ever since been kept up, in the great body of the waters.† The tides, and the currents, these unceasing agents, would then commence their unwearied labours; and the immense debris of primitive rocks, would, by constant movement and friction, be reduced to the various stages in which they are now often found. From that day forth, the vapours exhaled from the waters by the heat of the sun, were to be converted into the various meteoric phenomena with which the firmament is charged. The clouds were to descend upon the now "dry land;" the rills, the brooks, the rivers, were now to begin their never ending courses, each charged with its load of moveable particles, destined to be deposited in the bed of the new sea. The sands, and gravels of the new shores, would then be unmixed with those various secondary, or shelly substances, we now find amongst them in such abundance. Their appearance would then be altogether crystalline and primitive; and the first strata arranged by the ocean on the granitic surface of the sea's bed, would naturally be formed of such substances, and without any vestige of animal bodies which had not then been created; and which, though soon afterwards "brought forth abundantly," could not, for a long time, have left their shelly remains in the abundance we have reason to know they subsequently did.*

If an opportunity, therefore, were given us for the examination, we should expect to find various strata composed of broken masses of primitive rocks, reposing upon these same rocks in their solid and unbroken condition. The opportunity has been placed within our reach, and we do find such strata as were to be anticipated, and to which, even the chaotic geology has given the name of transition or fragmentary formations; a name evidently suggested by their appearance and composition.

It is not my intention, in this place, to proceed with the consideration of the three last days of the creation, as recorded in the Mosaic history, because they do not present the same grounds for geological inquiry which are to be found in the operations of the first three days, which we have now been considering. We have seen that the creation of the primitive portions of the earth, that is, of rock, of water, and of the aerial atmosphere surrounding both, could have been effected only by the fiat of the Almighty architect of the universe. We have found no reason to cast a shadow of doubt upon the Mosaic record, where it informs us that the various parts of creation were produced in six separate and distinct days, which, from their evenings, and their mornings, must have each comprised one revolution of the globe upon its axis. On the contrary, we have seen, that the very remarkable coincidence of the first visible appearance of the moon, at the very time alone when she could have been first seen from the earth, (viz. on the third evening of her revolution,) affords us the strongest corroborative evidence of the truth of that part of the record. Since we have found reason to conclude, that, at the end of the third day, all those laws by which the earth was afterwards to be governed (excepting those of animated beings which had not yet been created,) had begun to act; that the various influences of the sun, and of the moon, were from this time forth to be in force; it now remains for us to proceed to the consideration of these laws, and of these influential causes; and to endeavour to discover whether they are not sufficient to produce many of the secondary appearances, so general over the whole surface of the earth.

CHAPTER IV.

Constant Changes in Nature.—Origin of Secondary Formations.—Primitive Soils, for the Nourishment of a Primitive Vegetation.—Constant Circulation in the Fluids of the Earth.—Springs, Brooks, and Rivers.—The Tides.—Their Cause Explained.—The Currents of the Ocean, and their present existing System.—Effects naturally arising from these powerful Causes.

Taken in a general sense, we may, perhaps not unaptly, liken our earth, surrounded with its atmosphere, to the various contents of a vessel hermetically sealed up, and kept in constant agitation. This continued movement would cause a constant change in the relative situation of every part of its contents. But the exact number, or quantity, would for ever remain the same. No extraneous substance could find admittance; no particle from within, could escape. Thus every created atom now contained within our atmosphere must have been so, under some form or other, "in the beginning."

* Comp. Estim., vol. i. p. 212.

† "The transition rocks include a considerable variety of earthy substances; but they are generally composed of the primitive rocks, reduced to a state of disintegration, apparently by a mechanical cause, and afterwards re-united into conglomerate masses, by some kind of cement, of an argillaceous or calcareous nature."—Edin. Encyclop. Physical Geography, p. 458.

* "No fossil remains have ever been found in what are termed the oldest formations. In the transition rocks," (the formation of some of which we are above considering,) "where they first occur, they are but very rare; yet in the newer" (or upper) "transition rocks they increase considerably in quantity. In the floetz formations they continue increasing in quantity to the newer formations."—Edin. Encyclop. Mineralogy, p. 409.

In considering the fossil remains of shell fish, which are by far the most abundant of all fossils, we must remember that the accumulation of their shelly remains would be progressive. Those of the first generation, for instance, would exist through many generations of living fish; and at the end of a hundred generations, we should find nearly all the shells of these generations, though the numbers of living creatures were not increased from the first year. We can thus easily and naturally account for the scarcity of fossil shells in the earlier formations, and for their progressive abundance in the subsequent ones.

It requires but a slight glance around us to perceive, that by the laws to which all things have been submitted by the Almighty, (to which we generally give the unmeaning name of the laws of nature,) matter is constantly assuming a different form. The stately oak moulders into dust, and becomes food for other plants. The ox changes grass into flesh; his flesh passes at his death into other beings, who, in their turn, undergo the same metamorphosis. All created beings move, without ceasing, from one form to another. Man himself, being laid in the earth, fertilizes the soil: his flesh becomes food for plants, which are eaten by animals, which man, in his turn, devours. His Creator has announced to him this great truth, "For dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."* Even the most solid portions of the mineral world are not exempted from the influence of these laws. The primitive and solid granite, when acted upon by cold,† by heat, or by moisture, becomes slowly, but gradually decomposed. Its minute parts become detached, and are removed far from their parent rock, by the action of the running waters. Frequent movement rubs off their angles; they assume a new form; they are known by a new name; they become sand or gravel. In either of these new forms, they are hurried to the great deep, and add their mite to that immense treasury. The same currents in the ocean bring the same materials, until either the one becomes expended, or the other differently directed. A bed, or stratum, is formed, which, under certain circumstances, becomes hardened into stone. It again assumes a new form, and is again known by yet another name; it becomes the free stone, or conglomerate of geologists. Thus we may trace the materials of secondary formations to the decomposition of the primitive creations.

"The primitive rocks of Werner are the following, amounting to fourteen: granite, gneiss, micaceous schistus or mica slate, argillaceous schistus or clay slate, primitive limestone, primitive trap, including hornblend and greenstone, serpentine, porphyry, sienite, topaz rock, quartz rock, primitive flinty slate, white stone, and primitive gypsum.

"Some geologists consider this catalogue as too limited, and include jasper, hornstone, pitchstone, and puddingstone, in the number of primitive rocks. All these rocks, though some of them be occasionally found mingled or alternated in strata with each other, are crystalline deposits, and are absolutely without any trace of organic remains, either of plants or animals. All rocks not included in the foregoing catalogue (except those called alluvial) are termed secondary, because they are found to contain more or less of organic remains: but it has been observed that the four rocks found in immediate succession to the preceding fourteen do not contain organic remains of the same characters as the rest. For although they contain some shells common to those in immediate succession to them, they alone are found to contain zoophytes, a species of animal which is considered as forming the first link in the chain of animated beings, none of which are found in any of the succeeding rocks. Werner has called these four, transition rocks, as connecting the primitive with the newer or flœtz (flat) rocks, containing abundant fossil remains, but by others they are included in secondary formations."—Phillips's Geology.

We have, in a former part of this treatise, considered the question of zoophytes being, as Mr. Phillips here states, "the first link in the chain of animated beings." It may now be sufficient in this place to point out, that as it is one part of the nature of zoophytes to inhabit the depths of the ocean, and there to become fixed, as plants are by the roots, without having it in their power, like the other inhabitants of the deep, to clear themselves from the sediments that are constantly being deposited, their remains are found in a fossil state, as we should naturally have anticipated, amongst the very earliest of these secondary strata, and before the remains of the testaceous animals could have accumulated in any great numbers.

The question then occurs, what were the primitive creations? and were they confined to the small number of rocks now considered as such by geologists? We feel quite satisfied that all the calcareous and secondary formations now known as such, did not exist in their present form in the beginning; because they contain the fossil remains of animals or vegetables which are often preserved in their most delicate parts, and which, consequently, must have been embedded at a period when these hard rocks were in the state of soft mud. But as the materials for the formation of these soft beds, must have originally been furnished from some primitive creation; and as a minute examination of them does not generally exhibit a crystalline appearance such as is supposed to characterize primitive rocks, it becomes a highly important consideration whether our present ideas of primitive creations are sufficiently extended. For example, what conclusion do we come to from a minute examination of the composition of chalk, which forms so extensive a portion of secondary formations? Its particles are of the finest earthy nature, and no appearance can be detected of any of the constituent parts of what are considered primitive rocks. In the finer sorts of clay we find the same smooth earthy character; and all limestone formations may perhaps be included in this remark. Some geologists have supposed that all limestone is as much an animal formation as coral.* This idea is probably unfounded; for if we can trace the formation of this extensive class of secondary rocks to the bed of the antediluvian ocean, we shall find reason to conclude that all these earthy formations, containing sea shells, must have been gradually formed by the accumulation of the finer particles of primitive decomposition.

Are we to suppose, then, at the end of the six days of the creation, when the new earth had been brought forth, adorned with "grass, and the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind," that all this vegetable world was nourished upon the solid primitive rocks, which in the present day are found to be utterly unfitted for vegetation? Are we to conclude that the same Almighty Power, which could create solid granite, together with all the varieties of the vegetable world, could not also provide the proper soils in which vegetables were to be nourished? No.—The idea would be worthy of that philosophy which imagines all things to have been at first in an imperfect state, and that their present order and beauty have gradually arisen by the mere laws of nature. It is more consistent with reason, as well as with the historical Record, to conclude, that as vegetables of every description were created perfect, there must have been a soil also created at the first, and suited to the nourishment of this new vegetable creation.

The consideration of the component parts of the loose alluvial soils, and of their origin, has, in general, been set aside, or overlooked by geologists; and our present soils are so mixed up with decomposed animal and vegetable matter, that we cannot, from them, form a distinct idea of what they originally must have been. But if we deny that a pure soil must have existed from the very first, we adopt the doctrine of secondary causes. We must, in that case, suppose that vegetation began, and gradually proceeded in much the same manner as is observed on the lava thrown out by volcanoes; which, for many years after it has cooled, remains solid and totally barren, and which first admits of only the most minute species of mosses; but by the gradual decomposition and renewal of these, and by the atmospheric action upon the lava itself, a soil is gradually formed, which proves in the end extremely fertile.

* "To say with Pythagoras, that the soul of a man can pass into the body of a bird, is to extend to a moral sense, this great truth in natural history. Nothing can be more contrary to reason or revelation than this idea; but, on the other hand, nothing is more certain, than that the alimentary matter of which a body is composed, is transformed into the flesh of the vulture that devours it.

† Mr. Scoresby, in his account of Spitzbergen, says, "the invariably broken state of the rocks," (upon a high mountain, the ascent of which he was attempting,) "appeared to be the effect of frost. No solid rock was met with, and no earth or soil. On calcareous rocks not impervious to moisture, the effect is such as might be expected: but how frost can operate on quartz, is not so easily understood.—Arctic Regions, vol. i. p. 122.

* It is not a little remarkable, that in all the secondary rocks of Europe, although we have many, consisting of almost one mass of shells, we find none which we could suppose were formed by insects, in the same manner as the coral reefs are in the present seas of southern latitudes. The extent of the coral formation is truly remarkable. The great coral reef, on the east coast of New Holland, extends unbroken for 350 miles, forming, with others, more or less connected with it, a reef upwards of 1,000 miles in length, and varying from 20 to 50 in breadth. As these reefs are known to be always founded in very deep water, they would form, if laid dry, a calcareous formation, before which many of our considerable mountain ridges would shrink in the comparison. We cannot, perhaps, find a more convincing argument in favour of the unchanged position of the axis and the poles of the earth since the creation, than in the total absence of coral reefs in the secondary formations of northern and temperate latitudes. Had the present poles of the earth been in the situation of the present equatorial regions, before the deluge, which is one of the prevailing arguments and sources of error and confusion in modern geology, we should certainly have found, in our secondary quarries, the petrified remains of former coral reefs.

We have before found reason, however, to come to a different conclusion. We have found, with Newton, "that it became Him who created all things, to set them in order; and if He did so, it is unphilosophical to seek for any other origin of things, or to pretend that they might have arisen, by the mere laws of nature."

We, therefore, conclude, that there must have been a primitive soil for the support of a primitive vegetation; that that soil must have been loose and friable, as at present, and subject, like the present soils, to continual movements by currents; and that it would, consequently, afford the materials for many of the secondary rocks, which geologists cannot otherwise account for.

I do not here propose entering into the mazes of hypothesis, by attempting to define what were the actual primitive creations in the mineral world; but as secondary formations must always have been in progress, (as they, even now, are going on) occasioned by the combined action of the atmosphere and the currents, their materials, however earthy, must have originally been primitive; and if a primitive vegetable creation required support from a primitive soil, we shall find, in the varieties to be naturally expected in such soils, a source for the variety we observe in the colour and grain of secondary rocks.

It may be demanded, what cause can be assigned for the variety in the colours of the different secondary formations? As well might a cause be sought for the varied colours of the primitive rocks, or the varied tints of the animal or vegetable world. When the colours of the tiger, the zebra, or the butterfly, are accounted for, we may hope for information as to the cause of chalk or Carrara marble being white, and other calcareous formations being of such variety of shades, down to the blackest marble. There can be no other reason given for such endless variety, but the will of a Beneficent Creator, who hast thought fit thus to adorn his incomprehensible creation with innumerable objects, well fitted to convince the most sceptical mortal who will be at the pains to study them, that neither accident, nor the laws of chemistry alone, could have produced such admirable variety.

It has already been observed, that the currents in the waters of the earth are the great agents by which almost all secondary formations have been, and still are, carried on. In order to render this more plain to the intelligence, it will be necessary, in this place, to enter somewhat at large into the subject, and to trace the operations of nature now going on under our eyes.

It is certain, then, that there is a continual circulation kept up in the waters of the earth. The heat of the sun causes an immense evaporation from both sea and land. The vapours thus raised, become either visible or invisible, according to the degree of heat in the atmosphere; and thus, when cooled either by their contact with mountains, or by currents of cold air from the poles, they become condensed into drops, and fall upon the earth by their own weight, in the form of rain or snow. But although the supplies of rivers are very materially influenced by the moisture derived from the atmosphere, in the form of rain or snow, we must be convinced that a more steady and constant supply must be obtained from some other source; otherwise many rivers would become completely dried up during the summer months, when they are most wanted for the support of both animal and vegetable life. This steady supply may be traced, in all hilly or mountainous countries, from whence streams generally flow, to the never failing springs invariably found, more or less, in such situations, and which have given rise to much discussion amongst philosophers, to account for such pure and copious steams, which are but little affected by the changes of wet or dry seasons of the year. It is to the action of the atmosphere alone that we must look for a solution of this problem. The day is gone by, when it was supposed that there was some internal communication between the sea, and the springs in the mountains, by means of which those pure and cooling fountains were kept in continual action. The whole process is now familiarly exhibited to our view in our every dining-rooms, by observing the effects of heated air on the surface of the cold caraffes upon our tables. It has been before explained, that a great quantity of moisture is absorbed by the atmosphere, from the surface of the waters of the earth, occasioned by the heat of the sun: this moisture is generally evaporated in an invisible form; but it nevertheless pervades, in a greater or less degree, every part of the atmosphere, and becomes visible in the form of clouds, when cooled by cold currents of air, or by contact with mountains, the surface of which is colder than the temperature of the surrounding atmosphere. But even in the finest and clearest weather, these watery vapours hover around us, in an invisible shape, and become condensed in the form of dew on the surface of rocks, or of plants, during the absence of the sun, and thus afford nourishment to vegetation even during the hottest weather.

But in the hilly and mountainous districts, these vapours are constantly, more or less, condensed upon the surface of the rocks or of the ground; and trickling down the sides and fissures, guided by the direction of the strata, they occasionally meet with obstructions through which they cannot pass, and are thus forced upwards to the surface, and break forth in the form of springs, which never cease to flow, because the source from which they are supplied can never cease to act.*

Every one is familiar with the effects of rain. A heavy fall upon the tops of the mountains detaches the various sized particles already loosened by the action of the atmosphere. They are hurried along by the little rills into the brooks, by the brooks into the rivers, and finally by the rivers into the sea, the waters of which are partially tinged with these turbid streams. Every river, in the whole earth, is more or less heavily charged with earthy matter, on its reaching the parent ocean. The nature and colour of this muddy mixture must depend upon those of the countries through which the rivers flow.

Having now traced the course of this earthy matter to the sea, it becomes necessary to observe in what way it is disposed of, in the bosom of the depths; and, for this purpose, we must consider the nature and action of this great body of waters. The continual influence of the moon, aided in a less powerful degree by the attraction also of the sun, is known to be the occasion of the tides which assist in keeping up the circulation of the waters.† But a much more powerful agent is continually at work in producing this effect; and as this agent, and its effects, do not come so familiarly within our view, its power is not so generally understood or acknowledged. This agent is the general system of the currents in the ocean.

* It is to this particular action of the atmosphere, when coming in contact with a lower temperature than its own, that we can often trace the cause of that dampness in our houses, which nothing can ever entirely obviate. Granite, whinstone, and some other rocks, are highly objectionable, as building materials, on account of their great coldness; and in houses built of such material, one may always observe, in winter, on a change from frost to thaw, a dewy appearance standing thick upon the surface, and, in the end, running down in copious streams, like a violent perspiration. The common objection made to such stones, is, that they retain moisture, and perspire at certain times; this, however, is a vulgar error.

If a house be built upon a clay soil, the dampness, which is a usual consequence, does not arise so much from the clay being wet in itself, as from its great coldness, which condenses the warm air of the atmosphere, and thus forms a constant moisture. It is obvious, then, that sand, stone, or brick, as a material, and a light sandy soil, as a foundation, must produce the most dry and healthy dwelling.

† The following clear description of the tides is given by Sir David Brewster, in his "Life of Sir Isaac Newton."

"One of the great subjects to which Newton applied the principles of attraction and gravity, was, the tides of the ocean. Philosophers of all ages had recognized the connection between the phenomena of the tides, and the position of the moon. That the moon is the principle cause of the tides is obvious, from the well known fact, that it is high water at any given place about the time when she is in the meridian of that place; and that the sun performs a secondary part in their production, is proved by the circumstance, that the highest, or spring tides, take place when the sun, the moon, and the earth, are all in a straight line; that is, when the force of the attraction of the sun conspires with that of the moon; and that the lowest, or neap tides, take place when lines drawn from the sun and moon to the earth, are at right angles to each other; that is, when the force of the attraction of the sun acts in opposition to that of the moon. But the most perplexing phenomenon in the tides, and one which is still a stumbling-block to persons slightly acquainted with the theory of attraction, is the existence of high water on the side furthest from the moon, at the same time as on the side next the moon. To maintain that the attraction of the moon at the same time draws the waters of the earth towards herself, and also draws them from the earth in an opposite direction, seems, at first sight, paradoxical. But the difficulty vanishes, when we consider the earth, (or rather the centre of the earth,) and the waters on each side of it, as three distinct bodies, placed at different distances from the moon, and, consequently, attracted with forces inversely proportioned to the squares of their distances. The waters nearest the moon will be much more powerfully attracted than the centre of the earth, and the centre of the earth more than the waters furthest from the moon. The consequence of this must be, that the waters nearest the moon will be drawn away from the centre of the earth, and will, consequently, rise from their level; while the earth will be drawn away from the waters opposite the moon, which will, as it were, be left behind, and be in the same situation as if raised from the earth in a direction opposite to that in which they are attracted by the moon."

These currents have long been remarked by voyagers in every part of the sea; and they have been found so powerful that vessels are constantly borne out of their course, unless due allowance be made for their influence. It was long supposed that these rivers in the ocean were occasioned by the action of the tides: but modern science and observation has proved this idea to have been unfounded; and has discovered that there is as regular a circulation in the great deep as in the veins of the human body. These currents chiefly arise from the following causes. In consequence of the powerful action of the sun in tropical climates, the loss by evaporation from the sea, is much greater than can be supplied by the quantity of rain which falls in these latitudes. The moisture thus imbibed by the atmosphere, passes into the regular circulation of the air; and when carried into the temperate or polar regions of the earth, it becomes condensed, and falls there in much greater quantity than these regions lose by evaporation. This superabundant supply of water cannot, from the figure and motion of the earth, remain where it falls, but rushes back towards the equator in currents, the directions of which must depend, in a great measure, on the forms of the coasts they may meet with in their course: and as no strong current can take place either in the air or in the waters, without a variety of eddies, or counter currents, as we familiarly know, on a small scale, by observing a strong stream in any river, or by the draughts of air in our houses, such are abundantly to be found in the ocean, and sometimes on so large a scale, and in such a direction, as might appear in opposition to the system above explained, unless the whole be viewed upon an enlarged scale. It has been supposed by some, that the winds, and especially the regular trade winds, have a great influence on the currents of the ocean, and may even be regarded as the cause of this constant motion in the waters. But this is taking too superficial a view of the subject. It is known that the currents of the air affect the surface of the waters, merely by contact and friction in the same manner as in the friction of any other two substances; and however the surface of the ocean may be agitated by this contact, and raised into waves by its force, we cannot suppose it capable of acting to any considerable depth, or of displacing large bodies of water. It is, indeed, understood, that though the swell of a wave advances on the surface, the water over which it moves remains nearly stationary; so that, although the winds may, in some small degree, aid or impede the tides or the currents, they cannot be considered the cause of the movement, any more in the one case than in the other. There appears to be a close resemblance between this circulation kept up in the waters, and that known to exist in the atmosphere. In the latter we have winds of various power and continuance, and also whirlwinds, occasioned, like the whirlpools in fluids, by the action of two contrary streams, or by the disturbance occasioned by an opposing object. There are also such decided counter-currents in the air, from the effort to preserve a just balance in that element, that it is a common practice with æronauts to send up a small balloon before launching their larger one, in order to discover in what direction the upper currents of the wind may be setting.

The whole system of the currents in the ocean can probably never be distinctly defined, on account of its great extent, and the very partial observations of voyagers. Besides, there must be a constant though slow alteration in the directions of their smaller divisions, according as the opposing objects are gradually worn away. But the general outline of the larger branches may be traced with tolerable distinctness, and may be here explained as they now exist in our own times. The present great system of currents, then, may be traced from the western coast of America across the Pacific ocean; of this current we as yet know little, but that it exists. But one branch of it strikes on the south of New Holland, running through Bass's Straits, round South Cape; and another branch runs amongst the islands of the Archipelago, on the north of New Holland. On entering the Indian ocean, and meeting the south polar current, it runs through the gulf of Bengal, round cape Comorin, and over to Africa, acquiring great velocity in its passage. From the straits of Babelmandel, it keeps always a south-west direction, till it doubles the Cape of Good Hope, when it turns to the north-west, following the line of the coast. On approaching the equator it sets nearly west. When in the latitude of three degrees north it meets with another current, which has run southerly along the west coast of Africa, with which it unites, and crosses the Atlantic, nearly W. S. W. On reaching the Brazils, it diverges at cape St. Augustine into two streams; one going S. W. parallel with the coast till it doubles Cape Horn, where it meets the south polar currents. The other part of this great Atlantic stream proceeds in a northerly direction through the gulf of Glandin, along the shores of the United States, where it is called the Gulf Stream, to Newfoundland; and here it is backed by the north polar currents; takes an easterly course across the Atlantic, coming over to the coast of Norway and the British Isles, and turning thence to the south, through the bay of Biscay, and along the coasts of Spain and Africa, meets the great southern current in the latitude of three degrees north. The breadth of the African branch of this magnificent ocean river is supposed to be from 150 to 1000 miles. At the Cape of Good Hope it runs at the rate of about two miles an hour; at the equator three and a half; and in the Gulf Stream four miles an hour.

It may easily be supposed what changes must be constantly taking place in the bed of the ocean, and on the shores of the dry land, by the never-ceasing action of these currents, the force of which is too powerful to be more than slightly affected by the action of the tides or the winds. There is, probably, a very great re-action also below the surface, and at greater depths than our very limited observations can penetrate.*

If such is the power and action of the currents and the tides in the earth, as it now is, we may safely conclude that they were not less active in the Antediluvian seas, the beds of which we now inhabit; having it thus in our power to examine the various strata of earthly debris, which, in the course of more than sixteen centuries, were deposited in various directions, according to the partial changes that must be constantly taking place in the direction of the currents, as the opposing points by which they are in a great degree guided, are worn away.

Having thus found one agent of sufficient power to remove vast quantities of mineral matter from the land into the ocean, and another, the effect of which is, gradually to arrange this matter in strata more or less horizontal, according to the form or slope of the primitive bed on which they are deposited, we can have little difficulty in accounting for most of the phenomena now discovered in the lower secondary formations of our earth. For the upper secondary formations and alluvial soils, we shall find a full and sufficient cause when we come to the consideration of the Mosaic deluge.

We must now resume the consideration of the primitive ocean from its first being "gathered together" until the Mosaic deluge, a period amounting to about 1656 years; and which will be found fully sufficient to account for many of the geological phenomena exposed to our view. For when we apply to the utmost depths of secondary formations, the scale on which we are now considering the whole earth; and also when we think of the great extent of decomposition and reformation incessantly proceeding in our own times, we shall feel satisfied that the indefinite periods assumed by the chaotic philosophy, are infinitely greater than the existing phenomena demand;† and we shall, consequently, have a more confirmed confidence in the truth of the inspired record.

CHAPTER V.

General Nature of the Formations on the Earth.—Origin and Progress of Secondary Formations.—Causes of Stratification in Secondary Rocks.—Such Deposits become gradually Mineralized.—Calcareous Formations.—Salt Deposits.—Proof of Granite not being an Aqueous Deposit.—Secondary Formations now in Progress in the Bed of the Ocean.

The active researches of geologists into the existing phenomena on the surface of the earth, have led to the following conclusions with respect to mineral bodies.

"PRIMITIVE ROCKS

"Consist only of crystalline formations;
They contain no organic remains;
They are found below all other rocks;
And they rise from the base, through all other rocks, forming the summits of the most lofty mountains.

* We may look for much interesting and useful information respecting the currents of the ocean, in a work now in course of publication, and written by the late Major Rennell. It is understood to apply, more particularly, to the currents of the Atlantic.

† See page 55, and note, page 65.

"Transition and Floetz, (or Secondary Rocks.)
"Consist partly of clay-tallose, partly of mechanical deposits;
They contain organic remains of sea shells;
And are never found under primitive rocks.

"Alluvial Deposits
"Consist of mechanical deposits;
They result from the ruin of rocks;
They contain abundance of shells, together with the bones of quadrupeds," and of the human race;
"And they are found above all the other rocks."*

Thus far the chaotic and the Mosaic geologies coincide; the facts are self-evident, and within the reach of every one who will take the trouble to examine them. But when the causes by which these facts have been produced, come under consideration, the two geologies separate; the one following the path which history has marked out, and which reason can comprehend, leading at every step towards the light of truth; the other, under a variety of leaders, plunges into the dark and devious mazes of hypothesis, rejects the guidance of history, and is led more and more into obscurity and error. There is no possible way of clearing this labyrinth and of gaining the desired end, but by retracing our steps and taking advantage of the clue which history affords us. But in doing this, we must keep constantly in mind the difficulties from which we have escaped; and the impossibility we have experienced of tracing primitive effects to secondary causes. Truth and reason acknowledge but one primitive cause; and that is, an Almighty, though to us, incomprehensible Creator.

Having found the arguments in favour of secondary causes, or the mere laws of nature, as they are called, totally insufficient to account satisfactorily to our reason, for the first formation of crystallized mineral bodies, any more than for the first formation of animal or vegetable bodies, we come to the unavoidable conclusion that they were all the creative work of an Almighty hand. But as it is evident that this creation, as soon as completed, was submitted to certain laws, by some of which a constant succession of decay and re-formation was to be kept up in the mineral world, at least as far as regards the mere surface of the earth, it may be considered quite within the scope of our reason to examine these laws, and to account for these secondary effects by secondary causes.

We find, then, that it is one constant law of the Creator that the action of the atmosphere shall decompose or break up the mineral bodies exposed to its influence. We find another called the law of gravity, by which the waters of the earth, in seeking their own level, are hurried from the highest mountains to the sea; carrying along with them abundance of mineral matter in the shape of sand, mud and gravel. We find a third law by which the waters of the ocean are kept in constant agitation; and the mineral matter imported by the rivers, is arranged in classes, according to the weight and volume of its parts, and distributed over the sea bed in various directions, and in various quantities, according to the nature of the currents which remove it.†

These three laws, which have been in constant action since the first creation of the seas, the rivers, and the atmosphere, which events, history informs us, took place about 6000 years ago, are fully sufficient to account for a prodigious accumulation of decomposed mineral matter in the bed of the ocean.*

Should any event, then, take place to enable us to examine that bed in a dry state, we could feel no surprise if we should discover the original crystallized surface of the earth, loaded with various accumulations, resulting evidently from such decomposition of rocks as the atmosphere every where occasions, as the rivers every where become charged with, and as the currents of the ocean must, at all times, be depositing. As it is one part of the laws of gravity, that deposits in fluids shall fall to the bottom, in the same horizontal position in which these fluids themselves are retained by attraction, we should expect to find these deposits in this particular position; unless the irregular form of that part of the primitive earth on which they happened to be laid, occasioned an irregularity also in the deposited mass. Should any very considerable elevation or irregularity have existed on the primitive surface of the earth, such as we now denominate an Alpine height, but at the bottom of the primitive sea, we should expect to discover the various horizontal deposits of various changing currents laid one above another, towards its top. If this top had been of sufficient elevation to be above the surface of the waters in the form of an island, we should not look for any such deposits above the level which the waters had reached; but, on the contrary, we should expect to find the bare primitive rock free from all secondary formation.†

After taking this general view of the bed of a former ocean, supposing it to be within our power to do so, we should naturally enter upon a more minute examination of the various mineral masses of which these deposits were formed.‡

* Phillips's Geology.

† This law of arrangement, which is founded on the law of gravity, may be looked upon as the great agent in distinct stratification. And as this law could not be in force without the lateral movement kept up by the currents of the ocean, we cannot look for its effects in situations where such constant action and re-action of currents do not exist. Thus we never can expect to find the secondary formations of fresh water lakes, however extensive, in the same stratified arrangement as in the bed of the sea. Whatever sand, mud, gravel or rock is lodged in a lake by rivers, must, therefore, remain exactly in the same irregular mass as when first imported and deposited; and, accordingly, we never find the shores of lakes, or the banks of rivers, presenting the same distinct classification as is always found, more or less, on the sea shores. For the same reason, we may be assured that in draining marshes or lakes, when we cut through distinct strata of sand, marl, gravel, or fine clay, which are all generally found in strata in such situations, we are to attribute such deposits, as well as their fossil contents, to a period when the action of the sea was in force; and that the hollow basin-like form which now causes a marsh or a lake, must have been at least partially coated with marine strata at the period of the deluge. We must, however, be guided by circumstances, in forming a judgment in such cases, as there can be no doubt that many places which were formerly shallow lakes or marshes, are now nearly dry, from the growth of peat, or the accumulation of the debris of land streams; and we must, consequently, judge of the nature of the soils, and of the period of the fossil deposits, according to their degree of stratification, and the nature of the embedding soils.

The remains of deer and other animals often found in peat mosses, must, therefore, be considered antediluvian, or, otherwise, according to the situation in which they occur, and according to the presence or absence of land streams, by the agency of which the deposits might have been made. The well known fossil elks of Ireland, and of the Isle of Man, may probably be regarded as truly antediluvian; though geologists have often considered them as much more modern.

‡ "In a late publication by Mr. Lyell, which has come under my notice since the above was written, and which is a work full of information of the most important kind, with regard to natural secondary causes, which he considers sufficient to account for all the appearances on the surface of the earth, we find a calculation with respect to the quantity of mud lodged in the sea by the Ganges, which appears, as it is well calculated to do, to shake to its foundation the theory of the author; for it is obvious, that it proves too much to suit his idea of millions of years, as the age of the world. After stating the calculations of Rennell, and of Major Colebrooke, with respect to the waters of the Ganges, which are calculated to contain one part, in four, of mud, Mr. Lyell continues: "But, although we can readily believe the proportion of sediment in the waters of the Ganges to exceed that of any river in northern latitudes, we are somewhat staggered by the results to which we must arrive, if we compare the proportion of mud, as given by Rennell, with his computation of the quantity of water discharged, which latter is probably very correct. If it be true that the Ganges, in the flood-season, contains one part, in four, of mud, we shall then be obliged to suppose that there passes down, every four days, a quantity of mud, equal in volume to the water which is discharged in the course of twenty-four hours. If the mud be assumed to be equal to one half the specific gravity of granite, (it would, however, be more,) the weight of matter daily carried down in the flood season, would be about equal to 74 times the weight of the Great Pyramid of Egypt. Even if it could be proved that the turbid waters of the Ganges contain one part in a hundred of mud, which is possible, and which is affirmed to be the case in regard to the Rhine, we should be brought to the extraordinary conclusion, that there passes down, every day, into the Bay of Bengal, a mass more than equal in weight and bulk to the Great Pyramid."—Principles of Geology, vol. i. page 254.

Let the candour of this very able author calculate this effect over the whole earth for 2000 years, and then consider it as having acted for one or two millions of years; and let him say which result bears the most just proportion to the secondary formations actually found to load the primitive surface of the earth.

† "Of the nature of the bed of the ocean we know but little. The portions of it which have been explored by soundings, are found, in one place, to contain immense collections of the wreck of testaceous animals, intermixed with sand or gravel; and in another, to consist of soft alluvial mud, several feet in depth. Donati found the bottom of the Adriatic to be composed of a compact bed of shells, not less than a hundred feet in thickness."—Edin. Encyclop. Physical Geography, p. 518.

It was likewise discovered, in the researches of Donati, that, at a very few feet below the surface of the bed of the Adriatic, the deposits were converted, by pressure, and by the actions of the chemical laws of nature, into solid marble, and the shells completely petrified.

‡ "Various marine substances are to be found almost in every part of the extensive province of Chili, and even on the tops of some of its lofty mountains. In the main ridge of the Andes, the internal

And here we should soon find that the laws by which the world is governed, are not confined to those three, by the action of which these deposits have been formed. We should have to consult the voluminous code of chemical laws, the foundations of which, like those of all the other laws of God, are beyond our comprehension; but in the action of which, human science has made so many brilliant discoveries. We should every where discover effects produced by these chemical laws, varying according to the situation, and the nature of the materials to be acted upon. Instead of finding these materials, when freed from the waters in which they had been deposited, simply in the state of dry sand, mud, or gravel, and equally loose and friable as they must have been at the period of their deposition, we should find them cemented together in the most solid and compact manner. All the intervening spaces between the angles of the grosser particles, filled up with a stony matter, and the whole assuming the appearance and qualities of solid rock.*

Where cavites had, by any accident, been formed, either in the first deposition, or, as would be more probable, in the course of desiccation, we should frequently find that wonderful and unaccountable law in operation, by which fluids assume, in drying, a crystalline form. As the primitive ocean had, by the command of the Almighty, produced, "abundantly the moving creature that hath life;" and as many of these creatures were destined to become the permanent inhabitants of the deep, we should feel no surprise, in every where discovering more or less of animal remains, mixed up with the mineral deposits of their own proper element. But as the fish of the sea, as well as the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field, are guided by the laws of instinct for their self-preservation; and as instinctive self-preservation would lead them, when alive, to keep upon the surface of these gradually forming deposites, unless when overpowered or buried by any unusual accumulation, we should seldom expect to find more than the shelly remains of the crustaceous animals.† Even these would be looked for, but in small numbers, in the first marine deposits; and they would afterwards be found gradually more abundant, as the bed of the sea became more loaded with the remains of past generations.* We could have little expectation of discovering the remains of fish, and still less, those of quadrupeds, in these gradually formed sea deposites; for though race after race, of the finny tribes, must have perished from the very first, and the bodies of many land animals, and even of human beings, must have been conveyed to the ocean, in the common course of events, before the flood; yet that wonderful law of God, by which so just a balance is preserved throughout the animal creation, would have prevented almost a possibility of the remains of the dead being covered up, or preserved: for no sooner does a fish perish, than its body disappears among the voracious tribes of the deep; and those of terrestrial animals could rarely meet with any other fate.†

On a closer inspection of some of the finer earthy deposits, having every appearance of having once been a tenacious mud, we should find them variously loaded with these crustaceous remains. We should also find, that the whole mass had become impregnated with a calcareous quality, which was not to be found in any of the formations generally considered primitive; and which, therefore, must have been acquired by some of those chemical laws at all times in action in the world. We should find some difficulty in coming to any positive conclusion with respect to the original cause of this calcareous property; more especially, when we discover a similar calcareous principle in the shells and bones of both terrestrial and marine animals.‡

The deposits of salt which we might discover, would, in no way, surprise us, having had connexion with waters of the same briny character. But the question, whether the saltness of the ocean be derived from the mineral, or the mineral be a chemical deposit from the water, would probably lead us out of the plain beaten track we had determined to pursue, and should, therefore, be declined, and left for future investigation, as not in any way affecting the general question.§

In the whole of this general review of the secondary formations, however, we should be deeply impressed with this remarkable fact, that in all these various formations, in which the laws of chemistry had been observed to have acted so powerfully, and in some of which even crystallization appeared, in many cases, to have taken place, we should discover no trace of such formations as we had previously remarked in primitive rocks, which we had been taught to believe were originally crystallized in an aqueous fluid of the very self same character.

We should no where find granite, or any other primitive rock, amongst the secondary chemical deposits; and we should consider this fact alone, as a positive confirmation of the conclusion we had before come to by a different process, viz. that the primitive creations never could have arisen in an aqueous fluid, by the mere laws of nature.

It is scarcely necessary to observe, that the case which has been here put hypothetically, of having it in our power to make this actual survey of the bed of the former ocean, has in fact occurred; as is sufficiently testified by the numerous phenomena presented to us, over nearly the whole surface of the present dry land.

But in order to form a more defined idea of the mode of secondary formations, let us, for a moment, consider the action of these same laws by which we have supposed them to have been formed, as they may, at any time, be observed go-structure consists of primitive rocks of granite and quartz. The maritime and midland mountains, together with the lateral chains of the Andes, are of secondary formation; their strata, which are horizontal, and of unequal thickness, abound with marine productions, and contain the impressions of animal bodies."—Molina's Natural and Civil History of Chili.

* We are sometimes enabled to form some idea of the operations in the great laboratory of nature, and can thus trace, in some remarkable instances, the action of this petrifying power. One of the most remarkable of these instances is described by Mr. Morier as existing in Persia, not far from Maragha. A mineral spring issues from the earth in bubbles, and falls into a basin of about 15 feet in diameter. On flowing over the edges of this basin, the water spreads over the ground, forming numerous ponds and plashes, and in these it becomes hard, and produces that beautiful transparent stone, commonly called Tabreez marble. "The process of petrifaction," says Mr. Morier, "may be traced from its first beginning to its termination. In one part, the water is clear; in a second, it appears thicker, and stagnant; in a third, quite black; and, in the last stage, it is white, like hoar frost. The petrified ponds look like frozen water; a stone slightly thrown upon them breaks the crust, and the black water exudes. But where the operation is complete, a man may walk upon the surface without wetting his shoes. A section of the stony mass appears like sheets of rough paper, in accumulated layers. Such is the constant tendency of this water to become stone, that the bubbles become hard, as if, by a stroke of magic, they had been arrested, and metamorphosed into marble." Instances nearly as remarkable, are seen at the falls of Terni in Italy, at the famous hot springs in Iceland, in Derbyshire, and in many other places.

"I saw," says Saussure, "on the sea shore, near the Pharo de Messina, sands which were loose and friable, when lodged by the waves on the shore, but which, by means of the calcareous juice infiltrated into them by the sea, gradually becomes so hard, as to be used as millstones. This process takes place in the course of a very few years."—Comp. Estim. vol. ii. p. 45.

† In the course of considerable experience in the search of fossil shells in various secondary formations, I have been led to the conclusion that these fossil remains must, in by far the greater number of cases, have been embedded after the death of the fish that inhabited them. The chalk formation is especially remarkable for the perfect state of preservation in which it renders up its fossil treasures; and they are often found retaining the remains of their most delicate parts, as perfect as when first embedded. In the case of the echini, for example, many of which are, in the natural state, covered with spines, like a hedgehog, I have found, in a few of the most perfect fossil specimens, just sufficient indication of a spine, to convince me how complete they would have been, had they been buried in a living state. But as they are almost always, more or less, stripped of their spines, it appears certain that they must have been exposed to the friction of the waters, in an empty state, before they were covered up. The fractured and disordered position of fossils in general, also tend to the same opinion.

* See page 61, note.

† Fish are rarely found in a fossil state in the lower secondary formations; but the fact occasionally occurs, as might be expected, as exceptions to what may be called a general rule. They are, however, found in great abundance in diluvial formations, as we shall have occasion to perceive, in considering the effects of the deluge.

‡ "The component parts of bones are chiefly four; namely, earthy salts, fat, gelatine, and cartilage. The earthy salts are four in number, 1st. Phosphate of lime, which constitutes by far the greater part of the whole. 2d. Cardonate of lime. 3d. Phosphate of magnesia. 4th. Sulphate of lime."—Edin. Encyclop. Chemistry, p. 158.

"Lime has been known from the remotest ages. It abounds in every part of the earth, constituting immense ranges of rocks and mountains. It may be obtained by burning calcareous spars, and certain marbles. Oyster shells, when burnt, yield it nearly pure."—Ibid. p. 45.

§ The saline principle so generally found in all animal productions, would incline us to refer all saltness to the great laboratory of nature, and not to attribute it solely to marine origin. With regard to salt, as a solid mineral body, I shall have occasion to make some remarks upon it, in a subsequent chapter. [See chap. 8.)

ing on under our eyes. Let us station ourselves on a part of the sea coast, near the mouth of any great river, and consider how the laws of nature are continually acting. We must, however, in the absence of extensive primitive coasts, which are now scarcely any where to be found, content ourselves with illustrations from the secondary and alluvial formations with which our present shores are loaded; so that the secondary deposits, now in progress, are formed from secondary rocks, instead of from primitive, as the antediluvian deposits must have been.

Let us station ourselves, for instance, on that point of our own shores, formed by the Isle of Thanet, where we have, to the south, a great extent of chalky coast, and to the north, the mouth of our noble Thames. And, first, let us observe the action of the atmosphere on the chalky cliffs of this island. There are few of the secondary formations more easily affected than the chalk, by the alternate moisture and dryness of our climate: and this is materially assisted by the chemical action of the salt from the spray of the sea. In the spring of the year, when the heat of the sun becomes powerful, and evaporates the abundant moisture imbibed by the chalk during the winter, the whole surface of the cliff, as it were, exfoliates; and large masses, becoming detached, are precipitated on the sands below, in a crumbling heap of ruin. The very first succeeding tide that flows, begins the work of transportation; and the waters retire, on the ebb tide, loaded with the finest particles of this chalky ruin. But though this insatiable enemy retires white with its booty, and sullies, for a considerable distance, the purity of the ocean, yet, on every succeeding flow, it again advances empty handed: the flowing waves are as transparent as if no chalk existed on the whole coast. A few weeks or months of this never-ceasing action gradually diminishes even the most solid portions of the chalk; and, at length, the sands are as pure and as free from earthy matter, as if no fall had ever taken place. Now, though we may liken this gradual disappearance of the chalk to that of salt or sugar immersed in water, there is this most material difference; that in the one case, the matter is actually dissolved, and held in solution as long as the moisture continues; but in the other, the indissoluble earthy particles of the chalk are carried off bodily by the waves; and are only held in suspension, until, by their own weight, they sink to the bottom of the sea, and are added, in the form of mud, to beds that must have been in the course of formation ever since that great revolution which placed the chalky bottom of the antediluvian sea in a situation to be thus acted upon as the high coast of the postdiluvian ocean.*

It is not so easy to determine in what part of the bed of the sea this chalky mud is now being deposited; but there is considerable reason to suppose that it is not in the immediate neighbourhood of the present shores: for there, the currents seem to deposit sand in such immense quantities, as to render the navigation both difficult and dangerous. We no where hear of a muddy bottom: every thing is either sand or solid chalk. And here we have numerous examples of the changes that are gradually effected in the form and structure of the bed of the ocean. Every old pilot, well acquainted with the difficult navigation of this part of the coast, can relate instances, within his own memory, where the shifting nature of the sand banks renders the most watchful attention to the landmarks, and buoys, so necessary. The form and extent of the fatal Goodwin sands have undergone considerable changes within a comparatively short period of time. They now extend many miles in length, and are formed of so pure a sand, that scarcely a shell is to be found upon them, and no gravel whatever. The ramifications of this bank, extending northward towards the mouth of the Thames, are all formed of an equally pure sand, which is dry and hard at low water.†

Now, as all this sand is a primitive crystalline formation, having no mixture of calcareous earths, except, perhaps, particles of broken sea shells, in small quantity, we must conclude, that it is brought from other parts, by the currents, and that the lighter and finer muddy deposits, which are not found so commonly on that coast, are carried off and deposited in some of the depths of the ocean.

Wherever these secondary formations may be in the act of deposition, we could feel no surprise, if, on examining them in a dry and hard state, we should discover, embedded in them, the shells of such crustaceous animals as may inhabit these depths; and if we should even find the remains of fish, or "creeping thing," with which we were unacquainted, we should not feel justified in concluding that they were not the inhabitants of our present seas, or not of existing species, because our research had not yet penetrated their deep abodes. For we may rest assured, that however minutely we may scan the dry land, and its various productions, there are treasures in the great deep, that are for ever placed far beyond the eye of the most active naturalist.

But let us now turn our thoughts towards the flowing Thames, and observe the continual operations carried on by its unwearied waters. We shall find them charged with a load of earthy matter, collected, in their course, from the various formations through which the river flows. This burden must necessarily be of the most indiscriminate character; but these various bodies are to be deposited in an element where each species of importation is most exactly sifted, and every thing is arranged according to its own particular class. The muddy, the sandy, or the gravelly bodies, which are thus in constant motion downwards, from the highest sources of the river, are all at length submitted to the action of those laws of NATURE, which regulate the deep. We cannot suppose that all this earthy matter remains in the form of banks and shoals, near the immediate mouth of the river itself; for if this were the case, that mouth must long since have been completely blocked up. But, although we always find rivers closed, more or less, with a bar, occasioned by the contending action of the tide, and the stream; yet we do not perceive that bar materially to increase; for the exact balance is, at all times, kept up by the constant removal of superfluous matter, by the action of the currents of the neighbouring ocean.*

* There cannot exist a doubt, that, though England be now separated from France by a distance of from 20 to 40 miles, and that distance be now occupied by the sea, the whole intervening space, and a great extent of both countries, form one continuous secondary formation of chalk, of which the basins of Paris, London, and the Isle of Wight, so well known to geologists, form a part. It is the opinion of some, whose ideas in geology are quite unfettered by history, as to time, that the two countries were once united, and that the separation has been effected by gradual decay, from the action of the sea upon a narrow isthmus. But history will not bear us out in this idea; for we know, from certain landmarks, which existed many centuries ago, such as the Roman part of Dover Castle, and other ancient buildings on the coast, that the decay of the cliffs, though constant and gradual, has not been such, in the last 2000 years, as to warrant any such conclusion, supposing the deluge to have taken place, as we have reason to know it did, about 4000 years ago.

† It is traditionally reported, that this formidable sand bank, in which the wreck of many a tall ship has been buried, was once a cultivated island, and part of the property of the Earl of Godwin.

The ancient Roman castle of Richborough, about a mile north of Sandwich, was once a sea port, though it is now fully two miles from the shore. At that period, the Isle of Thanet was really an island, being separated from the main land by a channel, at one end of which was Richborough, and at the other Reculvers, both Roman stations, under the names of Ritupium and Rigulbium. In the Romney Marsh, on the south coast of Kent, there was another Roman port, which is now several miles from the shore.

* As an instance of the power with which rivers act, in filling up inland lakes, and in adding to the accumulations in the bed of the sea, the following example may serve to give an idea.

The river Kander, a mountain torrent of no great size, rushes down the valley of Kanderthal, in the Canton Burne, in Switzerland, and enters the lake of Thoun, about four miles from the town so called. About a hundred years ago, this stream did not flow into the lake, from which its course was cut off by a ridge of diluvial hills of several hundred feet in height, stretching along the south side of the lake, in a north-westerly direction. This diluvial ridge, extending more than ten miles in length, is entirely composed of rounded gravel, or pudding stone.

In consequence of the mischief done by the overflowing of the Kander, to a great extent of valuable meadow land, in its course to join the Arr, ten miles below Thoun, which was its natural course, a spirited plan was proposed and adopted, for cutting a subterraneous passage for the river, through the above mentioned ridge, at a place where it approached the lake within about a mile, and thus admitting it into its bed. This passage was cut in the beginning of the last century (about 1715.) The descent was rapid, from the lake being considerably lower than the old course of the river. At this period, the depth of the lake was in proportion to the steep hills forming its shore. The Kander had not long followed its new subterraneous course, when it greatly enlarged the artificial tunnel, and hurried great quantities of gravel into the lake. The rapidity of the torrent in a few years enlarged its course, till at length the whole superstructure gave way, and fell in; so that there is now a most romantic wild glen, where, a century ago, there was smooth pasture and wood lands. The effects of the torrent soon became apparent in the lake: an immense quantity of gravel, and every species of rock, was carried in by the current, and lodged in its bed. In 1829, when I lived in that neighbourhood, the bed formed of this debris, was of not less extent than 300 acres; the greater part was covered with thick wood; and this secondary formation is every year increasing in the same proportion; so that, as the lake is not there of great breadth, there is every prospect of a rapid and most material

If this, then, is the system now in action, on a small portion of our own shores, to what an extent must it be going on around our whole island. And if we extend our view, and consider the more gigantic scale of the rivers on the continents, and the more direct influence of the great currents upon their vast importations, we shall find a cause fully sufficient for the formation of secondary deposits of great depth and variety, in the course of a comparatively short space of time.

CHAPTER VI.

The Deluge.—Traditional Evidence of that Event.—Erroneous Ideas commonly entertained respecting it.—Distinctness of Scripture on the Subject.—Evidence from Scripture.—Evidence from the Ancient, though Apocryphal, Book of Enoch.—Theories of Philosophy on the Subject.—The most probable Cause of that Destructive Event.

In the former part of this work, and in taking a general view of the phenomena presented to our observation on the surface of our earth, a confident hope was held out, that we should be able fully to account for all those phenomena, by considering, with a candid and unprejudiced judgment, the three great events recorded in history, viz. 1st, the creation of the world; 2d, the formation of a bed for the gathering together of the waters, together with the action of the laws of nature within that bed, for upwards of sixteen centuries; and lastly, the deluge, as described by Moses in the book of Genesis. We have already, at some length, considered the two first of these great events; and in the last of the two, we have found an unquestionable source of very extensive secondary formation, and sufficient to account for a large proportion of all those, actually existing, on the primitive surface of the earth. We have thus satisfactorily explained the formation of the transition rocks containing few or no fossil remains; and also accounted for the early sand stone, and calcareous formations, together with the abundance of fossil sea shells found in the latter.

We now, therefore, come to the consideration of that great event by which so complete a revolution has occurred upon the earth, and by means of which alone we are now enabled to trace out a part of the operations of those laws, to which the world has been submitted by its Creator. For had we now been placed in the situation of the antediluvian world, as inhabitants of a primitive surface, we could have had none of that information which we now derive from the inspection of the secondary formations on which we dwell.

"According to the most approved systems of chronology, this remarkable event happened in the year 1656, after the creation, or about 2348 years before the Christian æra.—Of so general a calamity, from which only a single family of all then living on the earth was preserved, we might naturally expect to find some memorials in the traditionary records of Pagan history, as well as in the sacred volume. Its magnitude and singularity could scarcely fail to make an indelible impression on the minds of the survivors, which would be communicated from them to their children, and would not be easily effaced from the traditions even of their latest posterity. A deficiency in such traces of this awful event, though it might not entirely invalidate our belief of its reality, would certainly tend considerably to weaken its claim to credibility; it being scarcely probable that the knowledge of it should be utterly lost to the rest of the world, and confined to the documents of the Jewish nation alone.

"What we might reasonably expect, has accordingly been actually and fully realized. The evidence which has been brought from almost every quarter of the world, to bear upon the reality of this event, is of the most conclusive and irresistible kind; and every investigation which has been made concerning heathen rites and traditions, has constantly added to its force, no less than to its extent."—Edin. Ency. Deluge.

Without entering at great length into the evidence on this subject, which has been brought from the most distant heathen lands, it may perhaps be sufficient, here, to state generally, that allusion is made, more or less directly, to the flood of Noah, and to Noah himself, under various names, by the ancient Greek, Latin, Egyptian, Oriental, and Chinese authors. Lucian, a Greek author, and an avowed scoffer at all religions, gives a history of the deluge, and of Noah under the name of Deucalion, so minute and circumstantial, that it must certainly have been taken from the ancient tradition of the same event which is described by Moses. The accounts of the flood of Deucalion of the ancient heathens, bear so strong a resemblance to the Mosaic narrative in some parts, that no one can doubt their being founded on traditions of the flood of Noah. Deucalion, the son of Prometheus, reigned over part of Thessaly. The impiety in the world had irritated Jupiter, who resolved to destroy mankind; and immediately the earth exhibited a boundless scene of waters. The highest mountains were climbed by the terrified inhabitants of the earth; but these seeming places of security were soon overtopped by the rising waters, and no hope was left of escape from the universal calamity. Prometheus advised his son to make himself a ship; and by this means he saved himself and his wife Pyrrha.—As to the account of the flood given by Ovid, it appears nearly certain, from the order in which he describes the creation, and from the facts connected with the deluge, as described by him, that he was acquainted with the sacred volume. The Septuagint translation had, at that period, been known for more than two centuries; and being written in a language with which all well-educated Romans were perfectly conversant, it is more than probable that the ideas of the heathen poet were directly derived from this source.—The accounts given by Plutarch, Plato, and Diodorus Siculus, show that the Egyptians believed in a universal deluge, and alludo to Noah under the title of Osiris, but in the obscure and confused manner to be expected in their heathen traditions.

Sir William Jones, in his valuable researches into the works and traditions of the Hindoos, gives us the substance of their accounts of the deluge, which, though also full of the wild superstitions of the east, bear the strongest marks of the same origin. But the most extraordinary traditional evidence of this event, comes from quarters where it could be least expected, and is consequently of the greater value, as it could not have been handed down by any other means than oral tradition, from one generation to another. Some of the inhabitants of Otaheite, on being asked by one of our circumnavigators concerning their origin, replied that their supreme God, having, a long time ago, been angry, dragged the earth through the sea, when their island was broken off, and preserved. In the island of Cuba they relate, that an old man, knowing that the deluge was approaching, built a ship, and went into it, with a great many animals; that he sent out from the ship a crow, which did not immediately come back, staying to feed on the carcasses of dead animals, but afterwards returned with a green branch in his beak. From Peru, Brazil, and Mexico, the traditions of the duluge are very distinctly marked with traces of the original from whence they must all have come; and even among the Iroquois Indians of America, it is believed that a great lake overflowed its banks, and in a short time covered the whole earth, in consequence of the dogs of one of their spirits being lost in it, while hunting.

It has frequently been asked by those who are incredulous on many points of scripture history, how it happened in ancient times, when navigation was little known, that the most distant islands, in the midst of the ocean, and the entire continent of America, so recently discovered by Europeans, became inhabited, if it were true that all men perished except one family, who were landed in Asia. It is difficult to reason change taking place in its form. I have sounded the lake at the present mouth of the Kander, and, as I found no bottom with a line of about a hundred feet, we are certain that this mountain stream has, in little more than one century, produced a secondary bed of mixed materials, of fully three hundred acres, and at least one hundred feet in depth.

One circumstance, however, is worthy of remark, with respect to such secondary formations in fresh water lakes; and that is, that in consequence of the absence of tides and currents, and that constant lateral movement kept up in the bed of the sea, we never discover in them that stratified regularity so remarkable within the action of the tide. The mixture of mineral bodies carried into an inland lake, remains, therefore, exactly as deposited at the first, and this must always be in great confusion. The difference of effect, may, perhaps, be safely taken as a guide, in judging of what some geologists have called salt and fresh water formations; and if this idea be correct, we have an additional evidence against the extraordinary theories of Cuvier, who supposed the well defined strata of the Paris basin to have been occasioned by the alternate occupation of that basin by salt and fresh water. The rounded pebbles and sand, found in lakes, are never formed in the lakes themselves, as they are in the bosom of the sea, but are carried into them by the rivers nearly in the shape in which we find them.

It may, therefore, be safely assumed, that the regular strata of sand, or gravel, or of fine clay, found in mosses, and shallow lakes, if quite distinct from other strata, must have been formed at the period of the deluge, under the influence and by the agency of the action of the sea.

with those who are sceptical on scriptural subjects, because such persons are too often unsettled in their belief of the omnipotence of a Creator. To such, therefore, it were almost useless to observe, that a being who could cause a deluge, and re-arrange a dry land, in the diversified ad hoc as it were, accidental forms we now find it, could, in ways apparently as accidental, spread abroad the human beings which were to people it. But to such persons, perhaps, the remarkable fact of the universal tradition of the deluge, from which only a few persons were saved, is more convincing than the most conclusive abstract reasoning: and the more especially when these traditions are found to exist even amongst those very isolated nations, the descent of which, from Noah, appeared so problematical. If we add to this tradition, the strong coincidence in the languages of all nations, which we shall have occasion to remark upon in a subsequent chapter, the mind of that man must be of a singular character, which can retain a doubt of the truth of the inspired history on the subject of the deluge. There are, however, so many instances which may be produced, from the voyages of navigators, of savages in their canoes being drifted out to sea, and carried by winds or currents to great distances, that no reasonable objection can be raised to the spread of population, even in this accidental manner. Mr. Mariner, and Captain Dillon, in their accounts of the South Sea Islands, furnish us with many instances of such accidents.

"When we thus meet with some traditions of a deluge in almost every country, though the persons saved from it are said, in those various accounts, to have resided in districts widely separated from each other, we are constrained to admit, that so general a concurrence of belief could never have originated merely by accident. While the mind is in this situation, scripture comes forward; and presenting a narrative more simple, better concocted, and bearing an infinitely greater resemblance to authentic history than any of these mythological accounts, which occur in the traditions of Paganism, it immediately flashes a conviction on the mind, that this must be the true history of those remarkable facts, which other nations have handed down to us only through the medium of allegory and fable. By the evidence adduced from so many quarters, the moral certainty of the Mosaic history of the flood appears to be established on a basis sufficiently firm to bid defiance to the cavils of scepticism. Let the ingenuity of unbelief first account satisfactorily for this universal agreement of the Pagan world, and she may then, with a greater degree of plausibility, impeach the truth of the Scripture narrative of the deluge."—Edin. Encyclop. Deluge.

The moral certainty we thus attain of the Mosaic deluge itself, may be, with equal force, extended to the preservation of Noah, and those with him in the ark, as the only living beings preserved from this, otherwise universal, destruction; and thus, from every hand, may be drawn additional evidences to confirm our confidence in the unerring truth of the inspired writings.

The Mosaic narrative of the deluge is as full and circumstantial as we could almost desire; but, like many other most interesting points in Scripture, its very simplicity occasions our not giving it that attention which it so well merits; and there is, perhaps, no subject on which the general ideas of mankind are so erroneous.

The most common notion entertained of this catastrophe, is, that by some means, incomprehensible to us, the sea rose upon the dry land to the height of the highest mountains; and after destroying every living thing, excepting those whom it pleased God to spare, the waters gradually retired to their hidden retreats, leaving the same dry land that had before been inhabited, though variously changed, in its actual surface, by the wreck and ruin with which it remained charged.

It would be difficult to say from what source this erroneous idea of the deluge has first arisen; the mode by which this fatal event was brought about by the councils of the Almighty, has not indeed been given us by the inspired historian; but the clearness of the recital, together with the effects, which we now every where find to corroborate it, can leave no doubt in an unprejudiced mind, that the above mentioned common opinion is altogether false, and has given rise to many of the equally false doctrines and theories of the chaotic geology.

In the Mosaic record we are told, "And God said unto Noah, the end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them (mankind), and behold, I will destroy them, TOGETHER WITH THE EARTH."*

* Genesis, vi. 13.

Here we have it distinctly announced by the voice of the Almighty, that he was not only to destroy mankind from off the earth, which would have implied the earth remaining as at first, to become the habitation of a postdiluvian race: but they were to be destroyed TOGETHER WITH THE EARTH on which they dwelt. It is also afterwards declared by the Almighty, in establishing a covenant with mankind. "And I will establish my covenant with you, neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood; NEITHER shall there any more be a flood to DESTROY THE EARTH."* The latter part of this sentence would have been altogether unnecessary, were we not given to understand by it, that the earth, or dry land, of the antediluvian world, had then been destroyed, as well as its wicked inhabitants.

A very close critical inquiry has been instituted by Mr. Granville Penn, into the various translations of the original text on this part of Scripture; and he proves, beyond dispute, that the original, in these passages, has never had any other interpretation, or translation, than that adopted in our English version; implying the destruction of the earth, as well as "of all flesh that moved upon it." This estimable writer has not confined his Scriptural inquiries to the Mosaic history alone; but has most ably drawn from other inspired sources, what were the received opinions respecting the deluge, throughout the whole period of Jewish history, down to the times of the apostles. He brings forward that very remarkable passage, from the 2d Epistle of St. Peter, 3d chapter, 6 and 7 verses, "whereby the world, that THEN WAS, being overflowed with water, PERISHED; but the heaven, and the EARTH, WHICH ARE NOW, by the same word (of God,) are kept in store, reserved for fire, against the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men."† Mr. Penn also quotes a passage from the Book of Job, in which the friend of Job, reasoning with him, says, "Hast though remarked the old way which wicked men have trodden; who were cut down out of time; whose foundation was overflowed with a flood;" which passage the Greek interpreters render yet more decidedly, "their foundations are become an overflowing flood," and Michaelis interprets it, A flood OBLITERATED their foundations."

In the very curious and interesting work, called the book of Enoch, referred to by St. Jude, v. 14, which had long been looked upon as lost, but which was at length discovered in the Ethiopic language by Bruce, in Abyssinia, who brought home three manuscript copies of it, one of which was presented to the Royal Library at Paris, a second, to the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and the third, retained by himself; we find a very remarkable corroborative testimony to the above view of the subject of the deluge. In quoting, from this apocryphal book, it is not necessary, in this place, to enter into the question of its actually being, what its title professes it to be, a prophetic work of the antediluvian Enoch. This point has been clearly settled by Dr. Laurence, to whom we are indebted for an English translation of the copy in the Bodleian Library. But, although, in the opinion of the learned translator, this original Hebrew, or Chaldee work, was composed subsequent to the Babylonish captivity, it must be admitted to be a very interesting and curious piece of antiquity, though not worthy of a place among the canonical books of Scripture.

The passage I am about to quote, however, will serve to show the prevailing opinion on the subject of the deluge in

* Genesis, ix. 11.

† This passage, from the inspired apostle, might, perhaps, be extended with much effect; for he seems, in this part of his general epistle to the new Christian church, prophetically to describe some of the opinions now held by modern philosophy.

"This second Epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which (Epistles) I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance:

"That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us, the apostles of the Lord and Saviour: knowing this first, that there shall come, in the last days, scoffers, walking after their own lusts:

"And saying, where is the promise of his coming? For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation. For this they willingly are ignorant of, that, by the word of God, the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the waters, and in the waters:

"Whereby" (viz. by the word of God,) "the world that then was, being overflowed with waters, perished.

"But the heavens, and the earth, which now are, by the same word (of God) are kept in store, reserved unto fire, against the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men.

"But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is, with the Lord, as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."—Second Epistle of Peter, iii. 1, &c.

This short passage contains lessons in philosophy, as well as in morality, which we should do well most seriously to consider.

the times of the author of it, and is quite consistent with the passage in St. Peter's Epistle, and with the above passage in the book of Job.

In the 82d chapter of the book of Enoch, and the 5th verse, we find the writer prophetically describing the destruction of the "earth, that then was," in the following manner:

"And falling to the earth, I saw likewise the earth ABSORBED BY A GREAT ABYSS, and mountains suspended over mountains, hills were sinking upon hills, lofty trees were gliding off from their trunks, and were in the act of being projected, and of SINKING INTO THE ABYSS.

"Being alarmed at these things, my voice faltered. I cried and said, THE EARTH IS DESTROYED! Then, my grandfather, Malalel, raised me up, and said to me, Why dost thou thus cry out, my son? And wherefore dost thou thus lament?

"I related to him the whole vision which I had seen. He said to me, confirmed is that which thou has seen, my son:

"And potent the vision of thy dream respecting every secret sin of the earth. ITS SUBSTANCE SHALL SINK INTO THE ABYSS, and a great destruction take place.

"Now, my son, rise up; and beseech the Lord of Glory, (for thou are faithful,) that a remnant may be left upon the earth, and that he would not wholly destroy it. My son, all this calamity upon earth comes down from heaven, upon earth shall there be a great destruction."

In another part of the book, purporting to be Noah's vision of the deluge, we find the following, to the same effect: "On account of their impiety have their innumerable judgments been consummated before me. Respecting the moons have they inquired, and they have known that the EARTH WILL PERISH, with those who dwell upon it, and that to these there will be no place of refuge for ever."—Chap. lxiv. v. 9.

These passages, from such authorities, decidedly show, that the destruction of "the earth that THEN WAS," formed a part of the effects of that awful judgment; and the phenomena presented to our view over the whole "earth that NOW IS," establish the truth of the historical record in a manner the most conclusive. We have thus given us most important data on which to form a judgment of the mode by which this great event was brought about; but, as the mere laws of nature will be found utterly incompetent to it; and as the deluge was evidently an operation as completely preternatural, as either the creation itself, or the gathering together of the waters of the ocean, we must come to the same conclusion with regard to it which we have already done with regard to these events, viz. that it was in the power of God alone to bring it about.

Many disputes have arisen, and theories been formed, among philosophers, respecting the mode by which a deluge might have been brought about by natural causes; but, like the theories of first formations, they lead the mind, at every step, into obscurity and contradiction. Some have supposed the earth to be hollow, and to contain water, which, issuing out by some incomprehensible means, deluged the earth, and again retired to its hidden abode. Others have supposed that by a great earthquake, a heaving up of the superincumbent mass of one portion of the earth might have raised the waters of the ocean, so as to form one vast wave on the surface, which swept over the remaining parts of the earth. In supporting this theory it is truly stated, that during partial earthquakes, an agitation of the sea, somewhat similar, takes place, the effects of which have often been most destructive in low countries. But this theory implies one sweeping convulsion which could have lasted but a short time, and been but partial in its effects; whereas, both history, supported by the traditions of the most obscure nations, and physical facts, tend to convince us that the deluge must have lasted some considerable time, and been universal in its destructive effects.

As to the theory of the cavous nature of the globe, in order to contain water for the purpose of one particular deluge of a few months duration, we have, amongst other powerful objections, this especial one; that such an arrangement would be in contradiction to all the general laws of the Creator, in the study of which we perceive an economy of means, if I may use the expression, which is most remarkable. The means employed for any end are never greater than are absolutely necessary to attain that end; and thence the just balance which we so much admire throughout the creation. When the mandate was issued, on the third day of the creation, "Let the waters be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear," which "gathering together of the waters God called sea," we have not a vestige of ground for supposing that there was any superabundance in the primitive creation of water; nor that any portion of it was, as it were, locked up from common use, and reserved for one especial occasion. Besides this objection of the reason, we have also one fact: for when we come to measure the depths of the sea, and the quantity of water existing on our whole planet, by the great and only true scale before mentioned;* and when we find its medium depths, all over the earth, not to exceed, comparatively, a thin coat of varnish on a common artificial globe; we shall at once perceive how utterly unnecessary it would be to demand so great a quantity of water as a hollow earth would contain, for the sole purpose of effecting so diminutive an end.† No. The ends of the Almighty are brought about by much more simple means; and when we are informed by the inspired record, that not only the inhabitants of the first "dry land," but also that "dry land" itself was to be destroyed, we can, without any strain upon our reason, and in perfect accordance with surrounding physical facts, imagine the same great Being by whose power the waters were at first gathered together, issuing his second mandate for the execution of this terrible decree, and saying, "Let the level of the dry land be lowered, and let the foundations of the great deep be broken up: and it was so."

But if we insist on discovering or inventing a mode by which the Almighty caused this destructive interchange of sea and land to take place, we shall find ourselves in the same inextricable difficulties as when endeavouring to account for the mode of first formations by secondary causes. We must make our reason bend to the inscrutable ways of the Omnipotent, and submit, with whatever rebellious reluctance, to the great truth every where impressed upon us, that "the ways of God are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts." All our reasoning must end in this point, that the deluge, like the creation, was a preternatural event, which could by no means be brought about but by preternatural means; and consequently, that we should in vain search for a cause in the mere laws of nature.

CHAPTER VII.

Mosaic Account of the Deluge.—The Mountains of Ararat.—Origin of that remarkable Name.—Effects during the Deluge.—Action of the Tides and the Currents during the Deluge.—Their Effects upon Organic Bodies.—Diluvial Strata.—Abatement of the Waters.—Renewal of the Face of the Earth.

Having thus, by a variety of evidence, convinced ourselves that a universal deluge took place upon our earth, from which but one family of human beings was saved by the mercy of the Almighty;‡ and that, in this deluge, not only the antediluvian race, but the antediluvian earth or dry land on which they dwelt, was destroyed, we can be at no great distance from the truth, if we suppose, though it is no where stated in direct terms, that the deluge was effected by the interchange of level between the former sea and land; or, in other words, that either the bed of the former sea was gradually elevated, or "broken up;" or that the first land was gradually depressed beneath the level of the waters; or, perhaps, by a combination of both; in either of which cases, the effects would be exactly such as are described in the Mosaic record.

Let us now consider this record itself.

"And God looked upon the earth, and behold it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth. And God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them (men); and behold I will destroy them, WITH the earth." "Behold I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven;

* Chapter i, page 57, note.

† Would not a hollow glass globe, of one foot in diameter, contain infinitely more water than would be necessary slightly to moisten its exterior surface?

‡ The preservation of one family, at the deluge, may be looked upon as one of the most remarkable instances of divine wisdom and providence: for there could have been no greater difficulty to the Almighty power, in forming, in this instance, an entirely new creation, than in doing so in the beginning of the world. But if all mankind had perished, a new race could not have been so deeply impressed with the terror of this great event, as we now find the most distant nations are: and if we had only historical evidence of its having happened, unsupported by tradition and facts, the recital would be found to make but a slight impression upon our minds.

and every thing that is in the earth shall die." "And, in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened." "And it came to pass, after seven days, that the waters of the flood were upon the earth." "And the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened." "And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights." "And the waters prevailed, and were increased greatly upon the earth, and the ark went upon the face of the waters." "And all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered." "Fifteen cubits upwards (above the highest hills) did the waters prevail, and the mountains were covered." "And the waters prevailed upon the earth an hundred and fifty days." At length, "God made a wind to pass over the earth; and the waters assuaged. The fountains also of the deep, and the windows of heaven were stopped, and the rain from heaven was restrained. And the waters returned from off the earth continually; and after the end of the hundred and fifty days the waters were abated. And the ark rested in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat. And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month: in the tenth month, on the first day of the month, were the tops of the mountains seen. And it came to pass at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark, which he had made. And he sent forth a raven, which went forth, to and fro, until the waters were dried up from off the earth. Also he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground. But the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him into the ark; for the waters were on the face of the whole earth: then he put forth his hand, and took her, and pulled her in unto him, into the ark. And he stayed yet other seven days, and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark; and the dove came in to him in the evening; and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off: so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth; and he staid yet other seven days, and sent forth the dove, which returned not again unto him any more." "And Noah removed the covering of the ark, and looked, and behold the face of the ground was dry. And in the second month, on the seven and twentieth day of the month, was the earth dried."*

Thus the whole duration of this dreadful event was one year and ten days; or from the seventeenth day of the second month of one year, until the twenty-seventh day of the second month of the next year.

Now, in the whole of this narrative, we find no one circumstance to lead us to a supposition, that the same earth, or dry land, existed after the flood, as had been inhabited previous to that event; or to contradict the united evidence of the declaration of the intention of God to destroy the earth, and of the physical facts with which we are now surrounded, on every part of the present dry land. An erroneous idea is, however, very general with respect to "the mountains of Ararat," which are commonly considered as having been mountains on the old earth, and known to Noah. There can be no one reason given from the narrative for this opinion, and there are many of the most decided character to lead us to an opposite conclusion.† The inspired historian is describing to the Jewish nation, many years after the event, and when the continent of Asia had become perfectly well known, and thickly peopled, the circumstances of the destruction of the former world by means of the flood; and he relates, that on the subsiding of the waters, the ark, with its inhabitants, grounded on one of the points of a ridge of mountains, which was, from henceforth, to be remarkable amongst the inhabitants of the east, and to which those saved from the deluge gave the expressive name of Ararat, or the CURSE OF TREMBLING (which is the meaning of the Hebrew word), that the memory of the dreadful event from which they had just escaped might be handed down as long as the mountain was in being, on which they had been saved. We may also come to the same conclusion when we consider the improbability of the ark floating quietly for nearly a year on the surface of an ocean as much effected by winds and tides as our present seas, being stranded in the immediate neighbourhood of the place whence it is generally, but erroneously, supposed to have been first borne up by the waters: and, also, the equally improbable circumstance of any mountain of the old world bearing such a title as the curse of trembling, previous to any event likely to call forth so remarkable a name. We must not forget, besides, that even those who support the idea of our now inhabiting the antediluvian earth, admit that the effects of the deluge were such as would probably prevent the recognition by those in the ark, of any part of the former countries they had known, as the surface must have been every where loaded with diluvial soils of very great depth.

All these reasons, taken collectively, and supporting the positive sentence of destruction passed upon "the earth that then was," leave no room to doubt as to the mode by which this sentence was put in execution. We may, therefore, conclude, that when the time was come, when this great revolution was to happen, the dry land began gradually and insensibly to sink, or the surface of the bed of the former ocean as gradually to rise; the whole accompanied with such a convulsion of the elements, such torrents of rain, and, probably, such peals of thunder, as would be calculated not only to make a lasting impression upon the minds of those who escaped; but to render the punishment of those who suffered from this Curse of Trembling the most awful and heart-rending that the mind of man can conceive!* The living creatures upon the earth, of every kind, must then have been gradually swept from the elevations on which they would naturally seek safety: and at the end of forty days the whole globe became again overspread with the same thin coat of water, from the effects of which it was "invisible" on the first and second days of the creation.

* "According to the account given by Moses, the ark was 300 cubits long, 50 broad and 30 high; but the length of this cubit has given rise to much argument and conjecture. Some have supposed it to be nine feet, and others three; but the opinions most worthy of notice are, 1st, That of Bishop Cumberland, who considered the Hebrew cubit as about 22 inches, which would make the ark 550 feet long, 91 broad and 55 high. 2d, That of the learned Parkhurst, who computes the cubit at something less that 18 inches, which makes the ark 450 feet long, 75 broad and 45 high. Even upon the smallest estimate of this cubic measure, the competency of the ark, for the purpose assigned to it, has been satisfactorily proved by different writers; but, especially, by the ingenious Bishop Wilkins, who has established the point with a clearness and exactness almost amounting to demonstration, and rather found too much than too little room. Thus does this seeming difficulty, like many others connected with scripture history, the more closely it is investigated, furnish an evidence, instead of an objection, to the truth of revealed religion."—Edin. Encyclop. Ark.

† Jerom places Mount Ararat towards the middle of Armenia, near the river Araxes, or Aras, about 280 miles north-east of Al Judi, and 12 leagues south-east of Erivan. It is detached from the other mountains in its neighbourhood, and stands in the midst of a very extensive plain. It is in the form of a sugar-loaf, and has two distinct summits, the largest of which is perpetually covered with snow, and may be seen at a great distance. It is not a little singular, that the description of Mount Parnassus, by Ovid, should bear so close a resemblance to this account of Ararat:

> "Mons ibi verticibus petit arduus astra duobus > Nomine Parnassus, superatque cacumine nubes."

The surface of the lower part is composed of loose sand, or large masses of free stone. Nothing is to be seen growing upon it but some juniper and goat's thorn. The whole mountain is described by travellers as having a gloomy and disagreeable aspect.—Tournefort, Tavernier, &c.

* We may apply to this subject the sublime expressions of the Inspired Psalmist, when alluding to the miraculous preservation of the children of Israel, pursued by the Egyptians; and it is even probable, that he had also in view the very event we are now contemplating.

"The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee; they were afraid: the depths also were troubled. The clouds poured out water: the skies sent out a sound: thine arrows also went abroad. The voice of thy thunder was in heaven: the lightenings lightened the world; the earth trembled and shook. Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known." —Psalm lxxvii.

In the 104th Psalm, we find what may be considered a more direct allusion to the creation, and to the period of the Deluge, in the following sublime passage.

"Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed for ever.

"Thou coveredst it with the deep, as with a garment: the waters stood above the mountains.

"At Thy rebuke they fled; at the voice of Thy thunders they hasted away.

"They go up by the mountains; they go down by the valleys unto the place which Thou hast founded for them.

"Thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over; that they turn not AGAIN to cover the earth." aqueous covering remained nearly stationary; and it is from this long continuance of the waters upon the earth, that we can account, in a satisfactory manner, for many of the stratified appearances in the upper beds, which we had before remarked in the lower secondary formations. We feel quite assured, that though, by this great revolution, the face of all things upon the earth's surface was to become changed, yet the planet still retained its regular position and place in the solar system, and must, consequently, have continued to be affected, as it was at other times, by the influences of the sun and of the moon. The action of the tides and of the currents, which we have before considered, must now have had a most powerful influence both during the rise, the continuance, and the abatement of the waters. The surface of the all-prevailing ocean must now have been covered with the wreck and ruin of the animal and vegetable world, floated off in various directions, according to the currents, and the eddies, which must have every where prevailed. The soils of the old earth, loosened by the moisture, must now have become suspended in the turbid waters, and been deposited in the bed of the ocean as at other times, only in unusual quantity.* Dead bodies of every description, swelled up by corruption, must now have followed the courses of the currents, and floated or sunk, according to the state they happened to be in. Those of the larger animals more especially, would long continue floating on the waves, like strong bladders filled with mephetic vapours, and be hurried far from their natural climates, to excite the wonder and speculation of succeeding generations.

At length the waters are permitted to subside; the full purpose of the Almighty has been accomplished. The earth and its inhabitants have been destroyed; and the waters are again to be "gathered unto one place," to "let the dry land" once more "appear." What a scene now presents itself to the mind's eye! for no human eye could look upon it; even Noah himself could form no distinct idea of the state of the new earth, but by sending-out one of his feathered family, who he knew would return to him, if "she found no rest for the sole of her foot." Week after week passed with those occasional experiments, long after the ark had been finally lodged upon the heights of Ararat. It is now left to our imagination to conceive effects which, though not described, must have naturally followed such powerful causes. As the waters gradually subsided into their new bed, the dry land, which was now to come for the first time into the light of day, must have presented a most singular appearance. We must keep in mind, that as the bed of the first ocean had become charged with the stratified debris of upwards of sixteen centuries, deposited upon it by the laws of gravitation and of the currents, the surface of this bed, when raised above the new level of the waters, must have been soft, and still saturated with the moisture of the slowly retiring seas. As the waters became more and more shallow, they would act with the more violent effect upon the soft and muddy plains over which the tides, the currents, and the winds, must now have swept with irresistible force. As point after point upon the new and soft earth became liberated from their sway, the various floating bodies, whether animal or vegetable, would be scattered on the surface, or deeply embedded in the yielding mud or sand by the violence of the waves. Other mixed masses of organic remains, brought into one place in an indiscriminate heap, by the eddies of the waters, would now be covered up by these new secondary formations, of mud, or gravel, which formations would be of very considerable depth, from the enormous quantities of materials thus furnished in a preternatural way. It is also highly probable that many submarine volcanic districts would now become exposed, and also that even volcanic action was not wanting to complete the terrors of this curse of trembling. In whatever manner the Almighty thought fit to bring about this elevation of the bed of the antediluvian sea, it is to be supposed that the "breaking up" of the fountains, or foundations, of the great deep must have occasioned that elevation and derangement in the horizontal stratifications of some of the secondary formations which we have hitherto speculated upon in darkness, and in error: and that we should consequently find them, when fully exposed to our view, in a highly inclined, and sometimes even in a vertical position.*

Let us imagine to ourselves the whole vegetable kingdom of the earth deposited at various depths,† and more or less covered up by the sandy or other sediments of the deluge. We look in vain to the most terrific catastrophes of our own times, to give us a faint idea of the scene which the earth must now have presented. Those who have witnessed the raging of a hurricane on the ocean, many leagues distant from any land, can perhaps best form a conception of this watery waste, unsheltered by any shore.

The tossing of a tall ship, at the mercy of a raging sea, may best represent the manner in which the floating masses must have been precipitated on the yielding shoals. For "they that go down to the sea in ships, and do business in the great waters; these see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep."

At length it was permitted to the elements, by the Great Ruler of the storm, to resume their wonted order and regularity.

"Surgit humus, crescunt loca decrescentibus undis."

The new bed of the ocean, when sunk to the necessary depth, was there arrested; and means were thus afforded to the new dry land, of becoming gradually drained of its superabundant moisture. The order of the world was to be reinstated, and the command was given to Noah to quit the ark, and to lead out with him his family, and every living creature that had been with him in the ark, that they might "breed abundantly in the earth, and be fruitful and multiply upon the earth." "And God said, I will not again smite every living thing, as I have done; but while the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease."

It seems scarcely necessary here to raise a question as to how the new world became again replenished with verdure, and adorned with a renewal of all those riches which the deluge must have so completely destroyed; because all who are deeply impressed with the effects produced by the fiat of the Almighty, at the first creation, must be satisfied that, though no direct mention is made of a new creation of vegetable substances after the deluge, it must have been both as necessary, and as easy an operation, as in the beginning. The vegetable world must have been completely obliterated at the deluge, even supposing that the old earth had merely suffered from a passing event: but when we find that the new earth which we now inhabit, appeared then, for the first time, in the light of the sun, and that it must have been composed of moist soils, on which no vegetable production had ever grown, we shall be forced to the conclusion which is most consistent with reason, in the absence of historical evidence; and that is, that the creative power must have been again exercised upon this occasion. Nor shall we, indeed, find it necessary to stop at a new vegetable world; for there are many reasons for extending this conclusion also to the animal world, though, probably, on a less extended scale, as we have the positive evidence both of tradition and of history, as to a great variety of animals having been saved in the ark, together with Noah and his family. It appears more than probable, however, that we ought to consider the strong expression used in the record, "of every living thing of all flesh," in the same sense as we find it in various other parts of Scripture; and, indeed, as such expressions are often used in our own, and in other languages,

* In a former note, referring to the lately published work of Mr. Lyell, (see page 65), we had occasion to observe the wonderful effects of rivers, in transporting materials for the formation of secondary strata in the bed of the sea. The account given in that note, of the mud of the Ganges, in its daily course, will serve to give us some faint idea of the turbid state of the whole ocean, at this eventful period: and the sediments deposited by this catastrophe, added to the secondary formations in the antediluvian sea, formed in the space of 1650 years, will produce a much more consistent result than can possibly be extracted from the theories of geology, which give an unlimited time to the age of the world.

* All such derangements of the stratifications of the surface of the earth, must not, however, be attributed to this cause, for there can be no doubt, that in the upper strata occasioned by the deluge, and left by the waters in a very moist state, the derangements of their level must be accounted for in the very natural way of subsidence in the course of dessication.

† We are enabled to form some idea of the floating or sinking masses of matted vegetable productions, from the accounts given us of the floating islands of timber, in some of the American lakes: these are often several miles in length, and of very considerable breadth and depth, rising or falling with the water, and covered with vegetation. In the deluge, when the soils of the forests became saturated with moisture, the whole vegetable mass would naturally rise to the surface, bound together by the roots and branches, and be floated off by whatever current happened to prevail in their immediate neighbourhood.

that is, not as literally meaning every created being over the whole globe, but merely a great number.

Michaelis* remarks, "the Jews have well observed that the expression all, every, is not to be understood, on all occasions, with the mathematical sense of all; because it is also used to signify many. Thus, in Isaiah xxiv. 10, were we read 'every house is shut up,' Kimchi most truly observes, though he says every house, he only means many; as it is said, all countries came into Egypt. And if we reflect upon our own native tongues, we shall find that we often use the term all for many, or most. We have also a remarkable example of this strong mode of speech in 1 Kings, xviii. 10, where Obadiah affirms thus forcibly and solemnly to Elijah: 'As the Lord thy God liveth, there is no nation or kingdom, whither my lord hath not sent to seek thee:' which affirmation, though universal in its terms, was evidently not designed to be universal in its signification; and innumerable instances of the same mode of speech occur in the Sacred Writings."†

We have some reason to doubt, from the fossil remains of animals now discovered, which have not yet been found alive upon the present earth, whether every living creature was included in this strong expression: and though, from the remarkable circumstance of the similarity of all languages in certain common expressions, and in the universal tradition of the deluge found amongst the most distant and savage nations, we feel assured that the whole existing race of man on the whole earth, has sprung from Noah and his family; we have no evidence to lead us to the same conclusion with respect to quadrupeds, or birds found in such isolated countries as New Holland, where the species so entirely differ from every kind known on other parts of the earth. With respect, also, to the lower classes of animated beings, including reptiles, insects, and animalcula, to which latter there seems no bound in the creation, we feel inclined to believe that a new creative power was exercised after the deluge; and we may, in this instance, say with the inspired Psalmist, "He took away their breath, and they died, and returned to their dust: He sent forth His Spirit, and they were created, and He renewed the face of the earth."

It may, perhaps, here be asked, What reason can be assigned for the slow and gradual course of this awful judgment; since, if the first formation of the bed of the sea were an instantaneous operation, the destruction of the earth by a deluge could, and probably would, be equally rapid. But various good and sufficient reasons may be given, for a gradual, rather than an instantaneous, operation, in the case of the deluge. And, first, we must consider, that, by this method, the great moral impression which was intended to be made upon the family of Noah, and upon all succeeding generations, would be much more effectual, by the long continuance of their terror, than if they had been stunned, and, as it were, thunderstruck, by a dreadful, but rapid calamity. Again, we must remember, that as the All-Wise Ruler of the Universe had ulterior views for the welfare of his human creatures, a gradual operation acting upon what was to be the new earth, would render it better fitted for a habitation for mankind, than if the bed of the sea, with its soft sediments, had, by one violent convulsive throe, been elevated above the surface, and thus left dry, in the most deranged and ruinous condition. Besides, any such sudden convulsion must have caused so violent an agitation, that the natural means of preservation prescribed to Noah, by the Almighty himself, must have been overpowered by the preternatural vortex into which the vessel would have been plunged.

Thus, although we can in no way account for the deluge, but by supernatural agency, yet the command given to Noah to make use of so common a means of safety as a floating vessel, shows us that it was the intention of God to allow natural means, or the laws of nature, to take their course, after the first impulse had been given by his preternatural decree.‡

* Michaelis was a celebrated German theologian and biblical critic, who died in 1791. The extensive knowledge which he had acquired in biblical philology, as well as in every department of learning connected with the study of the Scriptures, enabled him to form very accurate notions on the original institutions and language of the Hebrews. He was professor of Hebrew, Arabic, and Syriac, in the University of Gottingen.

‡ The experience of every year ought to teach us caution in coming to any determined conclusion with respect to extinct races of animals. A great portion of the earth still remains unexplored, and every year makes us acquainted with some new thing in the animal world, with the existence of which we were before unacquainted.

* We shall have a future opportunity of remarking the difference of temperature between the Southern and Northern Polar regions, which difference may, probably, be accounted for by the great preponderance of land in the one, and of water in the other hemisphere.

CHAPTER VIII.

General View of the existing Surface.—Power of the Waters.—Principles of Stratification.—Curves Lamination.—Gibraltar.—The Plains of the Earth.—Of South America.—Of Africa.—Of Asia.—Of Europe.—Inequality of Mass.—Chalk Basins.—That of Paris, a Guide to all similar Basins.—Salt Deposits.—Coal Formations.—Evidences of Coal being a Marine, and not a Lacustrine Formation.

Thus have we followed, in as concise a manner as the subject will admit of, the traditions as well as the history of this awful event, both supported by the corroborative evidence of numerous physical facts in all parts of the world: and we cannot doubt its having been the intention of the Almighty, that the memory of so signal a judgment should be for ever deeply imprinted on the human mind, even in the most distant and isolated corners of the earth. But we should not be doing justice to so interesting a subject, if we left it, without taking a general view of the present surface of the habitable globe, and further tracing, as we shall every where be able to do, the lasting monuments of it, so universally presented to our consideration.

When we consider, then, the state of the earth, as it now is, we find it divided into sea and land; but so unequally, that the ocean occupies about three-fifths of the whole surface; and if a meridian line be taken to divide the earth equally, we shall find the proportions of land and water, on the opposite sides, strikingly different: there being a great preponderance of water on the southern, and of land in the northern hemisphere.*

On viewing, on the great scale, the general condition of this land, we find by far the greater portion of it but little elevated above the level of the ocean: so little, indeed, that it may be safely said that nine-tenths of the whole would be again submerged, either by a rise in the level of the waters of a very few hundred feet, or by a depression of the land to a similar trifling extent. There is, perhaps, no portion of the whole extent of the plains of the earth, where the primitive surface of the globe can be seen. Nor can it even be reached by mining, without a deep section of various secondary formations. Even the most elevated plains, and many mountains of very considerable height, are either entirely formed of, or heavily loaded with, strata of secondary rocks. It is, generally, only on the tops of the most elevated mountain ridges, where the primitive formations of the earth are found in mass. But the lower portions of even the highest mountains, bear unequivocal marks of their having once formed the bed of the sea: and fossil sea shells have been found upon the Andes, at an elevation of 14,000 feet above the present level of the ocean. Whole ridges, however, of very considerable height, are found to be entirely formed of these secondary formations; and so full of fossil shells, that no doubt can be entertained of their present site having once formed the bottom of the sea.

The ridge of the Jura mountains, to the south-west of the Alpine range of Switzerland, is one of the most remarkable and best known of these secondary formations. This ridge rises from 3 to 4000 feet above the level of the Swiss plain; and its length is nearly one hundred leagues, being from eighteen to twenty in breadth.

It is almost entirely composed of compact limestone, in strata which alternate with beds of clay and shelly marl; and the stratification is so much inclined, that it presents a most interesting example and proof of a raising or depressing power having been in force, subsequent to the nearly horizontal stratification which must at all times take place from a deposition in water. There is, also, to be found on this secondary ridge a remarkable proof of a great mechanical power having been exerted, such as the deluge was perhaps alone capable of. Innumerable masses of primitive rock are found scattered on the surface, even at a height of 2500 feet. These masses, so far detached from their parent rock on the Alpine summits, (and similar masses of granite are found on almost all the alluvial plains of Switzerland), have given rise to much difficulty, and various theories among geologists, all which are rendered nugatory, by referring their present locality to the powers of the deluge, the extent of which no one can reasonably doubt, who has considered the instances of mechanical force constantly exhibited by the ocean when in a state of agitation.

Some recent and remarkable instances of the great mechanical force of the waves may be interesting, on a subject which has occasioned so much theoretical discussion amongst philosophers. In the Isle of Eshaness, in Shetland, which is exposed to the full fury of the western ocean, huge blocks of stone are removed far from their native beds, and hurried up an acclivity to an almost incredible distance. In 1802, a mass eight feet by seven, and five feet thick, was dislodged from its bed, and removed to a distance of about 90 feet. The bed from which another block had been removed, in 1818, was seventeen and a half feet by seven, and two and a half feet thick. This mass had been borne to some distance, and then shivered into many lesser, though still large, fragments, which were carried more than 120 feet further. A block nine feet by six and a half, and four feet thick, was carried up a slope a distance of 150 feet. A mass of rock, the average dimensions of which may be rated at twelve or thirteen feet square, and five feet thick, was first moved from its bed, to a distance of upwards of thirty feet, and has since been twice turned over. But the most extraordinary scene is in a breach of porphyry called the grind of the Navir, where the waves have forced a passage, separating huge stones from the rock, and forcing them to a distance of nearly 200 feet. These fragments are accumulated in immense heaps, like the produce of a quarry.

In Lunna, several large detached rocks, called the stones of Stephouse, are found at some distance from the sea, having evidently been transported by the waters, and are the transported stones of geologists. The largest is about 23 feet high, and 96 in circumference.

Amongst the remarkable features of the mountain ridges of the earth, are the naked primitive summits of the highest peaks, which from their freedom from secondary formations, and other marks of the sea, we may, with much probability, suppose to have been in the form of islands in the antediluvian ocean: and as all islands are but the summits of submarine elevations, it is natural to expect to find the lower parts of these mountains, which must have long been covered with the sea, bearing the same marks of secondary and sedimentary formations, mixed with sea shells, that are found in the lower levels of the earth.

As we descend from the higher grounds towards the plains, we are every where struck with the hills of various heights and forms, entirely composed of these secondary rocks, and often formed of nothing but rounded gravel, or dry sand, precisely in the state we now find these substances on our present sea-shores, and under the continued action of the waters.*

One cannot but be sensibly struck with the close similarity, of these elevations, both in substance and in form, to those minor elevations, and valleys, formed by the present sea, in many parts of its shores. One can even trace, on a minute scale, in those recent beds of sand and gravel, the principles of stratification and arrangement which we remark in many of the great secondary formations, and in the great beds of upper alluvial rocks and soils: and as we have already had occasion to remark, those principles are founded on the laws of gravitation, and of fluids, by the combined action of which, the raw materials of secondary formations, when once indiscriminately brought into the ocean by the rivers, in the manner before described, are sifted and arranged; and the various classes separately deposited, according to the action of the currents, and the eddies of the waters.† It is by the action of those laws alone, that we can account for the great beds of sand upon one part of a coast, all equal in grain, and perfectly free from earthy particles: on another part of the same coast, and, perhaps, at no great distance, we find a similar extent of rolled gravel, almost entirely free from sand: on a third, a bed of the purest clay, perfectly free from both; and, perhaps, on a fourth, an immense accumulation of sea shells.

If, then, we allow for the action of those laws in the depth of the ocean, only on a scale infinitely more enlarged, and proportioned to the extent, both of the material and the agent, we shall find a much more easy and rational means of accounting for the geological phenomena on the surface of the globe, than all the wild theories yet formed by philosophy have been able to produce; and having this high additional value, that instead of opposing both history and reason, we follow the well defined track of both.

The most common source of error in forming our ideas on the formation of secondary rocks and soils, is our measuring the works performed by the unceasing action of the laws of nature, by the small and contracted scale of our own actions. Thus we almost instantly conclude, on observing a calcareous formation some hundreds of feet in depth, that it must have required some prodigiously long period of time to accumulate such a mass; whereas, when we consider the action of one great river, such as the Amazon, or the St. Lawrence, (remarkable, as all the American rivers are, for its muddiness, and tinging the ocean for 60 or 70 leagues from its mouth,) for a hundred years, and bearing, night and day, its prodigious load of mud into the sea, from whence it never returns; we must perceive that our ideas on such subjects are, in general, much too confined, and stand greatly in need of revision and correction. It is not yet ascertained to what depth it may be necessary to probe, before we come to the primitive surface; but it is highly probable, if not certain, that if we allow a mean thickness of one mile, for the whole secondary formations of our present dry lands, we shall be considerably over-rating their actual extent. We know that the most lofty peaks are not more than five miles in height, and we have good reason to presume, that the greatest depths of the ocean are not widely different in extent. Now, in the four thousand years that have taken place since the deluge, during which a fresh series of secondary formations has been going on in the post-diluvian ocean, we must conclude that a much greater change has taken place than could have occurred in the sixteen centuries previous to that event; and yet we cannot discover changes to have taken place either on the lands, or in any part of the ocean, to lead us to the conclusion that formations to such an extent have occurred, even during this longer period. How then can we subscribe to those theories of philosophy, which attribute immense periods to the formation of each stratum, and which would imply, from a view of a few hundred feet of diluvial stratification, in such a chalk basin as that of Paris, a succession of revolutions, and of salt and fresh water deluges, occurring during an unnameable lapse of time?

Amongst the remarkable secondary formations of our European continents, there are few more worthy of our attention than the celebrated rock of Gibraltar, in which we find presented to our consideration a close connexion between diluvial animal remains, and the extensive fissures and cavities with which that rock has become intersected.

This mountain is completely isolated; having the sea on three sides, and, on the fourth, a low sandy plain or isthmus, of several miles in length, and about 900 yards in width near the rock, though its breadth increases towards the Spanish continent; whilst its greatest elevation, above the level of the sea, is not more than about ten feet.

The rock of Gibraltar is of an oblong form, and lies in the direction of north and south. The craggy ridge of which its summit is formed, is somewhat higher at the two extremities than in the centre. The whole rock is about seven miles in circumference, and forms a promontory of about three miles in length. Its breadth varies according to the indentations of the shore, but it no where exceeds three quarters of a mile. The most elevated point of this promontory towards the south, is called the Sugar Loaf, and is about 1440 feet above the sea; that towards the north is called the Rock Mortar, and is 1350 feet high; the signal house, which is nearly in the centre, is 1280 feet above the level of the sea.

The mountain of Gibraltar consists of a reddish grey calcareous rock, in regular strata, which may be examined with great accuracy in the north front, where there is a complete section of upwards of 1300 feet of perpendicular height. The strata are from 20 to 50 feet in thickness; and the whole mass is cavernous, presenting some of the most remarkable caves, adorned with magnificent stalactites.

* The hills of Palestine are almost all formed of calcareous rocks, remarkable for their natural cavities. Those wonderful stones of which the temple of Jerusalem was built, were of this nature, abounding in fossil shells. The pyramids of Egypt are also built of a species of oolite, which is full of small fossil shells, which were once thought to be petrified lentils, and other seeds, left by the workmen employed on these stupendous fabries. This is nearly as philosophical a way of accounting for them, as the idea of Voltaire, who thought the fossil fish found in Italy were the refuse thrown away by the Roman epicures.

† We familiarly make use of these same laws, on many occasions of every day occurrence. If we wish to separate any dry articles in the form of a powder, but of irregular grain, we naturally shake it with a lateral motion, when the different sizes and weights of the particles become arranged; the finer always being found at the bottom. Every sportsman must be familiar with this law of gravity, as it is well demonstrated in the accidental mixtures of both powder and shot of different grains, which it is often necessary to separate.

I have been favoured with the perusal of a MS. account of the celebrated cave of St. Michael, in the rock of Gibraltar; and with the kind permission of its author, I cannot hesitate in presenting it to my readers, as it will serve to give a very just idea of the numerous similar instances of lime-stone caverns, which are to be found in so many other parts of the world.

The following extract is from a MS. journal kept by Captain Martin, while in the command of the late sir William Curtis' yacht, the Emma, on a pleasure cruise to the Mediterranean, in 1823 and 1824.*

"Having determined to explore St. Michael's cavern, I took ashore part of the crew, with a supply of signal lanterns, lines, Roman candles and blue lights: and Captain Paterson, an officer of the garrison, who had before made the excursion, joined our party, and was a great acquisition. We landed at the dock-yard, and immediately commenced our march towards the summit of the mountain. In about three-quarters of an hour we reached the stone platform in front of the cavern, which forms an esplanade for artillery.

"From this platform we overlooked the extraordinary line of fortifications, together with the villas and gardens, the town, the parade, the mole, the shipping at anchor in the bay, the city of Algesiraz, La Roche, and the distant mountains, the Ape's hill on the coast of Barbary, and the whole line of the two bold shores forming the straits, along to Ceuta: these objects, together with the deep blue pass, studded with white sails, completed the bird's-eye view, and formed one of the most splendid pictures that can possibly be imagined.

"We now commenced our descent into the cavern; and having proceeded about a hundred yards we halted to look about us. The roof of this apartment is supported in the midst of a stupendous pillar of stalactite irregularly fluted. The water, clear as crystal, but loaded with calcareous matter, was seen dropping from various parts, and exhibited the manner of this continual, but gradual formation, as, wherever it fell, a round knob of stony matter was upon the increase, instead of the hollow which would have been produced, had the rock from which it falls, been of the sand stone formation.

"The rays of light from the cavern's mouth, fall on a number of broken crags, and detached parts of pillars, plainly indicating their having experienced some severe shock as of an earthquake, as the points from which they have been shattered are distinctly visible.

"We now followed Captain Paterson into the second cavern, which was larger than the one just described; and I here lighted a Roman candle, which brought into view two most beautiful arches, the columns of which much resembled the pipes of an organ. Through the termination of one of these arches an aperture presented itself; and having made fast the end of a line, and left one of the crew at the entrance, we proceeded on our hands and knees, extending our line as a clue to our return. We thus crawled along a very considerable distance, till we found ourselves once more in an open space, but in darkness so thick that the rays of our lantern extended but a very short way, and above our heads was a void of indefinite extent. As we now stood in a groupe, afraid of venturing further, or of being precipitated into some horrible abyss, I suddenly lighted one of our blue lights, when the whole dome of this magnificent cavern burst at once upon our sight, tinged with the sulphureous hue of the brilliant flambeau I held in my hand. Pillar upon pillar, supporting mimic galleries, arch upon arch rising in Gothic elegance, seemed as if the sudden work of a magic spell, and sparkling with crystal and stalactite far beyond our reach."

(Simulaverat artem
Ingenio naturo suo: nam pumice vivo
Et levibus tophis nativum duxerat aream.)

"A few feet from us was a well-like aperture, which Captain Paterson now invited me to descend by the aid of a rope; but this I thought it prudent to decline, satisfied with the magnificent scene before me. That gentleman had, however, formerly explored this cavity; and he described it as being about 50 feet deep, and terminating in a range of caverns similar to the one in which we then stood; and beyond these were other descents which never yet have been explored.

"We now retraced our steps, highly gratified with what we had seen; and as we emerged once more into the light of day, our agreeable sensations were much increased by the exhilarating contrast. Upon looking upwards towards the summit of the rock, I perceived the smoke which our flambeaux had occasioned, issuing out from among the shrubs; and being led by curiosity to climb up to the spot, we found a fissure in the rock, which, no doubt, communicated with those remarkable labyrinths, and through which aperture the currents of air were now clearing away the smoke produced by our lights.

"What a wonderful natural monument of former events is this extraordinary rock! A pyramid of huge stony strata completely honey-combed with caverns of this description. Its inaccessible and perpendicular face to the eastward, commonly called its Levant side, is perforated with innumerable fissures, opening, no doubt, into its interior recesses, and forming the habitation of swarms of apes and sea-fowl; while to the northward it is completely isolated from the main land by a long extent of sand, called the neutral ground.

"The view which we also had of this remarkable rock from the sea, was in the highest degree imposing. The swell of the waves rolling against its base, and rushing into its dark caverns, produced a melancholy sound; and I amused myself as we passed close in shore, in prying with my telescope into the mouths of these gaping chasms, within which I should suppose a boat could seldom enter, as the restless waters are agitated by the slightest breeze."

From the consideration of the mountains and the hills, in both of which we find strong corroborative evidence in support of what has been advanced, we now descend to the plains of the earth; and we there find, as might naturally be expected, so many additional traces of a former ocean, that every shadow of doubt ought to be removed from an unprejudiced mind. We have before remarked, that by far the greater proportion of the present dry land consists of plains but little elevated above the present level of the sea. We find no exception, in this particular, in any of the continents into which geographers have divided the earth; but in order to form a better idea of this part of our subject, we may refer to the descriptions given us by some of the most enlightened travellers of those seas of land, as they have sometimes been called.

Humboldt has given us, in his valuable book of travels, so interesting an account of the great plains of South America, that I shall here lay it before my readers:

"In the Mesa de Paja," says he, "in the ninth degree of south latitude, we entered the basin of Llanos. The sun was almost at the zenith; the earth, wherever it appeared, was sterile and destitute of vegetation. Not a breath of air was felt at the height we sat upon our mules; yet, in the midst of this apparent calm, whirls of dust incessantly arose, driven on by the small currents of air that glide only over the surface of the ground, and are occasioned by difference of temperature, which the naked sands and the spots covered with herbs, acquire. These sand winds augment the suffocating heat of the air; every grain of quartz, hotter than the surrounding air, radiating heat in every direction. All around us the plains seemed to ascend towards the sky, and that vast and profound solitude appeared to our eyes like an ocean covered with sea weeds. Through a dry fog, and the strata of vapours, palm-trees were seen from afar, the stems of which, stripped of their foliage, but with verdant tops, appeared like masts of ships discovered in the horizon.

"There is something awful, but sad and gloomy, in the uniform aspect of these steppes. I know not whether the first aspect of them excites less astonishment than that of the chain of the Andes itself.

"Mountainous countries, of whatever variety of height, have always an analogous physiognomy; but we accustom ourselves, with difficulty, to the view of the Llanos of Venezuela and Casanary, and to that of the Pampas of Buenos Ayres and of Chaco, which recall to the mind incessantly, and during journeys of twenty or thirty days successively, the smooth surface of the ocean. I had seen the plains or Llanos of La Mancha, in Spain, and the heath lands that extend from the extremity of Jutland, through Luneburg and Westphalia to Belgium. These last are real steppes, of which man, during many ages, has been able to subject only small portions to cultivation. But the immense plains of South America are but feebly represented by those of the north and west of Europe.

* Should the author of this interesting MS. ever be induced to offer it to the public, it will exhibit the workings of a poetic mind and a graphic pen, such as have seldom appeared in our naval annals.

"The course of the rivers in these vast plains, all branches of the Oroonoko, had once led me to think that they formed table lands, raised at least 100 or 150 fathoms above the level of the ocean. I supposed, in like manner, that the deserts of interior Africa were also at a considerable height, and that they arose one above another, like stages, from the coast to the interior of the continent. With regard to the Llanos of South America, however, I found, by barometical measurements at various points, that their height is only from 40 to 50 fathoms above the level of the sea. The fall of the rivers is so gentle, that it is often imperceptible; so that the smallest swell of the Oroonoko causes a reflux in those rivers of the plains which run into it.

"The chief characteristic of the savanahs, or steppes of South America, is the absolute want of hills and inequalities, and the perfect level of every part of the soil. This resemblance to the surface of the ocean strikes the imagination most powerfully, where the plains are altogether destitute of palm trees, and where the mountains of the shore and of the Oroonoko, are so far distant that they cannot be seen. This equality of the surface reigns, without interruption, from the mouths of the Oroonoko to Ospinos, under a parallel of 180 leagues in length (540 miles), and from San Carlos to the savanahs of Caqueta, on a meridian of 200 leagues, or 600 miles. The planters who inhabit the southern declivity of the chain of the coast, look down upon the steppes, which extend towards the south as far as the eye can reach, like an ocean of verdure. They know that they can traverse the plains for 380 leagues, (or for 1140 miles), to the very foot of the Andes of Pasto!"

The generally low level of North America is scarcely less remarkable than that of the South; but that country is so much more broken and irregular in the line of its sea coast, and so much indented by gulfs and inland lakes, that the plains are no where of such vast extent. However, the generally level state of that country is shown by the navigable rivers with which it is every where intersected, and from which the greatest riches of North America are derived.

In the extensive low plains of Carolina, marks of the former occupation of the sea are every where displayed. Extensive beds of oystershells are found at considerable depths, alternating with strata of blue clay; and the bones of monstrous animals are often discovered in cutting canals; these are the remains of the mastodon, and the mammoth, found in so many other parts of the world in similar situations.

From the new world we turn our eyes to the deserts and sands of Africa, of an extent and character not less remarkable. They have been described by Bruce, Park, and other travellers. Pure sea sand is there the prevailing soil, (if it deserve the name:) and though their elevation, above the sea, has not been so accurately measured as those of Europe, or of Asia, we may yet judge, from the currents of the Nile, and other rivers of Africa, flowing from the interior, that that continent is not, generally, of greater elevation than that of America, being crossed, however, by ridges, of very considerable height, in various directions.

M. Caillié, the enterprising French traveller, who, in 1824 and 1825, succeeded in penetrating to Timbuctoo, and was the first European who has ever returned to give us a distinct idea of that mysterious city, has thus described the desert of Sahara, which description will be found intimately connected with our present subject.

"A boundless horizon," says he, "expands before me; and we can distinguish but an enormous plain of shining sand, and, over it, a burning sun. We come occasionally to deep, wells, full of brackish water. At a depth of four feet from the surface is found a gray sand, mixed with a little clay of the same colour. At the bottom of these wells there is often found a white kind of earth, resembling chalk, and mixed, occasionally, with some black or gray rounded pebbles. As far as the eye can reach there is no trace of vegetation; for hours in succession we did not see one blade of grass. The plains had the precise appearance of the ocean; perhaps, such as the bed of the sea would have, if left dry by the waters. In fact, the winds form in the sand undulating furrows, like the waves of the sea, when a breeze slightly ruffles its surface.

"At the sight of this dismal spectacle, of this dreadful and awful abandonment and nakedness, I forgot, for a moment, all my hardships, to reflect upon the violent convulsions which appeared to have dried up part of the ocean, and upon the catastrophes which have thus changed the face of our globe."

This traveller states, that the trade of Timbuctoo, and, in great part, of all the interior of Africa, consists of salt, from the mines of Tondeyni, and of Waden.

In Asia, we are equally struck with the great plains of China and Hindostan, which are of immense extent; but, from their richer soils, they constitute, in point of fertility, the most productive portion of the habitable globe. Some parts even of these, however, being composed of sand, or of indurated clay, are also completely barren: and the plains of the Cambul territory, extending four hundred miles in length, are of this desert description. The great salt desert of Persia stretches over an extent of about 500 miles, and is composed of a reddish sand, so fine as scarcely to be perceptible, and producing nothing but a few saline and succulent plants.

Arabia contains deserts of not less extent, composed of barren sands impregnated with sea salt, and totally destitute of rivers.* The very low level of these deserts, would cause them to be again inundated by the sea, by a very slight rise in its waters. The sub-soil, like that of most deserts, is a grayish clay, with a large proportion of sand, and containing marine exuviæ.

We find the following descriptions of the plains of Mesopotamia, in Buckingham's travels in that country. "The aspect of the country was dull and uninteresting; as there was neither mountain, valley, nor even plain: the whole being an unequal surface, like the high and long waves of a deep sea, when subsiding from a tempest into a calm: not a tree was any where in sight to relieve the monotony of the scene." The description of these plains by Xenophon, in his Anabasis, 2200 years ago, is strikingly correct. "The country," says he, "was a plain throughout, as even as the sea, and full of worm-wood: if any other kind of shrubs or reeds grew there, they had all an aromatic smell: but no trees appeared. Of wild creatures, the most numerous were wild asses, and not a few ostriches, besides bustards and roe-deer (or antelopes) which our horsemen sometimes chased."†

Mr. Buckingham, in another place, proceeds: "The people here have a particular and characteristic name for the desert, similar to that which we use for the wide expanse of the ocean, when we call it the open sea. In these extensive plains, minute objects are seen at quite as great a distance as on the ocean; and the smallest eminences are discovered by degrees, just as islands and capes are at sea, first, showing their tops, and then raising them gradually above the horizon, till their bases appear on a level with the observer. The bearings and distances of wells are noted and remembered from such objects; and they are seen by caravans, slowly crossing the great desert, for many days in succession, as they approach to, or recede from them."‡—Buckingham's Travels, vol. i, p. 237.

In Europe, the most extensive plains are in Hungary, between the Danube and the Theiss. These plains have been computed by Humboldt to be about 3000 square leagues; and the line of division constituting the ridge between these two rivers, has been ascertained by accurate survey to be only 13 toises (or 78 feet) above the level of the Danube. Thus, it is plain, that a rise of from 200 to 300 feet in the waters of the Mediterranean, would overflow all the steppes of Russia, and connect that sea with the Baltic. The extensive peninsula of the Crimea, is in great part occupied by a vast undulating plain, or steppe, without wood, and mostly composed of sand, more or less mixed with clay. This plain abounds in salt lakes and marshes, from which salt is obtained during the dry season, for the supply of a great extent of country, and all the shores of the Euxine. Petrifactions, and marine exuviæ, are every where found in great abundance. The salt mines of Armenia have also long been celebrated.

† In considering the diluvial nature of this portion of the world, in which the Paradise of our first parents is described to have been, it must be obvious to every one, that no such local descriptions of Paradise, as is found in our translations of the Book of Genesis, can consist with the total destruction of the antediluvian earth, and with our now inhabiting the bed of the antediluvian sea. That the discussion of this question may not now interrupt the general line of our subject, in this place, it may be satisfactory to the reader to know, that so great an inconsistency is not left unexplained, but that the 14th Chapter is entirely occupied by it.

‡ "Travelling in Mesopotamia seems, even in the earliest ages of which we have any records, to have been little less dangerous than at present. Josephus, in his Jewish Antiquities, in relating that part of the history of Abraham, when he sent his chief servant from Canaan to Haran, to betroth a wife for his son Isaac, says: 'it was a considerable time before the servant got thither; for it requires much time to pass through Mesopotamia, where it is tedious travelling in winter, from the depth of the clay, and in summer, from the want of water; and, besides, it is dangerous, on account of the robberies there committed, which are not to be avoided by travellers, except by caution before-hand.'"

If we turn our view nearer to our own shores, and contemplate the level plains of rich cultivation occupying almost the whole of Russia, Poland, Germany, France,* and Holland, we shall be satisfied of the correctness of the statement with which we set out; that the appearances which present themselves on the plains of every quarter of the globe, prove beyond a doubt, that they have, at no very distant period, formed a part of the bed of the ocean; and that a change of a very few hundred feet, in the comparative level of the present sea and land, would once more destroy by far the greater proportion of the habitable parts of the globe. We are not, however, from hence to imply that the mode by which the deluge was effected, was less the agency of a supernatural power. We are only to guard ourselves against the ideas of some theorists, who, in treating of this great revolution, lose sight of the comparative extent of the whole globe, and of its aqueous covering; and who think it necessary to break up the solid sphere of 8000 MILES in diameter, in order to produce the means of immersing a few thousand FEET of its surface.

We shall find, that the more we study geology and mineralogy, on an enlarged scale, and under the impression of the historical view, which informs us not only that the old earth was to dissappear, but that it actually did become overwhelmed by a flood of waters, and that we are consequently now inhabiting a new earth, the very nature of which assures us, without the evidence of history, that it formerly was the bed of the ocean; the more easily we shall be enabled to account, in a natural manner, for the secondary formations and effects, now every where presented to our view. When we have once admitted that the primitive rocks were created without any connexion or assistance from the sea, of which they bear no marks; that the depression for the "gathering together of the waters" must naturally have given rise to the earliest secondary formations, in which no fossil remains are found; that in the course of upwards of sixteen centuries, many strata of a sandy and calcareous nature must naturally have been formed, with which the entire bed of the antediluvian ocean must have been encased; and forming heights and hollows of an easy and rounded form, as at the present day; and that at this particular period of the world, an interchange was to take place, between the level of the old sea, and of the old land, by which preternatural operation, ordained for an especial purpose by the great ruler of the universe, these secondary heights and hollows were to become visible; from the moment we take this view of the subject, every thing on the earth becomes consistent, which was before confused, and in darkness: we can trace in our minds, the whole operation of mineral secondary formations, although we cannot be expected, always, to account for the various characters impressed upon different rocks, in the course of passing under the influence of the chemical proeesses of nature. When we thus acknowledge the period and the mode of the deluge, we have only then to discover, in our present rocks, what the particular formations were, which formed the actual bed of the sea, at that destructive period. When we have been enabled to do this, as we often can do most distinctly, (as, for instance, in the chalk basins of geologists,) we may be satisfied, that every thing we find above them, is the result of the action of the deluge, in the slow and gradual progress of which, during one whole year, the sea would continue to arrange and deposit the substances of every kind submitted to its action, in the same manner as at other times, only to a prodigiously greater extent, from the preternatural supply of the whole moveable soils and productions of the antediluvian continents.† Nor must we permit our minds to be misled by the depth and extent to which these diluvial formations are frequently found. For though in our low lands we often cannot penetrate the total depth to which they extend; yet we must keep in mind, on the other hand, that, on our higher grounds, the rocks, in numberless instances, present at once the secondary formations which formed the bed of the sea at the deluge: and, consequently, that the whole moveable soils of the old world, are accumulated deeply in the hollows, or spread more thinly over the plains of the new. As a familiar instance of this arrangement, we may take the chalk formation of the south of our own country, and of the north of France, which broad extent of country, though now intersected by the channel, is obviously one great continuous secondary formation of the antediluvian sea, presenting a rounded and varied outline, without any naturally abrupt form.

Let us then consider this great extent of chalk, (which, in France alone, is calculated at 16 millions of acres,) at the period of the deluge, when, as has been above explained, the interchange of level was to take place, either by the depression of the old lands, the elevation of the foundations of the old seas, or, perhaps, by the action of both these effects. This chalky accumulation of many centuries, continued below the surface during the early period of the deluge, the waters of which, turbid as they naturally must have been, deposited more or less of the new soils, over every part of it, both high and low, but, probably, to a greater depth in the hollows; the finer particles sunk, as usual, to the bottom; the grosser were moved about by the currents on the upper parts of these new formations, as they were deposited; the depression of the old continents gradually continued; until we at length arrive at a period of this interchange, when the tops of the round heights, in the chalk formation, came gradually to the surface of the waters, and were washed over by the waves. The operation proceeds; they gradually become more and more elevated above the level of the waters, which, as they sink, wash off any of the new soils which might have been deposited on the heights, and carry them again into the gulfs, to undergo a fresh deposit in a lower level. The tops and sides of the chalky elevations were then left nearly bare, as we now find them; while the whole moveable matter of the diluvial waters became deposited in the basins or hollows. In tracing the sections of the chalk, which are visible on the sea coasts, we often discover such hollows similarly filled up;* and we can have no reasonable doubt, that the extensive districts now contained in the well-known basins of Paris, London, and the Isle of Wight, &c., are precisely of the same character, and owe their formation, and their richness of soil, to the very same cause and period.

If any further proof of this were required, we should find it in the fossil remains of quadrupeds, birds, fish, plants, and shells, found in the lower strata of the Paris basin; similar, in many instances, to those found in the upper soils of the earth, which latter are unanimously admitted to have been lodged there by the diluvial waters.† .

A section of this basin, (which has become more remarkable than numberless similar basins, merely from its situation near Paris, and its having been so minutely scanned by the distinguished Cuvier, whose theories, erroneous as they are, have been founded upon the phenomena there displayed), presents a numerous succession of distinct strata of sand, sand-stone, clay of many sorts and colours, marl, lime-stone, gypsum, burr-stone, and alluvial earths. In all these we

* The enormous collections of sea shells that exist in France, in Touraine, and at Grignon, have always attracted much attention. In the former instance there are said to be about nine square leagues, with a depth of about 18 feet, the whole consisting, almost entirely, of fossil shells. It is also said, that at Grignon, upwards of 600 species have been discovered.

† "The bones of quadrupeds, already mentioned, are never found in the strata below the chalk, but always in the clay over the chalk."—Edin. Encyclop. England, 713.

* There is an interesting section of a somewhat similar basin, presented to our view, on our own shores. On the coast of Kent, the chalk cliffs of the Isle of Thanet dip beneath the diluvial deposits about half a mile west from Pegwell, and they do not appear again upon the coast till a little way beyond Deal, in the neighbourhood of Walmer Castle. The borough of Sandwich stands in the centre of this diluvial section of a basin; and a branch of it, of a long, narrow form, divides the Isle of Thanet from the main land, and connects the diluvial formations of Sandwich with the Isle of Sheppey and the bed of the Thames, where bones of elephants, and other tropical productions, are constantly found in such abundance. The wells sunk at Sandwich, and in other parts of this plain, to the depth of from 50 to 130 feet, indicate many of the same species of diluvial strata to be found in London and at Paris. Blue clay, sand stone of various kinds, and many fossils, in the strata of clay and marl, indicate a succession very similar to that found in all such situations.

Nor can we examine any great length of coast where the chalk is the prevailing formation, without observing, in the section presented to our view, numerous smaller instances of hollows or valleys on the old surface of the chalk, which have been filled up with soil, or strata of sand and gravel; all of which are to be attributed to the same diluvial action on a small scale. Several such small basins may be seen between Ramsgate and Kingsgate in the Isle of Thanet, and also at the village of Pegwell.

† "We shall conclude our account of this basin (of Paris) with an enumeration of some of the most remarkable organic remains which have been found in its various strata. Skeletons of unknown birds, elephant's bones, fish, and fish skeletons; leaves and parts of vegetables changed into silex: large trunks of palm trees converted into silex: skeletons of various quadrupeds: tortoise bones: bituminous wood; and nearly throughout all the various formations, oyster shells."—Edin. Encyclop. France, p. 686.

The above enumeration is surely sufficient, of itself, to demonstrate the deposition of so extraordinary a mixture of land and sea productions at one and the same period, and by the action of one and the same agent.

find no formation of the same exact character, as the older sand-stone formations, or chalk, or other calcareous gradual deposits, which formed the bed of the antediluvian sea.

Cuvier remarks, that the quantity of bones embedded in the gypseous strata of Paris, is such as to be scarcely credible. In some parts of these strata there is scarcely a block that does not inclose a bone; and millions must have been destroyed, in the course of the old excavations, before these objects began to attract attention. The depth of the entire basin has never been ascertained, but it is calculated at about 500 feet.

Of the numerous species of fossils found in these various strata, we need only enumerate a few of the most remarkable, and coming from the most opposite latitudes, to show that this, and other such hollows, became the general deposits of every sort of diluvial debris, arranged, however, according to the mode universally prevalent, within the influence of the waters of the ocean. We find, then, a vast number of marine fossil shells, of which oysters form a prominent part. Some other shells, found in a formation where vegetable fossils also were, have been called fresh water shells; and thus, the two together, have given rise to one part of Cuvier's theory of *fresh water deposits. There can be nothing surprising in finding fresh water shells, even if well ascertained to be such, in an accumulation of so varied a character; but their presence alone cannot support the extraordinary ideas of the above distinguished individual: and, besides, it is admitted, that the exact character of such shells is by no means clear. We find, amongst many vegetable fossils, the stems of palm trees in a petrified state. Of large quadrupeds, birds, and fish, there are many most interesting specimens found in the gypsum formation; and, also, the bones of elephants, tortoises, crocodiles, and other tropical animals, similar in character, and in species, to many of those fossils found in lime-stone rocks in England, and elsewhere; and in the basin of London."†

We can, thus, have no hesitation in attributing similar effects to similar causes all over the world: and if it may be safely laid down as a general principle in geology, that no remains of terrestrial animals or vegetables are to be found in formations previous to the Mosaic deluge, it must naturally follow, that all formations in which such fossils are now found, are of diluvial origin. We are, of course, to distinguish between such formations, and the animal and vegetable remains found so abundantly in the more partial deposits of marshes or lakes, which have taken place in the common course of things, and are now going on under our eyes.

We come to the same conclusions in considering the great deposits of rock salt and of coal, in every part of the world; on each of which it may be necessary to make some observations: for nothing more strongly marks the former presence of the sea upon our present lands, than the immense strata of rock salt now found in all secondary districts.

In England, beds of from 20 to 30 yards thick, are found in Cheshire, and in other parts. Spain possesses the celebrated rock-salt mountain at Cordova, which is nearly 300 feet high. The salt alternates with parallel beds of clay, gypsum, or sand. Near the same place is a promontory of red salt, 660 feet high, and nearly solid throughout. The whole Island of Ormuz, in the Persian Gulf, is said to be a solid mass of fossil salt. In South America the salt mines are numerous; and some are found in Peru, at an elvevation of 10,000 feet above the sea; but even in these elevated regions, it is always associated, as in other countries, with secondary and diluvial formations of lime-stone, clay, sand, sea shells, &c.

As to the origin of these remarkable deposits, we may conclude, from the accompanying phenomena, that the salt has been deposited in hollows, on the retreat of the diluvial waters, and that the moisture has been evaporated or drained off in the course of subsequent periods.

That the waters of the ocean are found to be more richly impregnated with salt, the greater the depth from whence they are taken, is a fact which has long excited the remark of philosophers; and it appears highly probable that, from the greater specific gravity of salt water, a very extensive deposit of solid salt may take place in the greatest depths of the ocean itself. The reflux current in the Mediterranean sea is easily accounted for on this principle, that, as the waters are forced into it by the winds and the tides, and a great evaporation takes place from its inland surface, the impregnated salt water sinks, and being constantly supplied by the entering current, the lower strata, heavily charged with salt, are forced out again into the ocean, at a depth far beyond our observation.

We have a most interesting illustration of this fact, in an account given (in the 18th number of the Edinburgh Journal of Agriculture,) of the opening of the lake of Lothing, at Lowestoft, in Suffolk, on the 3d of June, 1831, when the new harbour was first entered by sea-borne vessels. The salt water entered the lake with a strong under current, the fresh water running out, at the same time, to the sea, upon the surface. This fresh water was raised to the top by the irruption of the sea water beneath, and an immense quantity of yeast-like scum rose to the surface. The entire body of water in the lake was elevated above its former level; and on putting down a pole, a strong under current could be felt, bearing it from the sea. At one place, there was a perceptible and clearly defined line, where the salt water and the fresh met, the former rushing under the latter; and upon this line, salt water might have been taken up in one hand, and fresh in the other.*

Mr. Cox, in describing the salt mines of Wielitska, near Cracow, in Poland, says, that the latter city is completely undermined, and stands, as it were, on pillars of salt. The strata of the whole mine are described minutely by M. Guetard, who says, that the upper surface, like a great part of Poland, is sand; then follows clay, occasionally mixed with sand and gravel, containing fossil animal remains; and the third stratum is calcareous rock, or gypsum; from all which circumstances he very naturally concludes, that this spot was formerly covered by the sea, and that the salt was deposited from its evaporated waters. All the above extraneous formations being evidently diluvial, like those at Paris, guide us to the exact period of this, and all other salt deposits.

It only now remains for us to take a general view of the coal formations, and endeavour to discover whether there is any analogy between them and those we have already been considering. The first striking circumstance in the coal fields, is, that they have no connection with primitive rocks, but, on the contrary, are always found in secondary and plain countries. They lie amongst sand-stones, clay-slates, and calcareous rocks, but have, in no instance, been found below chalk, which is one of the best defined secondary formations immediately preceding the deluge, as has already been shown. It is true, that in the unreasonable systems of general and continuous stratification over the whole globe, which so much prevail in the geology of the present day, coal is

* "Those terrestrial organic remains which may be considered as properly terrene, are presumed to be so, from their natures, and not from their situations; as they are found embedded in strata of aquatic origin, as well as in alluvial deposits, and occasionally in company with aquatic, in some cases, indeed, even with marine remains. They comprise quadrupeds, birds, reptiles, insects, and plants; and they bring us down to the last periods of the earth's change, which connect the most ancient living beings with those which are actually in existence.

"Remains of quadrupeds of various extinct genera or species, together with those of some birds and reptiles, are found accompanying fishes and shells in the fresh water deposits of the Paris basin. These are also accumulated in caverns, or fissures, more or less entangled in earthy matter. Under the same head may be also included the animals entangled in ice."—Edin. Encyclop. Organic Remains.

We here find, in the able article, of which the above is an extract, a distinct admission of analogy between all such fossils, wherever they are found in a mixed state: and it may be, perhaps, with confidence concluded, that no fossil, quadruped, bird, or plant, has yet been found, which may not be considered a deposit from the diluvial waters.

† In the above quoted able article on organic remains, in the Edinburgh Encyclopædia, amidst the general obscurity which unavoidably overhangs this subject, when viewed under the influence of existing theories, we find many gleams of light, all of which tend towards the very points for which we are now contending. The blindness of theorists to the imperfections and contradictions of their own conceits, is often exposed by the able author of that article: and the geological theories of Cuvier have not escaped remark, and able animadversion. After giving an account of some fossil fish found in a calcareous shale near the village of Stein, (where the Rhine issues out from the Lake of Constance,) 500 feet above the level of the lake, and which have been called fresh water fish by Saussure, probably from the vegetable remains also found in the same deposit, this author makes the following remark, which might be equally applied to many other parts of that article: "We can only say, that if this intermixture of marine and fresh water fish exists in this place, and if there is no error in the assignment of species, the geology of this district requires to be more carefully examined."—Edin. Encyclop. Organic Remains, p. 717.

* Great quantities of fresh water fish perished on this occasion; one pike, however, of 20lbs. weight, had found time enough to devour a herring, which was found entire in his stomach.

made to lie far beneath chalk, and is, consequently, supposed to be a formation of a much earlier period. Calculations have accordingly been made, as to the probable depth of coal beneath chalk; assuming, as a fact, that the dip of the coal strata continues in the directions we now find them to lie in different coal fields. Such calculations will be elsewhere shown to lead only to error and confusion.

The following passage in an able article of the Edinburgh Encyclopædia, on the geology of England, will serve to show, in the clearest manner, the general nature of the coal fields of our own country; and all similar fields may be traced to similar situations, by extending our views on a sufficiently large scale, and not being misled either by the dip of the strata, or by the nature of the embedding rocks.

"The principal coal fields, in the northern part of this district, lie in Northumberland and Durham; the West Riding of Yorkshire; and in Derbyshire. The strata of coal terminate a few miles north-east of the town of Derby, but make their appearance again to the south of the Trent, in Leicestershire, near Ashby de la Zouch: on the south-east, they terminate at Charnwood Hills; while, on the south-west, a thick bed of coarse breccia and gravel separates them from the coal fields in the county of Warwick."—England, p. 713.

"Although, as we have already remarked, the red sandstone rock cuts off the coal fields in general, yet, in some parts of Lancashire, and the western counties, detached coal fields are surrounded by it. All the strata of coal, and ironstone, in South Wales, are deposited in a lime-stone basin, the form of which is an irregular oval, in length 100 miles, and, where broadest, 18 or 20 miles. The upper stratum of coal is at the depth of 50 or 60 fathoms; the succeeding strata lie deeper, and are accompanied with paralleled strata of iron ore: the lowest strata at the centre range are from 600 to 700 fathoms deep." (This depth has, of course, not been found from actual measurement: 700 fathoms is not far from a mile; and it may be doubted, as is elsewhere shown, whether any secondary formations extend to so great a depth.) "In this basin there are 12 strata of coal from three to nine feet thick, and eleven others from eighteen inches, to three feet, making in all 95 feet of coal. The lime-stone that forms the substratum of this mineral deposition, appears on the surface all along the boundary of the basin, and is supposed to have an underground connexion, from point to point."—Edin. Encyclop. England, p. 714.

Nothing can be clearer than this account: and it appears certain, that as in the case of the Paris basin, this lime-stone formed the bed of the antediluvian sea, on which the diluvial deposits of coal, clay, iron-stone, and free-stone, were alternately laid at the same period. This being admitted, we have a natural means of accounting for the various inclinations in the parallel strata of such diluvial deposits. For, in the first place, they must have followed any inclinations that might have existed in the bed on which they were laid; and, in the next place, we cannot conceive so great a mass of very moist materials becoming drained of their moisture, and settling down into a dry and hard state, by their own weight, without subsiding more in one place than in another; and we can thus account for those derangements in coal and other strata which always occasion trouble, and often much expense to the miner; and are called by the technical and provincial names of troubles, hitches, nips, slips, &c.

If any additional proof were wanting of the formation of coal having been occasioned by terrestrial vegetable substances, deposited by marine action, we should find it in the presence of the impressions of fish and shells in the strata of coal in Leicestershire. It may be said, that, as coal is called by geologists a fresh water formation, these aquatic fossils most probably belong to fresh water lakes; but this reasoning is not consistent with numberless other facts, exhibited in the coal strata, and which fully prove their connection with the sea.

There occurs also in the coal districts another difficulty, which is not so easily accounted for, although we may form some indistinct idea of it. This is, the solid dyke of a different mineral, which sometimes completely intersects the strata, and appears to have been injected, as it were, into a fissure occasioned by the subsidence above explained. We discover something analogous to these dykes, in the remarkable beds of solid flint, which intersect the strata of chalk, in every direction.* These dykes of flint, though they never extend to the thickness often found in the coal strata, are spread both laterally and vertically over a very considerable space. They are distinctly proved to be a formation subsequent to the chalk itself; and appear, like all flints, to be the petrified calcareous fluids drained from the whole mass in the course of pressure. It is not easy to account for the manner in which the strata of the chalk were sustained, and kept asunder, whilst the petrifaction of this juice was going on; but this, like, many other such difficulties in mineralogy, does not affect the general question; nor ought the dykes of the coal fields to be advanced in opposition to the general principle of formation which we have now been considering.

POSTSCRIPT NOTE TO CHAPTER VIII.

While these sheets are preparing for the press, and while an opportunity is still in my power, I cannot permit it to pass without a few remarks upon an important paper on the Coal Series, lately read before the Yorkshire Philosophical Society, and which has now been published in the last number of the London and Edinburgh Philosophical Magazine (for Dec). This paper is upon the subject of "The Lower Coal Series of Yorkshire." It presents one of the many steps in the received systems of geology, which are slowly, but surely, advancing towards that very point for which I am now contending; and the few remarks I have to make upon it, will, I trust, go far to prove, that the hasty conclusions of the continental geology, on which our own schools have all been founded, have led to much contradiction and error, on this highly important branch of our subject.

It has, for some time, been one of the well known facts of geology, that, as trees and herbs could not, in any common circumstances, or by the common laws of nature, be deposited in a tranquil state in the bed of the sea, the extensive deposits we now discover in the form of repeated and alternating beds of coal, MUST have been deposited in fresh water; and, from this assumption, it has followed, that, wherever vegetable substances have been discovered, in the form of regular strata, even though occasionally accompanied with shells, such formations have received the geological name of LACUSTRINE deposits, as having resulted from the long-continued action of the laws of nature in inland lakes of fresh water.

This idea has, in a great measure, arisen, as I have elsewhere had occasion to show, from the deep-rooted error, that we are now inhabiting the same dry land which existed before the Mosaic deluge; and so misled have we in general been, by this delusion, that, wherever shells have been found in the neighbourhood of the coal strata, it has been assumed, as a matter of course, that they had belonged to such animals as then inhabited the fresh water. It must, also, be kept in mind, that, as there is often a separation of several hundred feet between the extreme limits of the beds of coal, and that, within that space, there are often many seams of that invaluable deposit, each assumed as having been the result of immense periods of time, as we may have naturally concluded, from the invisible (because visionary) progress of such deposits in the lakes of our own country, or in the rest of Europe; we are unavoidably led, by the adoption of such a theory, to discard history, and to adopt hypothesis; laying ourselves open, in such instances as I am now about to quote, to the vacillating effects, arising from distinct contradiction.

* During a residence of some time in a chalk district, on the coast, I have had an opportunity of paying some attention to the formation of flint; a subject which has never yet been duly explained, and which will, probably, long continue a problem in mineralogy. With regard to the actual composition of flint, I consider it clearly to be a petrified fluid drained from the calcareous mass, in a moist state. The perfect fluidity of flint, at one period of its formation, is distinctly proved, by the fossil shells often completely embedded in its substance, or preserved in the most perfect manner, attached to its surface. Shells, in a very complete state of preservation, and of the most fragile nature, are often found neatly filled with pure flint, even when at a distance from any bed, or nodule, of that matter, from which we might have imbibed them: have been accidentally filled, like melted lead into a mould. This fluid matter, however, evidently did not follow the general laws of fluids, by retaining a horizontal surface; for I have, in my collection of fossils, some shells of echini, which I found to be half filled with chalk, and half with flint; the latter, with a rounded surface, and in a sloping position. The flint, in these specimens, is, also, quite unconnected with the only two orifices by which the liquid matter could have entered from without; it would, therefore, appear to have originated within the shell. And this idea is further confirmed, by finding, in other beautiful and perfect specimens, filled with flint, that the substance is gently rounded outwards at the orifices, as if pressed in a thick gummy state from within; instead of being hollowed inwards, as lead is, when poured into a mould from without. I have also found, occasionally, that those nearly spherical nodules found in the chalk, are sometimes hollow, and contain, in the cavity, a yellow calcareous liquid, of the consistency of cream, and perfectly tasteless. The elongated and irregularly pointed nodules, are often found in the form of hollow tubes; within which, are sometimes minute crystals, and at other times, the matter has shot into long and delicate fibres, like hair, curiously interwoven. All these appearances in flint, distinctly prove it to have been a fluid, subsequent to the deposition of the chalk in which it is now found; and that it may, perhaps, properly be termed the juice of the calcareous mass, in the course of dessication, converted into stone, by those unaccountable chemical laws, which now govern the mineral world. The cause of the singularly irregular cavities in which the flints have been formed, and of their horizontal stratification in the chalk, must, for the present, remain subjects of conjecture alone; but, like the dykes in the coal strata, or the grottoes and fissures in lime-stone rocks, they do not in the least affect the general question.

Mr John Phillips, the author of the interesting paper above alluded to, says: "The lowest portion of the Yorkshire coal strata, resting upon the mill-stone grit, produces comparatively but a small quantity of coal; and this, in general, not of a good quality. But no part of the coal-field is more curious in its geological relations, or more worthy of close study, by those who desire to penetrate into the history of the production of coal. We may define this lowest coal series very simply, by saying, that it is included between the mill-stone grit of Bromley, beneath, and the flag-stone of Elland, above, having a thickness of 120 or 150 yards, and inclosing, near the bottom, two thin seams af coal, one, or both of them, workable; and several other layers scattered through its mass, too thin to be worth working. The most regular and continous of all these coal seams, reaches, in a few places, to the thickness of 27 or 30 inches, but is generally only about 16. It is worked at various places, near Leeds, Bradford, Halifax, and Sheffield.

"It would have been impossible to have traced so thin a seam of coal, along so extensive a range, without some peculiar facilities—some points of reference more distinct than the varying quality of the coal, and the still more irregular fluctuations of the SANDSTONES and SHALES. This coal seam is covered by a roof, unlike that of any other coal bed, above the mountain limestone, in the British Islands; for, instead of containing only the remains of plants, or FRESH WATER SHELLS, it is filled with a considerable diversity of MARINE SHELLS, belonging to the genera Pecten, and Ammonites; and, in one locality, near Halifax, specimens of Orthocera Ostrea, and scaly fish, have been obtained from certain nodular argillo-calcareous concretions, called Baum Pots, lying over it.

The uniform occurrence of the Pectens, and Ammonites, through so wide a range, over one particular thin bed of coal, while they are not found in any other part of the coal strata, is one of the most curious phenomena yet observed concerning the distribution of organic remains, and will, undoubtedly, be found of the highest importance in all deductions relating to the circumstances which attended the PRODUCTION OF COAL."

Mr. Phillips then proceeds to give sections of the whole series, which, as in other coal fields, consists of alternating strata of sandy and argillaceous deposits, exactly similar, in their general character, to what I have already had occasion to exhibit; and containing, in several instances, the fossil remains of shells and plants.

He then continues: "In the upper coal series of Northumberland, Durham, Yorkshire, and Derbyshire, are several most extensive layers of bivalve shells, commonly called muscle-bands, and referred to the genus Unio, from which the FRESH-WATER origin of those coal deposits has been inferred. It was, therefore, with extreme gratification, that I found, in passing through Mr. Rawson's colliery, at Swan Banks, in the midst of the series above described, TWO layers of these shells, one of them about the middle of the series, considerably ABOVE THE PECTEN COAL; the other near the bottom, and considerably BELOW that coal."

Mr. Phillips then reasons upon the "PERIODICAL return of the marine element into its ancient receptacle, after THAT had been, for some time, occupied by FRESH WATER, and its few inhabitants," in much the same way by which the theories of Cuvier attempt to account for the stratifications in the Paris chalk basin.

After what has been already said on the more consistent and historical source of such deposits, it is only necessary, in this place, to add, that so unquestionable a proof of MARINE agency, in various parts of the coal basins of England, must shake to their foundations the theories of LACUSTRINE deposits; and, until it can be shown in our own lakes, or in those of the European continent, not only that such extensive ligneous deposits are now going on in their beds, but, also, that distinct STRATIFICATION can, under any circumstances, take place, without the action of the tides and currents, we must continue to look upon such vague and contradictory theories, as nothing better than empty dreams, which leave the mind in a confused and bewildered state, without the reason being able to attain any sound or solid ground upon which securely to repose.*

Organic Remains.—Evidences derived from them.—Erroneous Theories of Continuous Stratification. Diluvial Fossil Remains. Diluvial Origin of Coal.—Unfounded Theories on this Subject.—The Belgian Coal Fields.—Tropical Productions in Polar Regions.—Buffon's Theory.—High Importance of the Evidence of Fossils.—Natural and unavoidable mode of Transport.—Instances in Proof.—Buoyant nature of Bodies after Death.—Rate at which they might have been Transported.—The thick-skinned Animals floated longest.

Having thus found a further corroboration of the truth of Scripture, in examining the appearances still existing on the general surface of the earth, we now come to the consideration of a most important part of the evidence, by which the record is still further supported, and in a still more remarkable degree: I mean, that of the fossil remains of animal and vegetable productions, so abundant in the secondary and diluvial formations. This most interesting part of our subject is much too extensive to be here entered upon at great length; but as many of the theories of geology have been formed on the evidence of fossils, viewed under a false light, it becomes highly necessary to take a general view of the subject; and this general view may, perhaps, prove sufficient for our present general purpose: for it must be evident, that a few facts, unequivocally proved, and supported both by reason, and by history, are of more value in leading to a just conclusion, than a thousand theories, however plausibly and ably composed, where both reason and history are directly contradicted.

The observations of the last half century, in various parts of the world, have served to give us a tolerably extensive view of this wide field for inquiry: but when we consider, that geology is but yet in its youth, and is only gradually rejecting the wild fancies of its more childish years; and, further, when we remember the comparatively few spots upon the surface of the whole earth, where we can have free access to a view of the interior structure in its upper strata, it may, perhaps, be worthy of admiration, that our knowledge is already so extensive as it is. As every day, however, adds to the number of ardent inquirers who bring in their stores of information, to add to the common stock, we may hope, in a short time, to obtain much more correct and certain data than we even yet possess, in order to secure the foundations of the whole structure, which have been, hitherto, but too generally laid in the sand.

In tracing the strata of the earth's surface, we discover, first, that no organic substances exist in the primitive rocks; nor do we meet with any marine remains until we rise several stages in the secondary strata. As we mount, however, towards the surface, the quantity of shells increases in some of the strata, while in others they are almost entirely wanting, as we may observe is the case in the visible parts of the present seas; but as we approach still nearer to the surface, and examine the rocks and soils which were formed at the period of the deluge, we find a vast increase in the fossil remains, and also a much greater variety in the species that have become embedded.

In the course of our examination into the laws of nature, by which secondary formations have been, and are still in the act of being formed, we found that it could not be expected that we should discover any fossil remains in the transition rocks, and but few in the earlier secondary formations; because, in the first case, the rocks so called, having been formed from the first fragments of the primitive earth, (by the depression of a part of which, the bed for the "gathering together of the waters" was first formed,) were arranged by the currents of the ocean, before that ocean became thickly peopled; and, in the second case, because the empty shells of the tribes, as they perished, would be comparatively few, for many years after the rivers and the ocean had been at work in forming secondary deposits. As time advanced, however, the sea would naturally become loaded with the shelly remains of past generations; and we should, therefore, expect to find a proportioned increase contained in the tenacious soils which have since been hardened into stone.

As we have seen that the laws which are in constant action in the waters, have a power of assorting and arranging different materials, in different and separate situations, we should expect to find shells more abundant in one formation than in another; and as we now find recent beds of sea sand of the most equal grain, and of vast extent, without almost a vestige of entire sea shells, we cannot be surprised on finding that the same law had obtained in the early sand-stone formations, and that freestone rocks are consequently, in general, destitute of these fossil remains; while the calcareous rocks, which, when soft and moist, must have been of a tenacious and muddy consistency, retain shells in extraordinary quantities. We have also found that there was little probability of discovering the remains of either fish or quadrupeds in the gradually formed secondary rocks, because, in the case of such deposits, the dead of both classes must generally have been devoured by the voracious tribes of the sea, before they could have been covered up and protected.

It has been too long and too generally the custom with geologists to reason upon the age of particular formations, from the nature of the fossils which they may be found to contain. We have thus arrived at many erroneous conclusions with respect both to the actual age of our globe, and to the gradual production of new species in the animal kingdom. As the whole science of geology may be considered to be founded on the evidence of organic fossils, it is of the highest importance on entering upon this subject to endeavour to correct our evidence before coming to a final conclusion. And it is, therefore, highly necessary to discover whether the theory of continuous stratification is well founded; and also, whether a distinct identity of fossil species can, in general, be traced in the same formations in every situation. On this most important part of the subject, I cannot produce stronger reasoning than has already been made use of by one of our most distinguished writers on geology and mineralogy; and the author of the very able article on Organic Remains, in the Edinburgh Encyclopædia. Although my opinions, on many parts of these subjects, differ widely from those expressed by this able writer, yet we here so completely coincide, that I shall not hesitate to introduce his line of reasoning in this place.

"It is now necessary," says he, "to examine a question which is strictly geological; namely, the nature and value of the evidence which fossil remains afford towards the indentification of strata, whether in the same, or in distant countries. Too much stress seems to have been lately laid on their utility in this respect; a natural consequence of the enthusiasm which commonly attends the discovery of a new engine. It is, in some degree, connected with the opinion which has been also held respecting the necessary identity of certain distant strata, and of an universal or very general deposition of particular rocks. The general question, as far as it is peculiarly of a geological nature, we dare not here enter upon, as it would lead us to a very long train of investigation; but we may state it, not only as our own conviction, but as now a prevailing opinion among all geologists, that no proof of such UNIVERSAL formations, as they have been called, exists. The arguments which would prove that opinion, from a presumed identity between certain strata mutually, and that of the fossils which they contain, and which, of course, presume on a succession of fossil bodies, as definite and constant as the corresponding successions of the strata, are open to many other objections, which we must now proceed to examine.

"Even admitting, that in two parts of the globe, which we shall here suppose polar and equatorial, the same strata, as to the materials and constitution of the rocks themselves, should exist, and be found also in the same order, it is not to be expected that the same fossil bodies should occur in them, unless the differences of climate were considered an object of no moment. If, in a weaker degree, yet the same objections hold good in those cases where the positions are far less discordant, as, even between the Mediterranean and the British channel, at present, we do not find a correspondence in the living species. In every situation, were we even to consider the animals only, the same reasons against such identity, among distant fossils in particular strata, exist; as we know that the different species inhabit different places irregularly, in colonies, or otherwise; and that even when mixed, they are limited to no determinate kind or number. If to this, we add the uncertainty of the strata themselves, the chances of a concurrence become so extremely small, as rather to make us wonder that such a notion could ever have been adopted. Many strata have been formed in independent cavities, and are not likely to have corresponded in any respect; and at this moment, one species, the oyster, or the muscle, for example, is now an inhabitant of submarine alluvia of entirely different characters in different seas, or even in different parts of the same sea. There is no reason why the fossils of the Paris basin should be identical with those of the English; because the living animals may have differed. If the bottom of the English channel should hereafter become an elevated stratum, the variety of its fossils would confound all this reasoning.

"Neither can the antiquity of beds be proved by the same reasons, unless we could also prove an absolute succession of species, or genera in creation; and unless these recurrences were more constant and regular than they are, and than we have shown them to be, in former parts of this essay. We might, besides, to these add many more objections to the probable value of this criterion, from general considerations; but it cannot be necessary. With respect to its value in minor cases, when the strata in one deposit, such as that of England, are to be identified, the objections may diminish in number, yet, even then, these proofs are not to be relied on, as must be evident from what has just been stated with respect to living colonies, now in the surrounding seas. That which would not identify modern submarine strata of mud, must not be expected to prove the identity of ancient strata of rock, formed under the same circumstances. That it may afford occasional assistance, will not be denied: but, to use a wrong method of solving difficulties is not only to deceive ourselves, but to establish or confirm false theories, and to stop the progress of all useful investigation.

"It is evident, that to prove the identity of an universal stratum, one species, or set of species, must have existed all over the ocean where its materials were deposited. To prove the correspondence of strata less universal, a more limited degree of the same improbability is required. To prove that particular fossils determine the character and place of any particular stratum, every species, or set of species, should have changed with the superposition of a fresh stratum: besides which, it should never either have pre-existed or re-existed. But it is surely unnecessary to add to these arguments against this theory. We must, therefore, here drop the subject, and examine, in as few words as possible, by an enumeration of species and genera in particular strata, how the fact really stands. Conchologists, and those geologists who have studied this subject, will be at no loss to extend a comparison, which we shall render as distinct as possible, consistent with the necessary brevity; because a few deficiencies in the evidence are sufficient to render the whole nearly, if not entirely, useless; and we need scarcely say how much we may be misled by thus trusting to what is imperfect or groundless.

"The lias of France, Spain, Italy and England, a stratum, or set of strata, well identified by their position with regard to the red marl, contains different fossils, in these several countries. Echini are found from primary slate up to chalk; as are tellinæ, turbines and chamæ. The belemnites, which are common in the chalk of France and Ireland, are rare in that of England; and the fossils of the chalk of Maistricht are almost peculiar to it. The vegetable remains that are found in the clay of Sheppey, do not occur in that stratum in other parts of England. Crocodiles, a fossil not a little conspicuous, occur in the lias, in the Portland oolite, in the green sand of England, and in the blue clay. Crabs, which are found in one of the earliest secondary strata, to wit, in the mountain limestone, also exist in the chalk, and in the London clay; as far asunder as they well can be. Madreporites, entomolites, pentacrinites, patellæ, ostreæ, ammonites, terebratulæ, gryphites, pectines, anomiæ, and numerous others, which it would be superfluous to name, are found in nearly all the strata: and so far is it from being true, that there are even any predominant associations of these, that they occur, intermixed in every possible manner, as will be more fully evinced in the general list hereafter given. It seems, therefore, quite unnecessary to pursue this subject further, since it must be sufficiently plain that the evidence in question is worthless, or worse."—Edin. Encyclop. Organic Remains, p. 753.

I do not think it necessary to attempt to add to the powerful reasoning from facts, contained in the above extract. It must be evident to every candid inquirer, that it shakes to its very foundation the whole theory upon which the indefinite age of our globe is assumed; and we thus distinctly advance in the line of reasoning suggested by the earliest history of the earth, and by the action of the laws of nature every where displayed around us.

But it is in the monuments left us by the deluge, that we should chiefly look for the most abundant fossil remains of every kind; and we must begin the consideration of these remarkable monuments, by again alluding to what has been already said in the last chapter, respecting the origin of the strata amongst which coal and other fossil productions are invariably found. It has already been stated, that by far the most probable origin of the coal formations, may be traced to the ruins of the whole vegetable world, at the period of the deluge; and in considering the subject of fossil quadrupeds from tropical climates, we shall find sufficient reason to account for the numerous palm trees and other tropical plants which have been found to exist in some of the coal fields. Some writers have endeavoured, indeed, to account for the coal formations, by the idea of submarine forests of sea weed, which they have supposed to exist in the depths of the ocean. Though there can be little doubt that many unknown wonders exist in these depths, and, amongst them many species of marine animals, with which we must for ever be unacquainted, and which, as fossils, we may look upon as extinct; yet we have no reason, from the specimens of marine vegetation occasionally thrown upon our coasts, to suppose that any thing like trees exists there. It may, indeed, be with confidence affirmed, that no unexceptionable specimen of a marine plant, embedded in rock, has ever yet been produced. The ground for supposing that all these numerous strata in the coal districts, ought, like those of the basins of Paris and of London, which contain no coal, to be included in diluvial effects, is, that from the number of months during which all things were fully submitted to the laws which act within the bed of the ocean, these laws had sufficient time to class and arrange the enormous quantity of moveable materials so abundantly provided by that destructive event: and however difficult we may find it, to bring our minds to the conviction, that beds of many hundred feet might have been formed in the course of a few months, we ought to correct our confined notions on such subjects, by well considering the large scale of the whole earth, by which we have hitherto been measuring the phenomena on its surface.

In examining a section of the coal strata in the vicinity of Newcastle, we find the following result in a mine of 270 yards in depth.

	Yds.	ft.	in.
Covering of loose soil - - - - - - -	10	0	0
35 strata of different coloured sandstone at various depths - - - - - - -	177	1	0
16 strata of clay and clay slate - - -	72	2	8
16 strata of coal, of various thickness, from 2 feet to 6 inches - - - -	10	0	2
Yards	270	0	10

We thus find the strata, in this great coal field, composed exclusively of such sandy and argillaceous materials as were naturally to be looked for in the accumulations from the diluvial waters, during a continued action of several months. On examining sections of other coal districts, as in Staffordshire, and in Scotland, we find the same constant repetition of sand-stone, slate-clay, fire-clay, argillaceous iron-stone, &c. without, in any instance, intervening formations, such as chalk, containing shell fossils, or others obviously of slow and gradual marine formation, indicating a long period between the deposition of the different strata of coal. It has been already observed, that the coal fields are generally, more or less, in the form of a basin; and as the upper edges of these calcareous, or sand-stone basins, are in many instances traced round the whole circumference of the deposit; and as the same materials are, in such cases, found to form the bed on which the coal and other superincumbent strata repose, we have the strongest possible reason for concluding that the whole formed a valley or basin in the bed of the antediluvian sea, and received its contents, while that sea was depositing the whole movable matter of the former continents, with which, we feel satisfied, its waters must have been charged. In these deposits large trees are often found, detached from the great strata of coal, and extending from one stratum through a variety of others, which is sufficient proof of these strata, at least, having all been formed at one period. Some of these fossil trees are so perfectly petrified, that the roughness of the bark is distinctly seen, as well as the interior circles, which denote the yearly growth of the timber. At other times, the wood is half carbonated, like the surturbrand of Iceland. It is also a general remark in all coal districts, that the stratification which attends that fossil substance, always terminates, and is ill defined and disordered when it approaches any mountain range of primitive or early secondary rock. This is an effect which we should naturally look for, when we consider the nature of the subsidence of a moist mass of such extent, on being left to drain of its superfluous waters. For while that mass subsided more in one place than in another, and thus produced what, in the miner's phrase, are called troubles, dykes, and slips, we can easily suppose great disorder to have been occasioned where the mass touched the edges of the basin within which it was deposited; and where friction would prevent regularity in the subsidence for some considerable distance, and would consequently throw the whole stratification into disorder. That these troubles, dykes, and slips, are occasioned by such subsidence, is clearly proved by the well known circumstance in coal mines, that, even in such cases, each stratum usually retains its parallelism, with regard to those immediately above and below it.

We must feel satisfied, that, at the period of the deluge, the whole forest scenery of the globe, with the roots, branches, and foliage entire, must have been floated off upon the waters, matted together in groups, and forming immense islands, which must have been overwhelmed in confused masses, by the force of the waves, embedded at various depths, and covered up by strata, of various earthy and sandy composition, all which strata, having been subsequently placed above the level of the present seas, either by the depression of the former continents, or by the elevation of the bed of the former sea, (or by a combination of both these effects,) have been since drained of their former moisture, and have assumed the solid mineral substance which we now find so valuable.

It may be urged, in opposition to this idea, that such masses of vegetable substances would continue to float upon the waters for any length of time, and therefore could not be embedded at the depths we now often find the coal strata. But we are assured by daily experience, that though vegetable matter may float for some time upon the waters, it does not thus continue sufficiently buoyant for an indefinite period; but, on the contrary, becomes at length so completely saturated with water, as to lose its buoyancy, and to sink to the bottom, like any other heavy substance. We have, amongst many familiar proofs of this, one directly in point, which is described as now in progress, on a considerable scale, in some of the American lakes; where such collections of timber are, in many instances, being formed near the embouchures of the rivers which flow into them from the forests, that the extent, both superficially, and in depth, appears truly astonishing, and has been described as the incipient formation of future coal fields.

In the late survey of the boundaries between the United States and Canada, we have some interesting information on this subject. About 1000 streams of various sizes are described as emptying themselves into Lake Superior; and as sweeping into it great quantities of drift timber, which form islands near the mouths of the rivers. Within a mile of the shore, this lake is, in many places, 70 or 80 fathoms in depth; and within eight miles, it has been sounded 136 fathoms. The thickness of this lignite formation is, therefore, probably very considerable.

These accumulations are often at some depth under water; and it is probable that in the course of their long passage down the American streams, the trees become saturated with moisture, and arrive in the lakes in a state which causes them to sink, and accumulate in the manner described. In our own country we are so familiarised to floating fir timber in all our sea ports, that we are too apt to consider all timber as buoyant in a high degree. But when we extend our views to the immense forests of the whole earth, and consider the condition to which this forest scenery must have been reduced by the action of the deluge, we must be convinced that, on so great a scale, the buoyancy of the great floating masses could not have long continued; and that various succeeding masses must have sunk in the diluvial waters, at successive short periods, sufficiently distant, however, to admit of considerable intervening accumulations of earthy or sandy sediments, between the strata which were destined to the formation of coal.*

We feel satisfied that the plants and leaves now found in such abundance, impressed upon the strata in contact with the coal, and for a few feet distant from it, must have been embedded in a fine, soft clay, or mud; because their most tender stems are well preserved, and are often unbroken to a considerable length: and as many of these plants have been recognized as belonging to tropical climates, they must be judged by the same evidence by which the tropical animals now found in uncongenial climates can be proved to have been floated, by the currents of the ocean, from a southern to a northern latitude.* If, then, it can be proved, beyond a doubt, that the mammoth of the frozen regions, never could have been an inhabitant of those regions, where its remains are now found preserved in ice; we must, upon the same evidence, conclude that all tropical fossil productions now found in climates unsuited to their growth, were lodged in their present beds by the same powerful agent; and that that agent was the deluge described by Moses; because neither from history, tradition, nor facts, have we evidence of any other such destructive event.

* For the most conclusive evidence on this part of our subject, see the Supplementary Note to Chapter XI.

In Iceland, and also in the lately discovered Melville Island, in the arctic regions, remains of large trees have been found, more or less converted into coal; and in some cases the stems are only partially carbonized. In both these cases, they are of a size that bespeaks the produce of a very different climate from that in which they are now found; and they must, therefore, like other southern products, in northern latitudes, be attributed to the action of the currents at the period of the deluge.

Amber may also be mentioned as an antediluvian fossil, found more frequently in the northern, than in the southern regions. It is not certainly known to what species of tree this gum must formerly have belonged; but it is evident, that it is the resinous juice of a tropical plant, in which insects have become entangled in the same manner as in similar cases, on modern trees. That it should be found more frequently in the north than in the south, is an additional evidence of the effects of currents; as from its great buoyancy in water, it would float for any length of time, and become embedded in the diluvial soils, from which it has subsequently been washed out by rivers, carried again to the sea, and thrown upon our coasts, or is found floating on the waters. It is, however, often found in its diluvial bed in France, and in Germany; and on many parts of our own eastern coasts, it is found associated with jet, or bituminized wood.

The above line of reasoning respecting stratification, must, no doubt, appear strange to all those who coincide with the following curious passage, to be found in a work intended "for the use of young persons, who may desire to become acquainted with the elements of Mineralogy and Geology." In treating of the general geology of England, and after explaining the commonly received theory of general and regular stratification, this author proceeds thus: "In fine, a view of the geology of England assures us of the truth of the assertion with which we set out,—that order in regard to deposition is universally prevalent, and that this order is never inverted. Keeping in view this important fact, we, who reside in a country which is of the newest formation," (alluding to London, or its neighbourhood,) "might amuse ourselves with speculations upon the distance which any one of the more ancient strata dips beneath our feet. This can only be done as a matter of curiosity, for we cannot even hope to approach the truth, because of the uncertainty whether the numerous strata to the west of us do, or do not, actually continue to dip towards the east, any considerable distance beneath the surface; and even if we were to assume this to be the fact, for the sake of amusing ourselves with a calculation of some sort, we should still be at a loss as to the probable thickness of the several strata. Coal is one of the most important deposits, and therefore claims our consideration in as great, if not in a greater degree, than any other. We find, then, that the nearest place to London at which coal is found, is in the neighbourhood of Bristol, near which place it dips to the east, beneath the red marl. In this country its geological situation is between it and the mountain limestone. Now, its geological situation being beneath the red marl, we may observe, that there are very many formations, or strata, supposing them all to dip together towards the east, intervening, between THE London clay and THE coal. And when we recollect that the outgoing of the nearest coal is upwards of 100 miles from London; that the wells there pass upwards of 130 feet through the London clay, before we reach the sand which lies upon the chalk, from which sand the water of the London wells springs; if again we consider that, between THE sand, and THE coal, the numerous strata extend on the surface, over a tract of country about 40 miles in length from east to west, as from Hungerford to Bristol; and if, moreover, we imagine all these strata to be compressed beneath the sand which lies upon the chalk, into one-twentieth part of what their outgoings occupy on the surface; we shall, even then, be compelled to suppose, that the strata of coal are more than TWO MILES beneath the bottom of the London clay. How near the truth this calculation may be, or whether the coal, and all the intervening strata between it and the chalk, pass away beneath our feet, we have no reasonable ground for concluding."*

Thus, because "the coal near Bristol dips towards the east three feet in six," there may be a possibility of the existence of the same seam, at the depth of several miles under the deep London clay. For it is too much to allow a loss of nineteen twentieths, in the calculation, by the compression of the strata; for, instead of being compressed, they must be supposed to be expanded, to occupy so much more room than they would all have done, had the whole series been found at Bristol. It seems scarcely necessary to remark upon the extravagance of theory contained in the above passage. Instead of taking London for our point of calculation, we have only to extend the idea a few hundred miles still further to the east of Bristol; and, including in our calculation all the strata of secondary rocks, upon which coal reposes at Bristol, and following up the same line of reasoning, upon the continuous stratification of the earth, what would be the result of our calculation? What a deformed and irregular mass would a section of the globe present, under such a theory? It would, in some rough degree, resemble the effect of Indian turning on a watch: the primitive nucleus of the globe would be entirely absorbed by the irregular segments of circles of secondary formation; and we should be utterly at a loss to represent the strata which lie in a vertical position.

When such theories as the above can be proved, to demonstration, to be founded in reason, and supported by facts, the page of the Mosaic geologist must, indeed, be forever closed.

With regard to the comparative level of the extensive chalk formation of the north of France, and the great coal field of Belgium, we have the most convincing occular demonstration of that of the former being below that of the latter. For if we follow out the section of the chalk presented to our view on the sea coast, proceeding from Calais in an easterly direction, we find the cliffs becoming gradually lower, as the whole country inclines to a lower level, until, at length, the chalk dips from our view, and we are launched into that immense sea of level alluvial plain, of which Holland and Belgium form but a small part. Now, when we trace the borders of the great chalk formation in the north of France, proceeding inland from the neighbourhood of Calais, in a S. E. direction, we find, that, although, from the unbroken state of that country, we cannot perceive the actual dip of the chalk beneath the alluvial plains of Belgium, yet we must feel convinced, from the section of the coast which we had previously examined, that we may assume that dip with as much certainty, as if presented to our view throughout the whole line. It is in this great alluvial plain, then, that we find, in the neighbourhood of Brussels, all those proofs of diluvial ruin, precisely similar to what are presented to our view in so many other parts of the world. We discover in great abundance, and at various depths, the remains of elephants, and other tropical quadrupeds. We find, in great abundance, both coal and limestone, without in any instance having to pierce the chalk, which we had seen disappearing under the diluvial strata, with a gentle dip and inclination. Here, then, we have another convincing proof of the nature of the deluge, and of the great chalk formation having formed at least one

*The species of fossil found near the coal, which has been called Lepidodendron, is very abundant, and is sometimes found of great size. Some specimens have been measured in the Jarrow Colliery, from 25 to 50 feet in length: and in the Fossil Flora, a specimen of this plant is mentioned, four and a half feet in breadth.

The unbroken length of some of the coal fossils has been urged as an argument against transportation, but without sufficient grounds. For if we consider the great floating masses of vegetation which must, in numberless instances, have been bound together at the period of the deluge, we may easily suppose that many of the reeds or tough canes must have become deposited with the whole mass, in an unbroken state. Amongst other vegetable substances found in the mines of Northumberland, ears of barley, and leaves of pine-apples, have been noticed. Sometimes large trees extend from one stratum, into another, one end of this petrified timber being of a different mineral nature from the other.

portion of the bed of the sea, at this destructive period; and yet, in the usually received opinions of geology, the chalk formation is placed far above that of coal, apparently from no better reason, than that chalk usually presents an elevation on the upper surface, while coal must be looked for at various depths below the level of the ground.*

In giving a faint sketch of the scene that must have been presented, during the height and abatement of the deluge, I had occasion to notice the power with which the currents must have acted, in transporting the floating remains of animals and vegetables from one place to another, and the speculations which those fossil bodies have given rise to, in these latter times. There is, indeed, no part of geological research that appears to have been viewed in a more false light, or that has given rise to more wild and unreasonable theories, than the mode of accounting for the fossil remains of tropical productions, in climates quite uncongenial to their support in a living state. To account for the numerous remains of elephants in the frozen regions, theories have been formed to show that the climates of our planet have been changed, by a change or position of the earth with regard to the sun. Others have supposed, that the climates are now what they ever have been, but that the animals whose remains are now found in the north, had a constitution fitted to a polar climate, because some elephants have been there found to have hair upon their bodies, with which most modern elephants are usually very sparingly provided.

The complete state of preservation in which they have been found, has also been advanced as a conclusive argument in proof of their having lived where they died, and having been suddenly encased in ice, by which even their flesh and blood have been completely preserved, like the bodies of insects in amber.

To give some notion of the extraordinary grounds upon which philosophers have sometimes founded their wild theories, we have only to glance at the idea of the celebrated Buffon, with regard to the changes of the climates of the globe; and all this extravagance of theory was to account for the remains of tropical animals in frozen regions; and, at the same time, to lend a helping hand to the ideas respecting the earth which he had previously promulgated. Buffon considered, that our earth was nothing more than a piece of the sun, struck off from its orb, by the violent collision of a passing comet; that it was driven into space in a state of red hot fusion, and thus gradually lost its native heat; that in process of time the latitude of Siberia became sufficiently cool for elephants, and other animals to live there; that when Siberia became, at length, too cold, they migrated to the southward, until they at length settled themselves, and became confined to the torrid zones. We are not told, by this distinguished naturalist, whence the elephants come; how the plants migrated, or how so many thousands of elephants showed so little of their celebrated and well known sagacity, as to have permitted themselves to be caught in the ice of the polar regions. This theory of Buffon holds out but a melancholy prospect to the animated beings now inhabiting the earth; as, in process of time, the whole must cool down to what the polar regions now are. Our only comfort, in such circumstances, must arise from the millions of years which the great theorist reckoned upon, for the cooling of so large a mass, and of which, we must hope, there are some few thousands yet to elapse.

Such are the grounds on which opposition to the sacred history has been raised!—and this within the last half century! On a foundation nearly equally unsound, have the subsequent theories of French geology been laid.†

As the whole question of the nature of the deluge, however, may be said to turn upon the subject of fossils, it must be admitted to be a point of the very highest interest, and, consequently, well worthy of the most careful examination. The great difficulty of accounting for these, and all other fossil remains of tropical productions in northern latitudes, appears to arise from the constant, but erroneous conception, that we are now living on the identical dry land which existed before the flood, and which the Almighty had declared he would destroy, together with its inhabitants. From the moment the subject is viewed in a proper light, and the conviction is secured, in the total disappearance of the old lands, and of our now inhabiting the dry bed of the former ocean, the difficulties vanish, and the whole subject becomes consistent and clear.

The first objects in this inquiry ought to be, to show, from physical facts, that a mechanical force does exist, the nature and action of which is, to transport floating bodies to a great distance, and, in many cases, in a northerly direction.

In a former part of this treatise, I have explained, in a general way, the nature and causes of the currents of the ocean, and have shown, that one great branch flowing westward, from the western coasts of America across the Pacific, passes through the Chinese seas with great force, accelerated, no doubt, by the opposition it meets with amongst the numerous points and islands. Here, then, is one mechanical power, by which floating objects would be, and no doubt are, transported from one side of the great Pacific to the other.

This same current, advancing westward through the sea of Bengal, and forced to double Cape Comorin, on the south point of that peninsula, is urged, by the present form of the eastern coast of Africa, in a southern direction, whereas, if this opposing shore did not exist, it would more naturally flow to the northward and westward, in the direction of the present European coasts. Here, then, is another part of the same mechanical power, which, if not prevented by the form of the present dry lands, and left free, as it must have been at the period of the deluge, would transport floating bodies in a direct course from Asia towards Europe.

If we still further follow out the courses of the currents, we discover another great branch called the Gulf Stream, rushing, with great rapidity, along the coasts of the United States, from a southern to a northern latitude, washing the coasts of Newfoundland; from whence it is forced, in a north-easterly direction, across the Atlantic, over to the coasts of Norway and the British Isles, and would, no doubt, have continued in its north-easterly course, towards the Arctic regions, had there been any free opening into the North Pacific Ocean in that direction. In the present state, however, of the sea and land, this current passes through the Bay of Biscay, and advances, southerly, towards the equator. Here, again, is an existing instance of mechanical power, by means of which floating objects are now constantly transported from the tropical climates of America and the West Indies, to the northern shores of Europe.

Mr. Pennant, amongst others, has remarked the variety of nuts, and other vegetable substances, which are thrown on the coasts of Norway and the Orkneys, from these southern climes; and also the mast of a British ship of war, the Tilbury, which was burnt at Jamaica, being thrown by this current on the western coast of Scotland. The same naturalist, also, speaks of the amazing quantities of drift wood from the American rivers, lodged on the coasts of Iceland.

In further proof of the general system of the currents, the following instances may be given, out of many.

A bottle, thrown overboard off Cape Farewell, on the 24th of May, 1818, from the Alexander, (one of the ships in Captain Ross's first voyage, in search of a north-west passage,) was picked up on the Island of Bartragh, in the Bay of Killala, in Ireland, on the 17th of March, 1819, having floated across the Atlantic, probably at a rate of more than four miles per day.

* The actual depth of the chalk formation, is a point with which we are, as yet, very imperfectly acquainted. In the Isle of Thanet, in Kent, a well was bored for nearly 500 feet, in the idea of finding fresh water beneath; but as the chalk and flint beds were equally solid throughout, the attempt was abandoned. This bore was continued upwards of 400 feet below the level of the sea, and must have also been far below the sea-bed of the adjoining coast; for, in the straits of Dover, the greatest depths are only from 18 to 24 fathoms, (or from 108 to 144 feet). From this circumstance, we may, with certainty conclude, that the chalk formations of England and of France form one continuous bed of much greater depth than we can easily penetrate; and especially as it does not offer the same inducement to mining speculations, which are so often presented among other secondary beds.

† There cannot, perhaps, be a more proper place, than, after the exhibition of so impious and wild a theory of French philosophy, to remark upon the very common notion, from time to time revived amongst the weak and the ignorant in Europe, that a comet is to appear, and to injure, or utterly destroy the earth; and the year, and even the day, is sometimes named for this termination to our human anxieties. This idea savours much of that very fortuitous philosophy which we have found such reason to condemn. Can it be for a moment supposed, that the Providence of the Almighty Ruler of the creation is so imperfect, or obscure, or the mechanism of the universe so ill regulated, that a collision can take place between any of the heavenly bodies, and an accident arise from the derangement of the Divine work, as constantly happens in the most perfect of the weak inventions of man? When has such an event occurred, in the lapse of ages? In what part of the annals of astronomy is it described? On those who repose with confidence in an All-wise Providence, and who have faith in the inspiration of Scripture, and consequently, in the unerring truth of prophecy, such vain alarms will have no effect; for they know that the foretold events of Scripture are not yet nearly fulfilled; and that, till these events take place, and while the earth remaineth, "seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease."—Genesis, viii. 22.

Some casks and shakes, (or empty casks taken to pieces, and packed tight, for the convenience of stowage,) belonging to the Royalist and London Hull whalers, which were both wrecked about latitude 61 degrees N., and longitude 56 degrees W., in 1814 and 1817, were picked up off the Butt of the Lewis, within a year of the time of these vessels being lost. And a shake that had belonged to the London, was found drifting through the Orkneys, about eleven months after the loss of that vessel. It had, therefore, performed the passage of 1600 nautical miles within that time, or, on an average, of five miles per day; and, in this instance, the transporting agent must have been quite unassisted by the winds, as these shakes are generally so soaked in oil, and are so heavy, that they float almost entirely under water.—Scoresby's Arct. Reg. vol. i. p. 208.

Mr. Scoresby, also, mentions a log of mahogany which was picked up at sea by Admiral Lowenorn, in 1786, when on his voyage to attempt the discovery of Old Greenland. "This piece of wood, which was so large, that they were obliged to saw it in two, before they could get it on board, they found in latitude 65 degrees 11 minutes N., longitude 35 degrees 8 minutes West of Paris. In the Danish settlement of Disco, is a mahogany table, made out of a plank drifted thither by the current; and it is now in the possession of the governor. A tree of log-wood was also picked up not far from the same place.

These logs of wood, the produce of the isthmus which connects North and South America, could only reach the places where they were severally found, by floating up the west coast of America, towards the north, through Behring's Straits, and so along the northern face of Asia or America, or across the northern pole."—Scoresby's Arct. Reg. vol. i. p. 7.

We have thus distinct instances produced by the above enlightened navigator and philosopher, of floating bodies being carried from an equatorial to a frozen region. Lieutenant Kotzebue found the current in Behring's Straits setting with great force to the north-east, and with a velocity of about two miles and a half an hour. If the same opportunities were afforded for scientific observations on the transporting effects of the currents, in the southern hemisphere, and in the unexplored or barbarous parts of the northern hemisphere, where European knowledge has not yet been introduced, there can be no doubt that these transporting effects would be as distinctly observed all over the earth, as they have been in the above instances. These are, however, fully sufficient to establish the existence of a mechanical power of transportation; and it would be both injudicious, and unnecessary, to endeavour to account for all the individual courses of the diluvial currents; for, as the lands by which these currents must have been influenced, no longer exist, the attempt could not be expected to terminate in any certain result.

Having now, however, found an agent, by which floating bodies are naturally carried from a southern to a northern latitude, let us follow the course of any animal body, such as that of an elephant, when deprived of life, in a southern latitude, and left to the influence of the natural currents of the ocean.

It is a well known part of the laws of nature, that an animal body, deprived of life by drowning, at first generally sinks by its own weight, and remains under water, until the laws of decomposition begin to operate. In the early course of this operation, and sooner, or later, according to the temperature of the atmosphere and the water, a quantity of air becomes disengaged;* and by this air, generated in the interior of the body, the whole becomes distended like a bladder, and rises to the surface of the water, by the same laws of gravity by which it had before sunk. The cause of this gasseous vapour, with which animal bodies become distended in the water, has not, perhaps, been yet examined with that careful attention which the subject appears so well to merit. It has been remarked by naval men, that when a body has sunk in a situation where no current is likely to remove it, it may be expected to appear floating on the surface, and in a shape any thing but human, about the ninth day after death, when a good look out is generally kept for its recovery. The time of such appearance on the surface, with regard to other animals, must, of course, depend upon their size, and the temperature of the water.*

In the common course of things, a body cannot long continue in this floating state, because it is immediately attacked by birds or fish, and again sinks to the bottom, as soon as the skin is broken, and the air thus suffered to escape. In the interesting accounts of the whale fisheries, by Mr. Scoresby, we find that the bodies of whales are often seen in the manner above described, and buoyed up by the air generated in the operation of decomposition. That remarkable whale, the skeleton of which has so lately excited the wonder and admiration of every beholder in London, (the weight of which, in an entire state, was 240 tons, or 480,000 pounds, its length being 95 feet,) even this monster of the deep polar seas, was found floating on the surface of the water, off the coast of Belgium, and was conveyed ashore near the port of Ostend. This whale was, no doubt, brought into these temperate regions by one of the very currents we have lately been considering. When a whale is struck dead by repeated wounds of the harpoon, its body often sinks, if not immediately secured to the ship, or to the neighbouring ice. When this occurs, a look out is kept for some days, and the body is generally found floating on the surface of the water, and attended by great flocks of sea gulls, and sometimes by white bears, which soon destroy its buoyant quality, when it again sinks, to rise no more; and we may easily suppose that such large remains become gradually covered up by the marine soils, or secondary formations, and would thus prove sources of wonder and speculation, if there were a possibility of their ever being exposed to the eyes of man, which, however, we know, from the very highest authority, is never likely to happen, as it has been declared by the Almighty: "I will establish my covenant with man; neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood; neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth.—Genesis, ix. 11.

But during the awful event we are now considering, all animated nature ceased to exist, and, consequently, the floating bodies of the dead must have been buoyed up until the bladders burst, by the force of the increasing air contained within them. The stronger, therefore, the hide of the animal, the longer it would resist this internal force; and, consequently, we can, without any difficulty, imagine the bodies of elephants, rhinoceri, bears, lions, and other large, coarse-skinned animals, floating upon the waters for several weeks, or even still longer, if they were rapidly carried into a cool latitude.

We have not many positive data on which to form a judgment as to the length of time necessary for floating a body from the equatorial to the more northern regions; but, as one instance, well authenticated, is as valuable for our purpose, as many, I shall quote that mentioned by Mr. Granville Penn, of the "Newcastle, 60 guns, Captain Fanshawe, which sailed from Halifax, in Nova Scotia, on the morning of the 12th of December, 1821, and anchored at Spithead on Christmas day, having traversed a space of 3000 miles in thirteen days.†

* "When the operation of flensing is completed," says Mr. Scoresby, "the tackle by which the whale was supported is removed, and the carcase, or kreng, commonly sinks; but sometimes it is so swollen by the air produced by putrefaction, that it swims, and rises several feet above the water.—It thus becomes the food for bears, sharks, and various kinds of fish."—Arctic Regions.

* It is a singular fact, well know to many naval men, that the bodies of unfortunate individuals, who have been drowned in a harbour, or other situation, free from currents, may be recovered by the firing of cannon in the immediate neighbourhood of the spot where they have sunk. Many successful instances of this experiment have been mentioned to me; and especially one, wherein the chaplain and a whole boat's crew of the Valiant, were upset in a squall, many years ago, in Torbay, and the whole unfortunate people disappeared. On the following day, an order was issued by the Admiral, for each of the ships of the fleet to fire some guns, and, in about an hour afterwards, the whole of the bodies, amounting to 12 or 14, were found floating on the surface. A similar trial, attended by similar effects, was made with the guns of Sir Godfrey Webster's yacht, at Margate, when the body of a boatman, who had been lost, was thus recovered. The idea generally entertained of the cause of this effect, is, that the concussion occasioned by the firing, breaks the gall-bladder, when a chemical process takes place, in which a quantity of gas is produced, which swells up the body, and causes it instantly to rise to the surface. Whether this be strictly correct or not, must be left for chemists to decide. This effect of concussion, however, certainly deserves more attentive consideration than it appears hitherto to have met with. It may assist in leading us to an explanation of the manner in which fish are known to be affected, at a great depth, by sounds; as porpoises, dolphins, and other larger fish, are known to be roused to unusual exertion and activity, by the firing of cannon. The subject might also afford great additional assistance to the benevolent efforts of the Royal Humane Society, in the recovery of lost bodies.

† As the longitude of Halifax is 68 degrees west of London, the

Had it not been for an interruption of forty-eight hours, occasioned by contrary winds, this distance would have been run in eleven days. The average progress, therefore, was 273 miles in the twenty-four hours; and on one of the days, the vessel actually ran 288 miles. As the wind blew almost a constant hurricane, very little sail was carried."*

We have here a recent instance of a large floating body following the direct line of one of the very currents which we have traced, (assisted, it is true, by a high wind,) and passing over a space of nearly 4000 miles in about eleven days, with very little assistance from artificial means. One glance at the map of the world will show that the same favourable current, and the same powerful wind, would, in a few days more, have carried the same body into the polar seas. Now, from the latitude of 20 degrees north, (or about the meridian of the centre of Hindostan,) to that of 75 degrees, (or that of the north of Nova Zembla and Siberia,) is not more than a distance of 3300 miles; and, therefore, even allowing for a smaller floating body than a ship of war, without much sail, we cannot hesitate in concluding to the impossibility of large inflated animal bodies remaining entire during a longer time than would be necessary for the passage of this distance, at a period peculiarly marked by storms and tempests. We are not, however, to suppose it probable, that the greater number of dead bodies reached a high northern latitude in an entire state. On the contrary, numbers must have sunk in every part of the temperate regions, and become embedded, piece-meal, in the rapidly accumulating diluvial formations where we now find them in a fossil state. But it must be admitted to be a remarkably corroborative circumstance, in support of this view of the subject, that, as the elephant, the hippopotamus and rhinoceros, are the animals, of all others, we should expect to float longest in an entire state, from the great strength and thickness of their skins, so they are the very animals now found in such vast numbers in the frozen regions, as to make their ivory a very considerable and valuable branch of northern commerce.

CHAPTER X.

High Importance of the Evidence of Fossils.—Siberian Mammoth.—The entire Elephant of the Lena.—Theories founded on this Specimen, unsupported by facts.—Consistent mode of accounting for Tropical Productions in Cold Climates.—Unchanged condition of the Climates of the Earth.—Italian Deposits.—Monte Bolca.—Fossils on the Coast of Norfolk.—Formations of the South of England.—The same View extended to the Continent.

We may now proceed to the consideration of some of the most remarkable fossil remains of quadrupeds that have been found in the temperate regions, and in such quantities in high northern latitudes, as to have given rise to much speculation and vague theory amongst philosophers, respecting the means by which they came into their present unnatural situations.

The bones of large quadrupeds have been observed, more or less, in all the quarters of the globe, where any attention has been paid to the search for them. In early times they were considered as the bones of the giants which were supposed to have formerly inhabited the earth. As mankind became more enlightened, these absurd opinions gave place to something nearer approaching the truth: it is, however, only within the last half century that science has applied that attention to the subject, of which it is so highly deserving; though the number of different opinions relating to these animal remains, proves how uncertain philosophers still are respecting them. The great attention of late paid to comparative anatomy, more especially in France, under that distinguished naturalist, the late Baron Cuvier, has greatly increased our knowledge of the different classes of animals, the remains of which are now found in the earth. But the geological views of that eminent man by no means kept pace with his zoological and anatomical knowledge. His theories of the earth, though exhibiting much talent, are all formed upon those very principles of secondary causes which we have found to be so objectional and unsound. His numerous revolutions, his alternate salt and fresh water deluges, all bespeak the school from which he derived his earliest geological ideas, and of which he himself latterly became the head. We cannot, therefore, with any consistency, or hope of profitable instruction, follow the track by which he would lead us to the origin of these fossil remains.

It is in the arctic and north polar regions of the earth, that some of the most remarkable and best preserved of these fossil remains have been discovered. There cannot, however, be a doubt, that if the south polar regions were equally accessible, we should also find their icy masses charged with the remains of the antediluvian dead. In Siberia, that barren region, so associated in our minds with tyrannical cruelty, solitude and desolation, where the great steppes, or plains, formed of a sandy and gravelly soil, intermixed with salt lakes, contain such quantities of the remains of elephants, that the fossil ivory forms a highly important and valuable branch of commerce. The natives of that country have given the name of mammoth, or the mole, to these fossil elephants; and, however strange it may appear, they look upon them as the bodies of animals now living under the ground; which idea is, however, founded on appearances and facts which render it in some sort plausible. For those who inhabit the northern regions, frequently find the remains of these large bodies still fresh and bloody; and as no such animals are ever seen on the surface of the ground in those regions, it is not unnatural for the ignorant peasants to suppose them to be a species of gigantic mole, which still lives and burrows in the earth. The able historian, Müller, who resided at Moscow in 1779, admitted that he was of the same opinion.

About the year 1799, a large object was observed by some fishermen, near the mouth of the Lena, on the coast of the Arctic ocean, to project from an icy bank, but beyond the reach of examination. For several following seasons the same object was remarked, and every year a little more disengaged from its icy bed, by the slow melting of the ice during the short summers. At length, in 1803, it became entirely detached, and the enormous carcase of a mammoth fell upon the sand bank below. This remarkable specimen was quite entire when it first fell, and the flesh so well preserved that it was greedily devoured by the white bears, and by the dogs of the fishermen.* In 1806, the remains of this carcase were examined by Mr. Adams, a member of the academy of St. Petersburgh, when the greater part of the bones, and a large portion of the skin yet remained. The brain was then still within the skull, but shrunk and dried up; and one of the ears was well preserved, retaining a tuft of strong bristly hair. The animal was a male, and is described as having had a sort of mane on its neck. As the description of Mr. Adams, however, was given nearly three years after the body fell on the sands, and as it had been partially exposed to the atmosphere during several years more, there can be little doubt that, if it had been dug out of its icy bed when first seen in 1799, we should have had a complete and minute description and drawing of one species of the antediluvian elephant.

Much stress has been laid by naturalists, whose theories of the earth required the aid of such evidence, on the remarkable shaggy coat of hair, with a species of wool at the roots, with which this antideluvian elephant was clothed: and it has been advanced, as a positive proof of the animal having lived where his remains were discovered; and, consequently, that he, and thousands of the same unwieldly race, the fossil bones of which are now found in such surprising quantities in the north, were all the natural inhabitants of these sterile regions, direct distance passed over by the Newcastle, must be fully 3700 geographical miles, or nearly 1000 more than Mr. Penn has calculated upon.

* Comp. Estim.

* It may appear to some, an improbable part of the history of this remarkable fossil, that any animal substance could have so long resisted decomposition, when acted upon by a solar heat, capable of melting the ice in which it was embedded. But it must be considered, that, in those high northern latitudes, as in the great atmospheric elevations of mountain ridges, in the regions of eternal snow, the air is of so rare and dry a nature, that the decomposition of animal substances can scarcely take place under any circumstances. It is true, that the direct rays of the sun act, in such situations, for a short time, with great power. But a general heat is never produced, such as occasions rapid fermentation in the equatorial and temperate regions.

where no appearance of vegetation for their support is ever now produced.* But notwithstanding this thick coat of hair and wool, we have not a shadow of ground for supposing the animal which it covered, ever to have been a native of the frozen regions; because, in their present state, the soils of those climates do not produce the food necessary even for the smallest graminivorous animals, much less, then, for creatures of the size of the elephant, which are known to require the most luxuriant forest scenery for their habitation. It is admitted that no such scenery exists within many degrees of latitude of the Arctic ocean; and it must, therefore, follow, that no such animals could find the necessary sustenance there, in the present state of the world. This difficulty is, however, easily overcome by those who insist on the mammoth having been a native of the countries where we now find its remains. For they immediately change the position of the globe, and endeavour to show, that what are now the frozen poles, were made so by some unexplained convulsion, after having enjoyed all the luxuries of a tropical climate; and they further endeavour to prove, that this convulsion must have been quite sudden, as the flesh and blood of this fossil elephant were still preserved entire. The supposed suddenness of this supposed convulsion, however, proves more than is demanded or desired by these theorists; for, if this elephant, together with the very great number of elephants and rhinoceri, whose remains are found in such quantities all over the frozen zone, were suddenly encased in ice, and thus, from that instant, preserved as entire as insects found in amber, why is it that we do not find, in the descriptions of these icy masses, any mention made of the quantities of vegetable productions amongst which they must have lived, and which would equally have been preserved in the most perfect manner? We should, in such a case, have expected to have found, on the shores of the icy ocean, a complete antediluvian herbal, which would have settled all discussions respecting fossil vegetables found in other parts of the earth. We can in no way conceive a convulsion taking place, to produce suddenly, such effects as exist at the poles, without freezing up, and preserving entire, the forests and jungles, as well as the wild beasts contained in them: nor is it in the least degree probable, that the elephants and rhinoceri would have been singled out for preservation, amongst all the numerous species of animals which inhabited the same forests as themselves, whilst almost every other creature was suffered to escape.

"There is not," says Pallas, "in all Asiatic Russia, from the Don, to the extremity of the promontory of Tchutchis, a stream or river, in the banks of which they do not find elephants, and other large animals, now strangers to that climate."† We no where hear, however, of either fossil or recent luxuriance of vegetation in these inhospitable regions, nor have we the smallest ground to conclude, that they have ever been less rigid than they now are, since the creation of the world; nor, consequently, that elephants, or other tropical productions, animal or vegetable, could ever have found subsistence there for a single day: nor will the undisputed fact of an elephant having hair on its body, afford us any conviction of its ever having inhabited so cold a climate: for though most of the present known species have but little hair, many of the most shaggy animals are natives of the tropics.

Pallas, in his Memoir on the remarkable fossils with which Siberia abounds, describes having there discovered an entire rhinoceros, the skin and flesh of which were preserved in ice, in the same manner as the specimen of the mammoth which we have now been considering: but we do not find that this specimen was covered with a coat of hair. Nor is it likely that so unusual a circumstance, had it existed, would have escaped particular remark and description by this philosopher.

To those who have well considered the condition of the earth at the period of the deluge, which has been so lately discussed, there can be no difficulty in accounting for the numerous fossil remains of tropical plants and animals every were found, more or less, in the upper strata of the globe; and that such remains should have been preserved entire in the frozen regions, towards which, I have shown, they would naturally be carried by some of the currents of the ocean, is only a consequence to be as naturally expected from such transportation. We must feel satisfied, that the elephant and rhinoceros would be, of all animals, the most likely to float longest, from their great bulk, and the strength and thickness of their skin.* If we follow the track which such large floating bodies must have taken, in a current flowing directly from the tropical to the northern latitudes; and if we consider that a very few weeks would, at the utmost, be necessary for their transport, as has been shown by the passage of a vessel, carrying little sail, over nearly 4000 miles in a similar course, in eleven days, we shall feel convinced of the possibility of their having been, in many instances, lodged in the icy regions of the north, with their skins entire, and their flesh and blood, consequently, preserved.

That those regions were then as cold as at the present day, is distinctly proved by the condition of the bodies themselves, which, with their icy covering, must be in exactly the same state as when embedded four thousand years ago. Why is it only in the colder regions that the flesh of these animals has been preserved, while in Britain, and in the other temperate climates, nothing but the bones remain, and generally in a detached and broken state? It is clear, that in the one case, the higher temperature of the soil has caused the decomposition of the softer parts; while in the other, the frozen state of the earth, at the depth of a foot or two, even in the heat of the short summers, has prevented decay;† and it must be equally evident, to an unprejudiced mind, that, in the course and prevalence of the waters upon the earth, and in so complete a wreck of animated beings, numberless bodies of every kind must have sunk and gone to pieces, and have become subject to the same laws of gravity and of fluids, by which we have seen that all movable bodies become classed and arranged in the bed of the ocean; while those that were floated off by more rapid portions of the currents, reached a higher latitude in a more entire state, where their subsequent preservation must have depended upon the temperature of the climates, where they became embedded.

It appears certain, then, that on the subsiding of the waters of the deluge into their new bed, the floating bodies, in the northern regions, must have been stranded on the gravelly and sandy bottom of what was formerly the bed of the antediluvian sea; that they were, in many cases, sunk at various depths in this soft soil, agitated as its surface must have been by the slowly retiring waters; that the inclemency of the north soon congealed into ice the moisture that was not quickly drained off upon the surface; and that the bodies so hermetrically sealed up, have remained in the precise condition in which they chanced to be, not only until our days, but will be preserved for any length of time, unless brought within the action of the atmosphere by the mechanical friction of rivers, or by other natural causes. It is also certain, that all other embedded bodies, such as vegetable produc-

* I have seen the highly interesting portion of the skin and hair of this specimen, which was sent to Sir Joseph Banks, and is now in the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons in London. The skin is fully half an inch in thickness, in its dry and hard state, and must have originally been nearly an inch thick, and of prodigious strength. The hair is of three kinds, probably taken from different parts of the body. The longest is about a foot in length, of the nature of a thick bristle, and black in colour. The tufts of the second are of a dark chesnut colour, about four or five inches long, and of about the coarseness of the mane of a horse. The third kind of hair is of a dirty yellowish tint, and not more than about an inch long, closely covering the skin at the roots of the longest coat. Upon the whole, this hair presents us with the idea of a very rough and shaggy animal, of a dark brown, or chesnut colour, approaching to black, and which must, indeed, have exhibited a frightful appearance.

† Reliq. Diluv. p. 185.

* In Siberia, there are found the fossil remains of buffaloes, of a very great size, and said to be larger than any existing known species. But this latter fact we have every reason to doubt. Mankind are at all times fond of the marvellous; and without recent bones, with which to make the comparison, those of the fossil buffaloe must appear very great. The fact is, that there are few quadrupeds of a more unwieldy growth, than the full grown buffaloe in its native tropical climate.

† In the frozen regions, and near the poles, the heat of the sun, even during an unceasing day of several months duration, has so little power, that, at whatever depths trials have been made, the fissures in the rocks have always been found filled with ice, as eternal as that on the tops of the highest mountains. M. Patrin, who spent many years in Siberia, found this to be the case, on descending the mines of that country.

"The antiseptical effect of cold, in the polar countries, on animal and vegetable substances, is such as to preserve them unchanged for a period of many years. An instance corroborative of this remark, is given by M. Bleau, who in his Atlas Historique, informs us, that the bodies of seven Dutch seamen, who perished in Spitzbergen, in 1635, were found twenty years afterwards in a perfect state, not having suffered the smallest degree of putrefaction."—"Wood, and other vegetable substances are preserved in a similar manner. Things of this nature have been met with in Spitzbergen, which have resisted all injury from the weather during the lapse of a century."—Scoresby's Arct. Reg. vol. ii. p. 344.

tions, would have been equally well preserved, both in substance, and in colour, had they existed in any great quantity, as in their natural soils; and, that as no such vegetable productions are found in the ice of the north, we must conclude, that the northern regions never were different in climate from what they are at present; and, consequently, that they have always been equally unfitted for the support of both the animal and vegetable world.*

The conclusion at which we thus unavoidably arrive, with respect to any ONE fossil body, in the condition of the mammoth in ice, at the mouth of the Lena, involves the history of almost all the fossil remains of quadrupeds found in the alluvial soils in every quarter of the world. For if we can, in any one instance, prove that a production of a southern latitude has been transported to one very far to the north, in so short a space of time as to have its most destructible parts perfectly preserved, we cannot stop short in our conclusions: we cannot suppose that to be a solitary instance. On the contrary, we must attribute all fossil remains, both of animals and vegetables, now found in climates uncongenial to them, to the powerful agency of the same mechanical law. What, then, becomes of the lions, tigers, hyænas, elephants, crocodiles, tortoises, and other animals of tropical regions, whose remains are now found in every land indiscriminately, and often in confused heaps, deeply buried, in what was once the muddy sediment of a deluge, but now hardened into calcareous or other secondary rocks, and worked into cavities probably in the course of dessication? Are we to conclude, from the entire elephant found near the pole, which we feel satisfied could not have lived within many degrees of latitude of where his remains were discovered, that all the polar and temperate latitudes of the earth were once inhabited by a class of beings now unnatural to them? or because palm trees and cocoa nuts are now found, in a fossil state, in the strata of Britain, that they formerly grew there?† No. We are forcibly and irresistibly drawn to a directly opposite conclusion, by the concurrent evidence both of history, and of physical facts. We must feel a conviction, as strong as is possible, in any case, of which we have not had occular proof, that the same mechanical power which transported the mammoth of the Lena from its natural climate, to its icy bed in the frozen zone, must have also brought along with it, all the various fossil productions found in climates which would now be uncongenial to their support.‡

By the same line of reasoning, we are led to the solution of what has been one of the leading subjects of discussion amongst philosophers for the last century; that is, the remarkable accumulation of fossil remains at Monte Bolca, near Verona, in Italy. This deposit may certainly be regarded as one of the most interesting now known; and from the attention which has been paid to it, and the care and expence bestowed upon the collection of its fossil treasures, there are few with which we are better acquainted. The district, of which Bolca forms a part, is calcareous, and the quarries in which the most remarkable impressions of fish are found, consist of a stone of a schistose structure, and susceptible of being split into laminæ, or flags, of various dimensions. It is called, by mineralogists, a marl, or marley schist, and is of a yellow, white, or bluish gray colour.

The most remarkable fossils of this deposit consist of fish, in a highly preserved state. In some collections that have been made from these quarries, there are from 600 to 800 specimens of various sorts, and of every size, from being almost invisible, up to four feet in length. Some of the species, which have, in all, been calculated at about 70, are recognized as being fish of the Mediterranean sea; others have been supposed to be now peculiar to the Pacific, and other southern waters. Some, however, are totally unknown.

This extraordinary deposit of fish has been the occasion of much speculation, and of many theories amongst naturalists, to account for its present elevation above the sea; and, like that of elephants in the polar regions, authors have endeavoured to account for it in various ways. The most generally received opinion is, though opposed by the most glaring inconsistencies, that, as a fish could not be so well preserved as those of Monte Bolca, unless thrown into their present position in a SUDDEN manner, their destruction must have been occasioned by a submarine volcano, before the great revolution happened, by which the present lands of Italy became elevated above the present seas.* It has been too often the custom to resort to volcanic agency, with regard to Italy in general, and to any such difficulties as were occasioned by Monte Bolca, in particular. The fact is, that few countries present more calcareous appearances than Italy; the greater part of the whole ridge of the Apennines, is composed of limestone and marbles of various kinds; and the existence of volcanic action, in such extensive secondary formations, as are found in Italy, exactly corresponds with what has been already remarked respecting volcanoes in general, and Iceland in particular, in an early part of this treatise. But about Verona, the whole country is calcareous, and Monte Bolca is admitted to be so, notwithstanding the above mentioned common opinion.

But we are led to the solution of this fossil mystery, by the same steps which guide us in our researches in other countries; and we thus find that Monte Bolca is only peculiar in the quantity and beauty of its specimens, and not in the manner in which they were deposited. When we hear of Monte Bolca, the idea of petrified fish instantly presents itself to the mind, so much more numerous are they, than other fossils. But other fossils, nevertheless, exist; and such as are totally inconsistent with volcanic origin, under the waters of the sea. The bones of huge elephants, stags, and bears, and likewise those of the intermediate tribe, the phocæ, have been discovered; besides many terrestrial plants, birds, and insects.

Here are evidences of diluvial origin, as clear as can be produced from any region of the earth; and the presence of the bones of elephants, or of other large quadrupeds, such as are found in the polar regions, surrounded, as in this instance, by marine animals, connect the two in a manner the most conclusive, and tend to the same point to which the Geology of Scripture, in all its parts, so consistently leads us. It is not, therefore, necessary, in such individual cases as we are now considering, to account for the accidental circumstances, which must have occasioned, in one instance, a preponderance of terrestrial, and in another, that of marine animal remains, in detached deposits. It is sufficient for the support of the general system which we are now considering, that,

* It is much to be regretted, that the countries in which these most interesting and well-preserved specimens of fossil animal remains are alone to be found, are so situated, as to be beyond the convenient reach of philosophic eyes. For, although we only hear of the huge remains of the larger animals, because they naturally make the greatest impression upon the uncivilized peasants who discover them, there can be no doubt that the frozen regions must contain many other equally interesting and highly preserved remains, lodged by the diluvial currents: and it is probable, that if any journey were undertaken to the shores of the Frozen Ocean, for the express purpose of such research, the discoveries would amply repay the enterprise and trouble bestowed on the undertaking.

† Upwards of 500 kinds of seeds and fruits, many of which are now confined to tropical climates, have been found in the diluvial deposits in the Isle of Sheppey, on the Thames; and they are there associated with numbers of animal remains, of elephants, and other tropical quadrupeds. In Professor Buckland's collection, at Oxford, there are fossil and recent cones, of immense size; the former from the Portland quarries, the latter from a tropical climate.

‡ "In the valley of the Arno, parts of the skeletons of at least a hundred hippopotami have been discovered. With these were also found, in great abundance, the remains of rhinoceros and elephant, together with those of horses, oxen, several species of deer, hyæna, bear, tiger, fox, wolf, mastodon, hog, tapir, and beaver; they are from animals of all ages, and one of the elephants could not have been a week old."—Reliquiæ Diluv. p. 182.

The latter part of the above passage, respecting an elephant of not more than a week old, is probably intended as conclusive evidence of its having been born in Italy. But it is obvious, that the overwhelming calamity which deprived its mother of life, in a tropical climate, could not be expected to respect its tender age, but would, on the contrary, transport its remains to the latitude of the banks of the Arno, with as little difficulty or pity, as those of the still smaller animals, whose remains are now associated with it.

* Amongst other proofs that the deposits in Monte Bolca were caused by a sudden revolution, we find an instance quoted, of a fish having another in its mouth, yet unswallowed; while others have the undigested remains of the stomach still visible. Had those instances related to land animals, instead of to fishes, who were naturally enjoying their own proper element, up to the very moment when the tides or the currents caused them to be suddenly overwhelmed by the muddy diluvial sediments, we should have at once acknowledged the force of the conclusion. But we have, in this, a remarkable proof, that a great proportion of the inhabitants of the deep must have been preserved alive at a time when almost all productions of the land were consigned to destruction. Had not this been the case, we must have found the fossil impressions of fish, in almost every direction, in our diluvial strata. But it is a well known fact, that fish, though abundant in some particular spots, are by no means common as fossils. In Dr. Buckland's fine cabinet of fossils, there is a good impression of a part of a large fish, with the scales of an undigested meal visible through the ribs. I believe this specimen is from Shotover, near Oxford, which has never been looked upon as a sudden formation.

in almost all instances of fossil remains of quadrupeds, the two are more or less blended together, and in a manner to lead to the instant conviction, that sea and land productions had, by some means or other, become indiscriminately confused; and that they were thus left in a dry state by the retiring waters, the action and circulation of which had been the agent in this unnatural combination. The Mosaic History is alone capable of clearing up the obscurity of such phenomena; and it does clear away all difficulties in a manner the most satisfactory to the reason and understanding.

It may almost be considered unnecessary to proceed further in the production of proofs of diluvial effects upon animal and vegetable productions at this eventful period. But our own country presents so many examples of the highest interest, which are in a great degree unknown to general readers, that some further account of them may be desirable.

All geologists are well acquainted with the rich mine of fossil remains along the east coast of England; and especially in the counties of Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, and Lincoln. An account of those on the coast of Norfolk has been kindly communicated to me by the Rev. James Layton, of Catfield, in that county, now resident at Sandwich, a distinguished collector of such fossil treasures; and as this account will serve to throw a great additional light upon the effects of diluvial action now under consideration, I shall proceed to lay it before my readers.

After describing the strata of blue clay, locally called mud cliffs, of which an interesting section is presented along that coast, exhibiting, in the clearest manner, the violent effects of some diluvial eddy, at that particular point, by the action of which the intermixture and contortions of the strata, as they were formed, took place; Mr. Layton proceeds as follows: "One remarkable feature in this compact blue clay, is a stratum of wood, exhibiting the appearance of a wood overthrown, or crushed in situ. At Paling, the stumps of trees seem now to be really standing; the roots are strong, spread abroad, and intermingling with each other: were a torrent to sweep away the mould from the surface of a thick wood, leaving the roots bare in the ground, the appearances would be exactly the same. This phenomenon occurs again at Hasborough, the line of crushed wood, leaves, grass, &c., frequently forming a bed of peat, extends just above low water mark. About this stratum are found numerous remains of mammalia: the horns and bones of at least four kinds of deer; the ox, the horse, hippopotamus, rhinoceros, and elephant. These fossil remains are found at Hasborough, and its neighbourhood, on the denuded clay shore: at Mundesley they are found in the cliff. The great mine, however, is in the sea, some miles from land, where there is an oyster bed, on a stratum of gravel, about six fathoms deep. The sea gains rapidly on this coast; two yards at least every year. We may, therefore, conclude, that the land once extended considerably beyond that bed; and that the stratum of fossils was left, because they were hard and heavy, while the mud and sand have been carried into deeper water.

"How far this bed of fossils extends, I cannot pretend to say; but in 1826, some fishermen, while dredging for soles on 'the Knowl,' a bank twenty miles off shore, brought up an entire tusk of an elephant, which is now in my possession; it is nine feet six inches long, one foot nine inches in its greatest circumference, and weighs 97 pounds. It is cornuform, and exactly resembles the tusks of the mammoth, said to have been found in the ice in Siberia.* The elephants must have been abundant. I have at least 70 grinders, of all sizes, from four laminæ to twenty; and so various in their features, that, at first, I fancied I could distinguish a dozen different species; but I now believe that they all belong to the same, and that most resembling the Asiatic. Those which I now have, are reserved from more than two hundred, which have been in my possession; and the oyster dredgers reported, that they had fished up immense quantities, and thrown them into deep water, as they greatly obstructed their nets. Amongst these fossils, that is, from the oyster-bed, are some supposed to be of a species of the whale.

"In 1820, an entire skeleton of the GREAT MASTODON was found at Horstead, near Norwich, lying on its side, stretched out, between the chalk and the gravel. A grinder was brought to me, (it is still in the possession of Dawson Turner, Esq. of Yarmouth;) but so long after it was discovered, that scarcely any other part of the animal could be preserved. The whole had been carried away with the chalk, and burnt for lime, or spread in minute fragments over the fields.*

"Perhaps, I should also tell you, that upon this compact blue clay, so rich in fossils, is generally, but not constantly, a stratum of light blue clay, varying in thickness up to four feet: this is always delicately laminated; often having the appearance of the leaves of a book when pressed on one side. Above this are sand, (frequently stratified,) brown clay, gravel, and chalk RUBBISH, intermingled, or alternating, and surmounted by a deep rich soil. These upper beds occasionally present FOSSIL SHELLS, probably from the crag stratum."

It is scarcely necessary to make any remark on the interesting and corroborative evidence of diluvial action, presented to us throughout every word of this singular and distinct account.

We here have every thing that the imagination can require, in painting the effects of a great DILUVIAL EDDY, collecting in its vortex an indiscriminate mixture of floating animal, vegetable, and marine productions, from every climate under heaven. The description of the washed state of the roots of the trees is particularly striking, as every one, who has seen a high land flood, bearing along its vegetable booty, must be familiar with the appearances which these fossil forests exhibit. But instead of single trees, we must endeavour to present to the mind's eye such floating and matted forests, as the wilds of America could still produce, in the event of a renewal of so awful a calamity; we must enlarge our views, in considering such vast effects; and imagine this portion of the diminishing waters of the deluge to be completely charged with a floating mass of objects, collected by the currents from "the four winds." We must endeavour to conceive, what mortal eye never saw, nor ever can see; and we shall then be fully able to elucidate and unravel the mystery which has so long overshadowed this awfully grand subject. The whole scene now presents itself to the imagination; and we are thus led to a period in the history of our native land, when its soft and chalky surface, for the first time, showed itself above the level of the waters; and when all its valleys and its basins first became the depositories of what we have so long speculated upon in darkness and in error, under the guidance of a false and theoretical philosophy. The same level of the waters, which deposited this mingled mass of organic destruction on the coasts of modern Norfolk, must have been extended over the whole of the south of England, and, also, over by far the greater part of the north. If we consider, on the great scale, the general structure of this southern portion of England, and follow out the formation of the chalk on which all these animal remains and diluvial strata repose, and below, or in which no quadruped, or vegetable substance has ever yet been discovered, we shall find, that from that very shore of Norfolk, and of the neighbouring counties of Suffolk, of Essex, and of Kent, ramifications of chalk, in the form of high bare downs, stretch from east to west, across the whole of this part of the kingdom; and in three well defined ridges, are known by the names of the Oxfordshire Hills, the Surrey Hills, and the Sussex Downs. Between each of these hilly ridges, on which little or no soil is to be found, excepting in the dips or hollows, which are invariably filled with stratified diluvial clay and gravel, we find extended plains of the richest soils, often of a depth which cannot easily be penetrated, and containing abundant animal and vegetable testimonies to their formation having taken place at the same destructive period when the strata of Norfolk became so charged with animal debris. To the north of the Oxfordshire hills, (one part of which, called Nettlebed, is considered the highest point of England, south of the Trent,) we find, in the vale of Oxford itself, numerous instances of the common diluvial strata, in the form of deep soil, gravel, clay of various kinds, and stratified rocks of a calcareous description, full of sea shells.

In one of these strata, the quarries opened up on the rising ground at Shotover, a few miles from Oxford, furnish a rich treasure of fossil animal remains; and it was from this place that one of the Saurian, or Crocodile tribe, was lately procured for the cabinet of Professor Buckland, on one of the bones of which a large OYSTER is seen attached, together with two fine ammonites, in their natural position. Those speaking witnesses of marine action could not have been produced on this fresh water animal, without its having been, for some time, subjected, like the bones of the mammoth mentioned by Cuvier, to the waters in which they naturally dwelt.

* The largest specimen of a fossil tusk that I have seen or heard of, it in the cabinet of Dr. Buckland, at Oxford, and was found at Rome. Is is but a small portion of what the whole has been, being not more than about two feet long; but, from its great size and straightness, it must have been of prodigious length, and of nearly four hundred weight. Its diameter is about 10 inches, and in its present decayed state, it much resembles a piece of fossil timber.

* For a further account of this fossil, see Chapter 12.

Now, if we suppose the level of the sea to have gradually, and in the course of weeks, sunk from the heights at Nettlebed, drifting off, as it fell, every movable substance, either animal, vegetable or mineral, into the lower levels, where they were submitted to the lateral action of the tides, and, consequently, arranged in stratified order, as has been before fully explained, and as always must happen in such cases; we shall have a clear and well defined idea of the effects observed in this and every other vale or plain in the south of England, formed almost invariably of the same materials and structure. By this means, we have a distinct conception of the London basin, situated between these same Oxfordshire hills, and the ridge of those of Surrey, to the south. By this means, we learn how the rich wealds of Kent, and of Sussex, came to be formed of such unfathomable depth of blue clay, marl, sand-stone, iron-stone, &c.; all reposing, in alternate strata, upon the chalk, which there can be no doubt extends below, from the Sussex Downs to the Surrey hills; and from these latter again, to those of Oxfordshire.*

By extending this line of reasoning to other parts of our own native country, and from thence carrying the mind's eye over the plains of France, of Germany, of Europe, and of the rest of the world, there is at once a full conviction presented to the reason, of the manner in which such uniform effects have been produced by so universal and prevailing a cause. The basins of Paris, of London, and of the Isle of Wight, so long the subjects of blind speculation and of error, must all have then received their load of fossil treasures; and then, also, might be seen the inflated and colossal forms of the animal kingdom, bending their gradual but certain courses towards their present icy beds in the Polar regions.

The work of destruction had at length been consummated; and the new dry lands were now to assume those forms and qualities, which experience shows us are so happily suited to the wants and comforts of postdiluvian generations.

CHAPTER XI.

The Cave of Kirkdale.—Dr. Buckland's Theory founded on its Fossil Remains.—Contradictory Nature of this Theory.—Fossil Bones from the Hymalaya Glaciers, and from the Heights of South America.—Natural mode for accounting for them.—The Habits of the Elephant.—His most perfect form.—His love of the Water, and of a swampy and woody Country.—Habits of the Rhinoceros.—Cuvier's Opinion of Fossil Remains.—Inconsistency of this Opinion.—Evidence of Astronomy.—Evidence from Fossil Trees.—Conclusive Nature of this Evidence.—Evidence derived from Peat Moss.—Foot-marks of Antediluvian Animals.—Scratches occasioned by the Diluvial Action.—Formation of Valleys.—Scripture alone capable of explaining these Evidences.

There probably never has appeared any geological work, that excited so much attention and interest at the time of its publication, as the Reliquiæ Diluvianæ of Professor Buckland; in which that excellent and learned geologist endeavours to account for the fossil remains found in our own island, of quadrupeds which are now confined to much more southern latitudes.

It is with the most sincere respect for the well-known talents of Professor Buckland, that I consider it a duty, in this place, and while considering this part of my subject, to advance any thing in opposition to one whose opinions are so influential in the geological world. But the whole theory, under the impression of which that work is written, is so directly opposed to what has now been advanced, that I feel it due to myself, as well as to my readers, to make some observations upon it; not only in the fair support of an opposite argument, but for the sake of advancing, in at least a nearer degree, towards the same great end, to which all such inquiries ought invariably to point.

After describing the remarkable and indiscriminate mixture of fossil bones, found in a cave at Kirkdale, in Yorkshire, in 1821, Dr. Buckland proceeds with the following remarks upon the general theory of the fossil remains of quadrupeds.

"It was probable, even before the discovery of this cave, from the abundance in which the remains of similar species occur in superficial gravel beds, which cannot be referred to any other than diluvial origin, that such animals were the antediluvian inhabitants, not only of this country, but generally of all those northern latitudes in which their remains are found: the PROOF, however, was imperfect, as it was possible they might have been drifted or floated hither by the waters, from the warmer regions of the earth; but the facts developed in this charnel-house of the antediluvian forests of Yorkshire, demonstrate that there was a long succession of years in which the elephant, rhinoceros and hippopotamus, had been the prey of the hyænas, which, like themselves, inhabited England at the period immediately preceding the formation of the diluvial gravel; and if they inhabited this country, it follows as a corollary, that they also inhabited all those other regions of the northern hemisphere, in which similar bones have been found under precisely similar circumstances, not mineralized, but simply in the state of grave bones, imbedded in loam, or clay, or gravel, over great part of northern Europe, as well as North America and Siberia."

"It is in the highest degree curious to observe, that four of the genera of animals, whose bones are thus widely diffused over the temperate, and even over the polar regions of the northern hemisphere, should at present exist only in tropical climates, and chiefly south of the equator; and that the only country in which the elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus and hyæna, are now associated, is in southern Africa. In the immediate neighbourhood of the Cape, they all live and die together, as they formerly did in Britain; whilst the hippopotamus is now confined exclusively to Africa, and the elephant, rhinoceros and hyæna, are diffused widely over the continent of Asia.

"To the question which here so naturally presents itself, as to what might have been the climate of the northern hemisphere, when peopled with genera of animals, which are now confined to the warmer regions, it is not essential to the point before me to find a solution. My object is, to establish the fact, that the animals lived and died in the regions where their remains are now found, and were not drifted thither by the diluvial waters from other latitudes."

In the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal, (in 1827,) a letter was published by Dr. Buckland, which he had received from Colonel Sykes, on the subject of hyænas dens in India; and the object of this publication was, to show the solidity of the foundation on which the professor's theory of the Kirkdale cave was built. This letter from India gives the exact description which we should naturally expect, of the earth, or hole of a carnivorous animal. A good many bones were found in it; but not more in proportion to the size of the animal, and the prey on which he usually feeds, than we always find in a fox's hole in our own country. I have lately had the pleasure of conversing with Colonel Sykes, and of discussing this, and other subjects of equal interest, connected with a tropical climate, and of the animals natural to it. His description of the hyæna is any thing but favourable to the theory of the cave of Kirkdale, even supposing that we had no stronger ground on which to combat it. He considers that the hyæna does not live in a gregarious manner; on the contrary, he never but once saw three full grown animals in the same hole; and he supposes that one of them was a young one, not yet expelled from the family, which always happens as soon as the young are able to shift for themselves. This is the well known habit of foxes and of wolves, between which, and the hyæna, there seems to be considerable similarity of character. Colonel Sykes inclines to think that they do not live so much in caves of a large size, as in fissures and burrows similar to fox earths; and that it is probable that they do not haunt even these, except when they have young; but lie out in the open country, or in the woods, as wolves are known to do.

* The form and structure of the weald of Kent and Sussex, are, indeed, truly worthy of our most attentive observation. In outward form, there is the greatest variety of hill and dale, without, however, in almost any instance, being provided with the brooks or rivers, which, in other circumstances, we should look for as certain in every hollow. This peculiarity is obviously occasioned by the nature and extent of the prevailing clay, which, in many instances, is unfathomable. It is not a little singular, that coal has not yet been discovered in the wealds of Kent; for, as the soils and strata are almost every where identical with those of many of our richest coal fields, there can be no reason given for its absence from the iron and sand stone strata which so much abound, than that the diluvial waters, in this particular locality, were not charged with the same floating vegetable masses which they have deposited in such abundance in other more favoured places.

In the earth which Colonel Sykes laid open, he chose one, which, from its beaten and used appearance, seemed a well established haunt; and in such a country as India, if such a haunt be not disturbed, or destroyed, it is probable that it may be so tenanted for many successive years. There was, however, no unusual quantity of bones; and such as were found, were of a very recent character. The abundance of teeth was entirely wanting; nor could I learn that there were any indications of hyænas, who had died of old age, having been devoured by their own species.

The learned professor then proceeds to state the differences of opinion that exist, on the subject of climate, amongst the highest authorities, and he mentions the opinion of Cuvier, that these animals probably had a constitution adapted to endure the rigours of a northern winter, which opinion was supported (and indeed was probably formed) by the "large quantity of wool" found, with the skeleton of an elephant, discovered in 1771, in the frozen gravel of Vilhoui.

He proceeds, however, with much candour, to state the opposing objections to such an idea, and to destroy both his own and Cuvier's theory, upon the very natural and unanswerable principle, that food could not have been found in those rigorous climates, proper for the sustenance of such large animals: he proceeds as follows; "for though the elephant and rhinoceros, if clothed in wool, may have fed themselves on branches of trees and brushwood, during the extreme severities of winter, still I see not how even these were to be obtained in the frozen regions of Siberia, which, at present, produce little more than moss and lichens, which, during great part of the year, are buried under impenetrable ice and snow; yet it is in those regions of extreme cold, on the utmost verge of the now habitable world, that the bones of elephants are found, occasionally crowded together in heaps, along the shores of the icy sea, from Archangel to Behring's Straits, FORMING WHOLE ISLANDS, COMPOSED OF BONES AND MUD, at the mouth of the Lena, and ENCASED IN ICE,* from which they are melted out by the solar heat of the short summer, along the coasts of Tungusia, in sufficient numbers to form an important article of commerce."—Reliq. Diluv. p. 46.

In concluding this fundamental part of his subject, on which, indeed, Dr. Buckland had before admitted that his whole theory entirely depended, he proceeds: "Between these two conflicting opinions," (viz. either that of Cuvier, that the animals had a constitution fitted to a colder climate; or that of other philosophers, who supposed the climates, now so inclement, to have been formerly warm, and the change to have suddenly taken place by an alteration in the inclination of the earth's axis, or by the near aproach of a comet;†) "between these two conflicting opinions, we are compelled," says Dr. Buckland, "to make our choice; there seems to be no third or intermediate state with which both may be compatible. It is not, however, my purpose to discuss the difficulties that will occur on both sides, till the further progress of geological science shall have afforded us more ample information, as to the structure of our globe; and have supplied those data, without which all opinions that can be advanced on the subject must be premature, and amount to no more than plausible conjectures. AT PRESENT, I AM CONCERNED ONLY TO ESTABLISH TWO IMPORTANT FACTS; first, that there has been a recent and general inundation of the globe; and, secondly, that the animals, found in the wreck of that inundation, were natives of high northern latitudes, and not drifted to their present place from equatorial regions, by the waters that caused that inundation."—Reliq. Diluv. p. 47.

The most remarkable feature in this part of the work of Dr. Buckland, is the very loose, and even contradictory reasoning, to be found throughout the above quotations. In one part, he considers it as positively proved, that the animals, whose bones are now found in Yorkshire, inhabited England "at a period immediately preceding the formation of the diluvial gravel in which they are embedded;" and that "IF they inhabited England, it followed as a corollary, that they also inhabited all the other regions of the north, in which similar bones have been found;" and yet he soon after states, that he "cannot see how even branches of trees and brushwood were to be obtained for their support, in climates now producing nothing but moss and lichens, which are covered with impenetrable ice during the greater part of the year."

The fact is evident, that the contradictory difficulties of such a theory were not concealed from the searching mind of the learned professor; who, however, leaves the whole question precisely in the same unstable condition, in which the mind is left bewildered by the theories of first formations by secondary causes. He admits the evident and close connexion between the fossil remains of quadrupeds, found in all countries; but though he sees the utter hopelessness of ever being able to provide the necessary food for elephants in the polar regions, he yet casts aside this insuperable difficulty, and twice presses the two important facts HE IS MOST CONCERNED TO PROVE, regardless of the contradiction in which he must, unavoidably, become involved in the attempt. I cannot agree with the learned professor, that the subject of climate, and, consequently, of food, was of secondary importance in the support of his theory; and there surely may be better means of "establishing the fact, that animals lived in the regions where their remains are now found," than by showing the impossibility of their finding the necessary food, which the professor not only perceived, but very candidly admitted.*

But the above reasoning of Dr. Buckland must appear the more remarkable, from his having, in a subsequent part of the Reliquiæ Diluvianæ, and in the course of most ably proving the inundation of high levels, fully admitted the principle of transportation, or drifting of animal remains, as the only possible means of accounting for the fossil bones found in the high elevations of Asia and America, and in the avalanches from the regions of perpetual snow. "With regard to the bones of animals," says he, "that perished by this great inundation, although they have not yet been discovered in the high Alpine gravel beds of Europe, (which is but a negative fact,) we have, in America, the bones of the mastodon, at an elevation of 7800 feet above the sea, in the Champ des Géants, near Santa Fe de Bogota; and another species of the same genus in the Cordilleras, found by Humboldt at an elevation of 7200 feet, near the volcano of Imbarbura, in the kingdom of Quito. If the animal remains of this era have not yet been discovered at such heights as these, in Europe, let it be recollected, that we have no elevated mountain plains like those in America; that our highest mountains are but narrow peaks, and ridges of small extent, when compared with the low country that surrounds them; and that if it were proved (which it is not) that the animals inhabited these highest points, it is more than probable that their carcases would have been drifted off, as the greater mass of their gravel has been, into the lower levels of the adjacent country.

"But in central Asia, the bones of horses and of deer have been found at an elevation of 16,000 feet above the sea, in the Hymalaya mountains.† The bones, I am now speaking of,

* In order to trace such islands of bones and mud encased in ice, to their true origin, we have only to imagine the same kind of scene as we have just been contemplating on the coasts of Norfolk. And in order to disprove so obvious a cause, or to show that such effects are produced in the common course of things, as some have supposed, it must be shown in what part of the world such deposits ever now take place, and by what possible event the destruction of so prodigious a number of elephants, and other large quadrupeds, could, at any one time, have been effected: for it must be evident, that, had the mud cliffs of Norfolk been formed in the polar regions, we must have had the natural addition of ice, wherever they are now saturated with water.

† It was a part of the theory of La Place, in his Systeme du Monde, that the stroke of a passing comet was the most probable cause of the Mosaic deluge. But, at the same time, he endeavours to allay those fears which were then, as now, so common, of a repetition of so dreadful an accident, upon the principle of the improbability of such a chance, in so wide a space as the heavenly bodies have to move in. How strange it is to find so great a mind incapable of appreciating the provident wisdom of an Almighty Creator, and conceiving that such supposed events were left to the guidance of chance!

* "Though the soil of the whole of that remote country (Spitzbergen) does not produce vegetables suitable or sufficient for the nourishment of a single human being, yet its coasts and seas have afforded riches and independence to thousands."

"The only plant I met with in Spitzbergen, partaking of the nature of a tree, (a salix, allied to the S. herbacea,) grows but to the height of three or four inches."—Scoresby's Arctic Regions.

† Dr. Buckland has given an interesting note from Gilbert's Annalen, 1821, in which a discovery by Lieutenant Kotzebue is described as follows: "On the western part of the gulf, to the north of Behring's Straits, a mountain was discovered covered with verdure, (moss and grass,) composed interiorly of solid ice. On arriving at a place where the shore rises almost perpendicularly from the sea to the height of 100 feet, and continues afterwards to extend with a gradual inclination, they observed masses of the purest ice 100 feet high, preserved under the above vegetable carpet. The soil is only about half a foot thick, and is composed of a mixture of clay, earth, and mould.

The portion of the cliff exposed to the sun was melting, and sending much water into the sea. An undoubted proof of this ice being primitive (i. e. not formed by any causes now in action) is afforded are at the Royal College of Surgeons in London, and were sent home last year (1822,) to Sir Everard Home, by captain W. S. Webb, who procured them from the Chinese Tartars of Daba; who assured him that they were found in the north face of the snowy ridge of Kylas, in latitude 32 degrees, at a spot which captain Webb calculates to be not less than 16,000 feet high: they are only obtained from masses that fall with the avalanches, from the regions of perpetual snow, and are, therefore, said by the natives to have fallen from the clouds, and to be the bones of genii."*

"The occurrence of these bones, at such an enormous elevation, in the regions of eternal snow, and, consequently, in a spot now unfrequented by such animals as the horse and the deer, can, I think, be explained only by supposing them to be of antediluvian origin, and that the carcasses of the animals were drifted to their present place, and lodged in sand by the diluvial waters."†

"This appears to me the most probable solution that can be suggested; and should it prove the true one, it will add a still more decisive fact to those of the granite blocks, drifted from the heights of Mont Blanc to the Jura, and the bones of diluvial animals, found by Humboldt, on the elevated plains of South America, to show that 'all the high hills, and the mountains under the whole heavens, were covered,' at the time when the last great physical change took place, over the surface of the whole earth."—Reliquiæ Diluvianæ, p. 222.

Now, it must be considered not a little singular, that this distinguished writer should at once admit the drifting of animal remains into the regions of perpetual snow, occasioned by elevation in the atmosphere; and, at the same time, deny the same mode of transport to those found in such abundance in the equally unnatural regions of eternal ice, occasioned by their polar elevation. It must be evident, that the two cases are perfectly similar. For, in order to elevate those fossil bodies, found in the mountains of Asia, they must have floated on the surface of the waters; and, in order to effect the transport of such bodies to high latitudes, there was only required that power of currents, which may be (and, I trust, has been,) proved to exist at all times over the whole surface of the ocean. But this is only one of the many difficulties and contradictions which must occur in the course of supporting a theory so wide of the truth. One difficulty, for example, would be removed, with regard to the cave of Kirkdale, and other similar caves, in many parts of Europe, if we could hear, from the Cape, of any one instance of a hyæna's den, furnished in the same remarkable manner as the cave of Kirkdale in Yorkshire;‡ and there, surely, could be no great difficulty in doing this in our own colony at the Cape, "in the immediate neighbourhood of which the elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, and hyæna, are now associated, and live and die together, as they formerly did in Antediluvian Yorkshire." We have many anecdotes and amusing accounts of all these animals, in the travels of that indefatigable sportsman, M. Le Vaillant, in that very part of Africa; but from his silence, and that of other naturalists, on this alleged habit of hyænas of amassing, from age to age, the broken remains of the very food they are said to be most fond of, we have the greatest reason to doubt that such a thing ever occurs. Both the elephant and rhinoceros are described by that author as swimming well, and being exceedingly fond of the water; rolling themselves in swamps for the purpose of defending their bodies from the flies by a thick coating of mud; and feeding on branches of trees torn from a height which no other animal can reach. But it seems unnecessary to search further into the difficulties and contradictions in which we become involved by adopting the theory of Dr. Buckland, on this highly important subject.

The following observations on the natural history of the Asiatic elephant may be found both amusing and instructive, while we are considering the nature and habits of that race of animals. They are taken from that most amusing work, "The Wild sports of the East," by Captain Williamson; and though the general tenor of that and of similar writings, may, by some, be deemed frivolous, and uncongenial to the pursuits of the man of science and the philosopher, yet it must be kept in mind that, however the information obtained from such sources may be digested in the closet, it is from the tented field, with the sportsman and the native savage, that our first knowledge of these noble animals of tropical climates must originally be derived; and it may be, with justice, asserted of the beautiful work in question, that if all sportsmen in foreign countries could convey the results of their exhilirating pursuits, with the same intelligence and judgment, we should soon have a fund of most instructive information upon many points in natural history, of which we have yet much to learn.

Captain Williamson's account of a perfect elephant is as follows:

"An elephant should have an arched back, a broad barrel, the hind quarters full and square, the hind legs short and firm, the toe nails thick and black; and, to please a native, there should be five on each forefoot, and four on each hind foot;—odd numbers are considered by them unlucky. I have known some with 15 nails, which no one would purchase; and I have heard of one with 20; but never saw one with more than 18. The tail should be long, very thick at the insertion, and tapering well towards the end, where it should be well furnished on each side with a row of single hairs, or rather bristles, for about a foot, forming a fork at the end, and resembling the feathers or wings of an arrow. This circumstance respecting the tail is considered by the natives perfectly indispensable; for a short tail, or a broken one, or a want of hair at the termination, are formidable objections. No man of consequence would be seen on an elephant whose tail was devoid of hair; and particularly if broken short, as is frequently the case. This latter deficiency is owing to a habit elephants have, in a wild state, of seizing each other by the tail, with their trunks, and twisting them off sometimes very close to the croup. Even servants of inferior degree are averse to ride on an elephant so blemished. The chest should be wide and full, the fore legs muscular and well turned; the forehead broad, and ornamented between the eyes, with a protuberance gracefully harmonizing with the surrounding parts. The top of the head should be thickly set with hair, carried high and square; the trunk thin, and very elastic; the teeth of males should be exactly alike, thick and long; they should diverge from each other, so as to be rather more distant at the tips, than at the insertion; and with a graceful curve. The ears should be large, and free from raggedness at the edges; the cheeks full; and, above all things, the eyes clear of specks and rheum."

An elephant, having all these rare perfections, and from nine to ten feet high, is worth 8 or 10,000 rupees, or upwards of £1000.

"Elephants are generally black; but few of them entirely so; many are sprinkled over the ears, trunk, jowl, shoulders, and legs, with dun coloured spots, which are far from displeasing. The Nabob Vizier had one, which was called white; but it was really dun. It was unique in Bengal; but I have been informed that in Ceylon they are by no means rare."

"In some years, very few wild elephants can be found near the sea coast, whence they retire into the immense jungles which lie between Chittagong, and the Chinese frontier. At other times, the coasts are overrun with them, to the utter ruin of the peasants, whose crops and plantations are often destroyed in the course of one night. This gene-by the great number of bones and teeth of mammoths, which make their appearance when it is melted."—Reliq. Diluv. p. 46.

* I have had much pleasure and the highest interest in the examination of these bones; they appear decidedly to have been embedded in lime-stone rock, of a gray colour; they are much broken, though not taken from a hyæna's den, and the hollows of some are filled with the most beautiful crystals. In others, these crystals have filled up the whole cavity with pure gypsum, of the whitest colour. It seems, then, probable, that the masses of rock in which they were embedded at the deluge, were torn from their lofty situations by the avalanches, as in our European Alpine heights: the bones are not easily assigned to their proper species, but one is evidently that of the horse.

† Mr. Temple, in his light and amusing sketches of Peru, describes some fossil bones found in the province of Tarija. They proved to be those of an animal of the elephant tribe, and probably the mastodon.

He says, "It is a subject of interest to inquire how these monstrous animals came into the valley of Tarija, surrounded, as it is, by a mountainous rampart, accessible, as I have been credibly informed, in only four places, and those with great difficulty, even to mules and horses. Over three of those places, the most frequented and most convenient in the whole rocky barrier, I have myself travelled, and certainly I do not think it possible that any elephant could have there passed."—Travels in Peru, vol. ii. p. 295.

‡ A collection of the fossil bones of quadrupeds has lately been discovered in a lime-stone cave in Wellington Valley, in New Holland. One of the bones was submitted to the inspection of the late Baron Cuvier, who ascertained that it was the thigh bone of a young elephant. We thus find that this new continent forms no exception to that general rule which is applicable to the other great continents of the earth; and that, though elephants have not yet been found there in a living state, their fossil remains bear testimony to the same transporting powers, which are so distinctly traced in our own more northern latitudes.

rally happens in a dry season, when want of water, and of succulent herbage, in the interior, causes the herds to descend to the ever verdant plains bordering the sea, where the diurnal breezes inspire fresh vigour."

"Nature has wisely proportioned her animal to her vegetable productions. Thus we find the districts furnishing elephants, replenished with immense tracts of high grass, and abounding in lakes and streams; without such ample stores, such stupendous animals as the elephant must perish. For, exclusive of the large quantity of grass, &c. which an elephant daily consumes, his broad feet will destroy immense qantities. As to his thirst, which requires both frequent and copious libations, the ordinary puddles, such as furnish a supply for cattle, would by no means answer. The elephant, like the buffaloe, DELIGHTS IN WALLOWING, and never thrives so well, as when he is allowed to visit a rapid stream, there to exercise himself in swimming, as well as to lie immersed in the water."

"Chittagong elephants, growing to a much larger size than those to the North, or Nepaul district, and being of a more substantial form, are peculiarly valuable to those who catch elephants with the slip knot, or phaun. The only objection is, their want of speed. They are more healthy after being seasoned to the climate of the Nepaul country, while the native elephants of that northern climate are extremely deficient, not only in the three grand points, viz. stature, strength and beauty, but in constitution also. Hence they are of much less value than those of Chittagong, Tipperah, and Silhet."*

"The Ceylon breed far exceeds that of the continent; and it becomes a curious and interesting question whence Ceylon was first furnished with elephants, there being none on the opposite shores, nor to be found in all the great peninsula, from the west bank of the Ganges to the Persian Gulf! Besides, the generality of the Ceylon elephants are of a brown, or dun colour."

"Elephants are natives of a wet soil, and, in the wild state, feed on very watery aliments. They also take great delight in ranging among swamps."

"They rarely exceed nine feet in height. The tallest ever found in Bengal, was the Paugul, or mad elephant, (about 1780). It was nearly 12 feet high; but the medium size is from seven to eight feet."

There is no definite mark by which the age of the elephant can be known. We can only judge by his general appearance.

While we are thus instructed, by this active and intelligent sportsman, on the subject of the elephant in its wild state, I shall here also extract the few particulars he was enabled to give, on the subject of the haunts of the rhinoceros, an animal whose remains are also now found in a fossil state in the northern and temperate regions, and frequently in the same situations, though never in the same abundance as those of the elephant. We shall find that this wild and very mischievous and savage animal is equally a native of the hottest and most wooded countries; and we, therefore, come to the same conclusion with regard to it, that we have reached with regard to the various races of elephants, viz. that it never could have been the inhabitant of a very cold climate.

"The rhinoceros is an animal whose natural history is very imperfectly known. He resides in impervious jungles and swamps; he is seldom to be found on the west of the Ganges, though the jungles there are fully competent to afford abundant shelter; nor, indeed, has an elephant ever been seen in a wild state, but to the east of that noble stream. It would seem that these animals are partial to the immense tracts of the surput, or tassel grass, which skirts the vast jungles bordering our possessions on that side; and which, being composed of lofty forests of saul and sissoo trees, filled up with various sorts of underwood, offer an asylum to the ferine species, such as cannot be equalled in any part of Europe, and can be compared only with the prodigious wilds of the American interior."

The rhinoceros is never seen in herds, nor often even in pairs. He may, therefore, be properly termed, like the largest wild boars, and the oldest chamois, a solitaire.

* Here we have it distinctly shown, that, even within the tropics, the elephant is in his most natural climate, in the hottest parts; and if the constitution of the animal, in its wild state, cannot be fully sustained in regions of the most luxuriant vegetation, but subject to occasional slight frosts, how are we to suppose, for a moment, that elephants could have lived in the temperate or frozen regions of the earth?

We may now shortly pass under review the opinions of the late Baron Cuvier, on the subject of fossil remains. This able philosopher has long been considered the head of the scientific world on the continent; and his indefatigable research, and wonderful anatomical knowledge, have given him the highest claims to our esteem and regard in many branches of geological research. We have already found, however, that his theories of the earth, and of the numerous revolutions to which he supposed it had been subjected, were not founded on what history teaches, or physical facts bear witness to; and, therefore, we cannot be surprised, if we find, on the subject of fossil remains, some portion of that contradiction and inconsistency which must always attend a departure, however well meant and unintentional, from the direct and simple path of truth.

On the subject of the fossil elephant, as published in his "Ossemens Fossiles," vol. i. p. 199, &c. Cuvier designates it "The Mammoth of the Russians, (Elephas primigenius, Blum.) or elephant with prolonged cranium, concave forehead, very deep sockets for the tusks; lower jaw obtuse; grinders very large, parallel, and marked with narrow stripes.

"The bones of this animal are only found in a fossil state: they are in great numbers in many countries, but better preserved in the north than elsewhere. It resembled the Indian rather than the African species. It differed, however, from the former in the grinders, in the form of the lower jaw, and in many other bones, but especially in the length of the sockets for the tusks. This latter character must have modified, in a remarkable manner, the form and organization of the trunk, and have given him an appearance much more dissimilar to the Asiatic elephant, than could be expected from the general resemblance of the rest of the bones. It appears that his tusks were generally large, often more or less bent in a spiral form, and pointing outwards. His size was not much greater than that which the Asiatic race sometimes attains; and he appears to have had, in general, a more thick and solid form. We cannot determine what was the size of his ears, nor the colour of his skin, but it is certain, that at least some of the species had two sorts of hair; viz. a reddish wool, coarse and bushy, with stiff black hairs, which, upon the neck, and along the back, were pretty long, and formed a sort of mane.

"Thus, there is not only nothing impossible in his having been able to support a degree of cold, in which the Asiatic race would die; but it is even probable, that he was so constituted, as to prefer cold climates. His bones are usually found in the upper alluvial beds of the earth; and most commonly in those which fill the hollows of valleys, or which form the beds of rivers.

"They are scarcely ever alone, but pêlemêle, together with the bones of other quadrupeds of known kinds, as rhinoceros, ox, antelope, horse, and frequently with the remains of marine animals, such as shells, &c., some of which are even fixed upon them.

"The positive testimony of Pallas, of Fortis, and of others, admits not of a doubt with respect to this latter circumstance, although it is not invariable. I have now, myself, under my eye, a portion of a jaw, loaded with millepores, and with small *oysters.

"The bones of elephants are rarely petrified; and we know of but one or two instances in which they are embedded in shell limestone or other rock." (Such instances are as good as thousands, for the purpose of showing how they become thus embedded.)

"Every thing, then, announces, that the cause of their destruction was one of the most recent of those events which have contributed to change the surface of the globe. It was, however, a physical and general cause. That cause was an aqueous agent.

"But it was not these waters which transported them to the places where they now are. An irruption of the sea, which would only have brought them from where the Indian elephants now inhabit, could not have spread them to such a distance, nor dispersed them so equally."

It would appear from this remark of Cuvier, that he had no belief in the general and total immersion of the whole dry lands of the earth, at the period of the deluge; and he must, therefore, probably have considered the Mosaic account of "all the hills, upon the whole earth, being covered," as a mere piece of Eastern allegory. Such "irruptions of the sea," as he had in view in the above remark, must have been considered as only partial convulsions, and producing such partial effects as he there alludes to. Had he believed in a general aqueous covering over the whole globe, for the space of several months, and had he then considered the laws of nature, acting, in this flood of waters, on the floating bodies of the animal world, by tides and CURRENTS, this able naturalist and philosopher could not but have perceived, that it was ONLY by such means, that so "equal a dispersion" of animal remains could possibly have been effected.

* In the splendid collection of fossils of Dr. Buckland, at Oxford, there is a highly interesting specimen of one of the crocodile tribe, obtained from the quarry at Shotover, near that city, and several hundred feet above the level of the sea; on one of the bones of which there is a large oyster attached; and also two beautiful and perfect specimens of the ammonite, with the shell entire, and seemingly fixed to the bone by suction, as a snail adheres to a stone or plant.

After some other equally unsatisfactory reasoning, Cuvier expresses his idea of the impossibility of entire carcasses having been transported to such distances by violence.

"It is true," says he, "that in such a case, the bones would have been unworn by friction; but then they would have remained together, and not been found so scattered as they now often are.

"Every thing then renders it extremely probable, that the elephants to which these fossil bones belonged, inhabited the countries where we now find their remains. They were there scattered, as the bones of horses and of other animals now are, over our own lands, the carcasses of which are found in our fields."*

"But, whatever that cause was, it must have been a SUDDEN ONE. The bones, so perfectly preserved in the plains of Siberia, could only have been so from the effect of cold. If this cold had only come on by degrees and slowly, the bones, and especially the softer parts, would have had time to become decomposed, like those we now find in our fields."

The remark cannot here be omitted, how contradictory is the reasoning of the baron in this place. He first considers, that the bones of the animals must have been scattered over the country, like those of our domestic cattle, in the present day; and ought to have been "decomposed, like those we now find in our fields;" and then proceeds to show, that they are not decomposed, but preserved entire by a sudden convulsion, and excessive low temperature. We seldom find, in our own times, and in our inland counties, the bones of cattle covered with OYSTERS, or other sea animals. But if we suppose a bone, or an entire animal, to remain for a few weeks, subject to the action of the tides and of the currents, we should not be surprised at finding upon it, what every piece of floating wreck is generally covered with.

"It would have been especially impossible for the carcase seen and described by Mr. Adams, to have preserved its flesh and its skin ENTIRE, if it had not been IMMEDIATELY enveloped in the ICE in which it was found." We must here pause one moment in our perusal of Cuvier's argument, to consider what effect would have been produced by this SUDDEN formation of an icy bed, on the woods and jungles through which this shaggy monster must naturally have been wandering, when embraced and sealed up by so SUDDEN a disaster. The same element which had so preservative an effect upon his unwieldy carcase, must have entirely decomposed or evaporated the vegetable productions on which he fed; as they are no where to be found in any part of the frozen regions, even preserved in ice.

"Thus," continues he, "the hypothesis of a gradual cooling of the globe, or of a slow variation of its temperature, either from inclination, or from the position of its axis, falls to the ground by its own weight."

We may here remark, that this groundless hypothesis was proposed by Buffon, as we have already had occasion to notice.

"The various mastodons, hippopotami, rhinoceri, &c., must have inhabited the same countries and the same districts, as the fossil elephants, since we find their bones in the same situations, and in the same condition. One cannot imagine any cause which would have destroyed the one and spared the other. And yet the first, most certainly, no longer exist, as we shall show in subsequent chapters."

"The elephant is the existing animal which most resembles the mastodon; and may serve as the principle object of comparison. In short, I call mastodon, quadrupeds of the size and form of the elephant, having, like him, a trunk, and long tusks; the feet of the same structure; and, in a word, only differing in an essential manner in the molar teeth, which, instead of being formed of transversal laminæ, had a simple crown, and were furnished with tubercles or rounded points, more or less numerous, and more or less prominent.

"Our continents do not now nourish any animals of this exact kind; although the upper strata contain the bones of three or four different varieties."—Ossemens Fossiles, vol. i. chap. ii. p. 205.

Such are the ideas of Baron Cuvier on the subject of the fossil elephant: and as it may be truly said, that the whole question of fossil remains, and, consequently, many of the most important and fundamental points in geology in general, turn upon the true and consistent history of those elephants now found in northern latitudes, it cannot be considered irrelevant to our purpose, to have gone, at considerable length, into the opinions of some of the great leaders of science on so fundamental a subject. To all who have considered, with an unprejudiced mind, the course and tendency of the arguments which have been urged, in opposition to these generally received theories on the subject of tropical productions in polar regions, it must appear unnecessary, in this place, to proceed further with the subject. It has been clearly shown, that no elephant could possibly find subsistence in those inclement and barren regions at the present time. It is equally clear, that had a SUDDEN change of temperature, with an irruption of the sea, overwhelmed and frozen up the animal productions of the antediluvian world, in what are now the polar regions, we must equally have discovered, in the ice which has preserved them, a perfect and entire series of the vegetable productions, amongst which, it is admitted, they must have lived, and without which there is no conceivable way of accounting for the supply of food necessary for such vast numbers of gigantic animals. When we add to this incontrovertible point, the consistent and natural method by which those animal bodies might have been transported, by an agent in the common laws of nature, to which the waters of the earth have been subjected by the Creator, for a great and benificent purpose, we cannot retain a doubt as to the actual means by which those larger animals were conveyed to their icy beds in the polar regions; and having arrived at this conclusion, with respect to those now found within the arctic circle, we have every right to judge, by the same line of reasoning, concerning all other tropical productions in unnatural climates, on every part of the surface of the earth; and, consequently, that the globe has undergone no material change in its position, nor in its temperature, since the creation.

Our inquiries have, it is to be hoped, led us to a consistent and natural conclusion on the whole question of fossil remains; and we thus find, that in adopting the system of geology, grounded on the Inspired History, and so strongly supported by the evidence of physical facts, instead of those philosophical theories, founded on physical facts, but rejecting the evidence of Scripture; the current of the narrative runs smoothly along, and our minds feel satisfied, and at rest, instead of being constantly suspended in doubt and uncertainty.

If we come to the conclusion, that all the present dry lands of the earth were formerly the bed of the antediluvian sea, and that Britain was no exception to this, (as is evident from the appearances every where visible around us,) it must follow as a corollary, that all the fossil remains of quadrupeds, whether in our upper soils, or in the upper strata of rock, over the whole earth, must have been lodged in their present situations by the waters of that destructive deluge, of which we have now been treating.*

* I have been informed by Colonel Sykes, than whom we can have no higher authority on such a subject, from his long residence in the East, and the great attention and ability which he has displayed on every subject connected with science, that, as far as his observation goes, it may be looked upon as a striking and extraordinary fact, that in the forests of India, peopled as they are by thousands of animals of every size, and of which there must naturally be a considerable annual destruction as well as increase, the bones, or other remains of the dead, are scarcely ever to be seen. We cannot, indeed, wonder that this should be the case, when we consider the laws of nature, by which so just a balance is at all times kept up. In so hot a climate as that of the tropics, the decay of the softer parts must be most rapid; and in order to obviate the bad consequences which would attend this natural course, we find myriads of the insect tribe at all times ready to remove what the birds and beasts of prey cannot readily consume. A large animal body, therefore, would almost entirely disappear in the course of a few days; and even the bones must soon become decomposed under the powerful action of so hot an atmosphere. It is almost proverbial even in our own woods, well stocked as they are with hares and other game, how seldom we discover any indication of natural death. In the animal world, in every climate, each individual becomes the prey of his fellow, for "dust we are, and unto dust we soon return."

* Since writing the above, one of the most remarkable works of our times has appeared, in which we find the following passage:—

SUPPLEMENTARY PART TO CHAPTER XI.

Since entering upon the subject of the Geology of Scripture, the evidences in support of the general principles, which have been explained in the foregoing chapters, have so crowded upon my observation, that I have experienced some difficulty in confining myself within those limits which I had previously laid down, in order to bring my work within the compass of one single volume. In a late journey which I have had occasion to make throughout a great part of the longitudinal extent of the kingdom, I have found, in every direction, the most complete corroborative proofs of the solid foundation on which the Scripture system is constructed. Amongst many of these proofs, I cannot resist the present opportunity, of giving some short account of a few of the most remarkable; the particular importance of which must at once be acknowledged by every candid student in this interesting science. I allude particularly to the subject of entire fossil trees, frequently, of late, discovered in the coal strata; and to that of the foot-marks of animals distinctly imprinted upon the sand when in a soft state, and discovered on the upper surface of the strata in several free-stone quarries.

The instances of entire fossil stems of trees, and numerous smaller plants, have long been remarked in the coal formations in various countries; and have, also, been noticed in the former part of this work. But the stems of the larger plants have, hitherto, in general, been observed to lie in the same direction as the strata themselves; and, consequently, they could afford us little or no indication of the period at which they were embedded, or of the time necessary for their having become surrounded by their present mineral envelope. Late observations, however, have thrown a new and vivid light upon this hitherto obscure subject. Trees, of very considerable size, have been found, placed in a position perpendicular to the direction of the beds or strata, and intersecting many of these, of various kinds and thickness. One of the first that attracted particular notice in the North, was found in Cragleith free-stone quarry, in 1826, where the different visible strata exist to the extent of 160 feet in depth; and upwards of 60 feet more are known to lie below, which have not yet seen the light of day.

The stone in this immense quarry is of very white and pure-grained quality, and is the same which we find forming the roof of the coal beds in many of the Lothian collieries. It is every where, more or less, marked with impressions of leaves and stems, which are, in this case, however, far from the coal seams, but the latter of which invariably present a thin surrounding mass of the purest jewel coal, generally about a quarter of an inch round the bark; the whole of the rest of the interior being filled with the same mineral in which it is embedded. These fossil stems are called, by the miners, coal pipes, ignorant as they are of their real nature. This small portion of the purest coal, serves to give us considerable insight into the nature of the larger beds of this fossil production, which are evidently the consequence of great pressure, and some chemical process, connected with the nature of the wood itself, with which, however, we have, as yet, no acquaintance. In 1830, a second and more remarkable fossil tree was exposed to view in this quarry; and excited, from its particular position, a degree of interest which no other vegetable fossil could before lay claim to. Its total length was upwards of 60 feet; and at angle of about 40 degrees, it intersected 10 or 12 different strata of the sand-stone. Its diameter at the top was about seven inches; and it had become flattened by pressure near its base, in such a manner as to measure five feet, in its greater, and two feet in its lesser diameter. There were no branches, nor marks of them on its bark; nor were there any roots, although the lower part formed a species of bulb. As in the former specimen, the bark had been converted into a thin coat of the purest and finest coal; and the whole, as it lay exposed in the quarry, presented the appearance of charred wood, forming a striking contrast in colour with the white stone in which it lay.

Before making any remarks upon the important evidence depending on this fossil, I shall describe some other instances, which have come within my knowledge, of trees standing in an upright or slightly sloping position, and intersecting a great variety of strata.

In a colliery, near Dalkeith, which I lately inspected, I found a stem of nearly two feet in diameter, proceeding out of the floor of the coal seam, passing through the coal itself, and entering the roof above. In the floor, and in the roof, it was petrified, whilst, in passing through the coal stratum, it had become one mass of pure coal, and its shape was with difficulty distinguished. How far its top or roots extended could not be ascertained; but it is probable that it was of much greater length than met the eye.

In Cullelo sand-stone quarry, near Aberdour, in Fife, numbers of trees are found, supposed to be of the palm-tribe, and often intersecting the strata in the rock.

In Killingworth colliery, north of Newcastle, there are many large fossil trees discovered in the coal strata, and they frequently have some indication of roots. One of these is particularly described and figured by Mr. Wood, in the Transactions of the Natural History Society of Northumberland. Its roots rested in the shale, immediately above the coal bed, and its stem pierced 10 or 12 different strata.

In Wideopen free-stone quarry, near the house at Gosforth, in Northumberland, a tree, of 70 feet in length, and lying across the strata, was lately discovered in a petrified state.

In Jarrow colliery, also, similar plants are found in considerable abundance; and in the Gosforth pit, down which I lately went, (a depth of 190 fathoms in one shaft, being the deepest now in the kingdom,) I found the roof of the main coal stratum to be entirely composed, in many places, of trunks of trees, lying in every direction, and of very considerable size.*

From all these instances, (and many others might be quoted if it were necessary,) we cannot but perceive, that our previous notions of the formation of strata in general, have been of the most erroneous description; for when we look at a lofty cliff of sand-stone rock, without any embedded fossil, we at once conceive to ourselves the vast length of time which we had been taught, by geology, to assign, for so extensive and gradual a formation. But such an example as the Craig-

"It appears, from the marine shells found on the tops of the highest mountains, and in almost every part of the globe, that immense continents have been elevated above the ocean, which must have ingulfed others.

"Such a catastrophe would be occasioned by a variation in the position of the axis of rotation on the surface of the earth; for the seas would leave some portions of the globe, and would overwhelm others. But theory proves, that neither nutation, precession, nor any of the disturbing forces which affect the system, have the smallest influence on the axis of rotation, which maintains a permanent position on the surface, if the earth be not disturbed in its rotation by some foreign cause, as the collision of a comet, which may have happened in the immensity of time." The able authoress then proceeds to show how little influence the sea would have, even in such a case, upon the general equilibrium; and concludes thus,—"It thus appears, that a great change in the position of the axis is incompatible with the law of equilibrium; therefore, the geological phenomena (of fossils) must be ascribed to an internal cause. Thus, amidst the mighty revolutions which have swept innumerable races of organized beings from the earth, which have elevated plains, and buried mountains in the ocean, the rotation of the earth, and the position of the axis on its surface, have undergone but slight variations."—Mechanism of the Heavens, by Mrs. Somerville.

Upon the above passage, the Quarterly Review has remarked, that "the lunar theory teaches us, that the internal strata, as well as the external outline of our globe, are elliptical; their centres being coincident, and their axis identical with that of the surface; a state of things incompatible with any subsequent accommodation of the surface, to a new and different state of rotation from that which determined the original distribution of the component matter."—Quarterly Review, No. xciv. p. 552.

Although I cannot subscribe to the doctrine which dictated the latter part of the above remark, nor to the idea of Mrs. Somerville, that the collision of a comet "may have happened in the immensity of time," although, we thus have acknowledged proof against the probability of any such collision, which is, therefore, quite uncalled for; we must hail, with pleasure, the step that has thus been gained by the admission of so able an authority. The theory of a change in the axis of the earth, which was only engendered for the purpose of accounting for tropical productions, in polar latitudes, is, therefore, for ever destroyed; and we thus arrive at the same point by various different roads.

After this concession, that the phenomena of geology must have originated in a cause not external to our earth, we may hope, that the true internal cause will, ere long, be equally admitted. One other such departure from the usual theories of the deluge and the union which is every day approaching, between Philosophy and Scripture, will be at length completed.

* I cannot here omit remarking, that in Jarrow colliery, the muscle beds or strata, containing sea shells, are very abundant. I saw some specimens of these shells in the museum at Newcastle; they exactly resemble those muscles found in the blue clay, reposing on the chalk at Pegwell, in Kent.

I also find, that in some of the coal pits in Scotland, (and that of the Drum, near Dalkeith, was particularly mentioned,) sea shells, as large as oysters, are frequently found in the roof of the coal stratum, as if they had been stuck into clay from below.

leith fossil tree exhibits, must serve at once to show, that instead of thousands or millions of years, for such deposits of sand-stone rock, but a very short time indeed must have been occupied in the formation of the whole of this quarry; and, consequently, of the whole coal formation which rests below it. The tree, could not possibly have remained in a reclining posture, if only held by a few of the strata near its base. Nor could it have been long exposed with its top protruding in air or in water; a few passing waves, or, at most, a few days of the agitated and turbid waters of the deluge, must have been sufficient for the formation of the whole bed in which it is now found, and which we are apt to look upon as of vast extent. In the same manner we are instructed by those fossil stems, which pass through a coal bed from the floor, into the strata above, to a great height. These are only further indications and proofs of the truth of what I have before stated, that the formation of coal, under every circumstance, must be attributed to the progressive sinking and covering up of the diluvial vegetable ruin at the period of the flood; and that this invaluable fossil production, in its present state, has been the result of prodigious pressure on the one hand, and of chemical action on the other.

We cannot, for a moment, doubt that all the beds through which these stems now pass, were once in a soft or semi-fluid state, like the sands upon the sea shore, about the ebbing of the tide. The whole strata, however horizontal they must once have been, have since become more or less deranged, not by elevation, but by depression; and upon this principle alone I have already explained the origin and cause of the slips, dykes, and troubles, so well known in all mining countries. We now account, in a natural and consistent manner, for a large proportion of all the upper soils and strata with which the surface of the present earth is covered. Let us only suppose, for a moment, a greater number of these fossil stems acting, as they do, as measures, cast into various parts of the deluvial strata, one above another. If a series of twelve or fourteen solid beds of sand-stone, and other strata of the coal formation, were formed in the short space of time necessary to support one tree of sixty or seventy feet long, in a reclining posture, we have a full right to carry our ideas much further on the same scale. Our notions of lacustrine quiet deposits, in an immense period of years, must be for ever laid aside with regard to the coal fields. The presence of sea shells, in even a few of the coal strata, is sufficient for the total destruction of this long received theory. And if we are forced to give up this proof of the great antiquity of the globe, we must naturally enter upon that more consistent and well defined system presented to our contemplation in the geology of Scripture. We thus attain, by these vegetable evidences, the same strong ground we had already taken up, by the testimony of animal fossil bodies, on every part of the earth's surface. Every thing is consistent and agreeable to history, instead of being contradictory in all its parts, and directly opposed to what the sacred narrative so plainly lays before us.

I feel it scarcely necessary here to remark upon the singular notion entertained, by some, of these fossil trees having grown in the sandy or argillaceous strata in which they now happen to lie. This mistake arises, like most of the other erroneous notions in geology, in the constant idea that we are now living upon the antediluvian dry lands; an idea which we have already found it necessary entirely to lay aside. Had the trees grown where we now find them, their roots must have been fixed on a different material from that which now covers the stems; and we must have discovered, which has never yet been done, some indication of a former soil, suited to the nourishment of so rich a vegetation.*

With regard to the fine fossil tree, we can have no sort of doubt of its having been embedded, together with all the other vegetable matter found in the quarry of Craigleith, in the course of a few days, or, perhaps, of a few tides; a conjecture for which we shall presently find that there are the strongest possible grounds. And as this free-stone formation, of at least 220 feet in depth, is of precisely the same nature as that which forms the roof of many of the coal beds in that neighbourhood, and containing the very same fossil vegetable productions, we come at once to the strongest evidence, both as to the nature and the period of the whole contents of the coal basins; and, also, of the very great rapidity with which they must have been deposited.

All these facts tend, in the strongest manner, to confirm the opinions I have before, and at greater length, expressed; that the coal beds were formed at the period of the deluge, by successive deposits of great vegetable masses, which must

* In a lately published work of Mr. Lyell, to which allusion has, more than once, been made, and in which that able writer takes a very luminous view of the secondary causes in constant action on the surface of the earth, we find a very striking (though altogether unintentional) argument against the generally received theory, of the fossil remains of tropical quadrupeds now found in our upper soils and strata having belonged to animals formerly naturalized to our climates, and inhabiting our "antediluvian forests." This argument is found in his account of the formation and extent of peat mosses in the North of Europe, in the course of which, this author clearly shows, "that a considerable portion of the European peat bogs are evidently not more ancient than the age of Julius Cæsar;"* an admission we could scarcely have looked for, from a writer, whose whole theory is founded on "the economy of Nature," having been "uniform," and the laws, which direct the changes on the earth, having "remained invariably the same:" for, as a great part of his work is occupied in endeavouring to show that the present system of Nature has been regular, and has proceeded in the same course for millions of years, we can in no way account, in a system of such indefinite extent, for the origin and growth of peat, within so comparatively trifling an era as the days of the Romans.

"The antlers," says he, "of large and full grown stags, are amongst the most common and conspicuous remains of animals in peat. Bones of the ox, hog, horse, sheep, and other herbivorous animals, also, occur; and in Ireland, and the Isle of Man, skeletons of a gigantic elk; but no remains have been met with belonging to those extinct quadrupeds, of which the living congeners inhabit warmer latitudes, such as the elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, hyæna, and tiger, though these are so common in superficial deposits of silt, mud, sand, or stalactite, in various localities throughout Great Britain."—Vol. ii. p. 218.

Now, it must be evident to every one, that if England, and the rest of Europe, where peat is now found in such abundance, (and containing the remains of animals preserved in the complete manner peculiar to this substance,) were formerly in existence above the waters, and were covered with forests and wilds, suited to the shelter and nourishment of elephants, and other large quadrupeds, now confined to the tropics, there can be no conceivable reason why peat should not have been, as it now is, in constant progress; nor is it consistent with analogy and facts, that such animals as are said to have been so abundant in these supposed forests, should not occasionally have been found in such situations. In this dilemma we naturally look for the means by which so great an inconsistency is accounted for by its author, who, accordingly, proceeds as follows: "Their absence seems to imply, that they had ceased to live before the atmosphere of this part of the world acquired that cold and humid character which favours the growth of peat." Why they "ceased to live," we have no reason given, nor can we conceive any reason that would agree with the rest of Mr. Lyell's theory. Their disappearance could not have arisen from cold, because we are told by this author, in another part of his work, when treating of the fossils of the polar regions, that the greater part of the elephants lived in Siberia, after it had become subject to intense cold, which is confirmed, amongst other reasons, by the state of the ivory," &c.* This "intense cold" could not have existed in Siberia, when inhabited by elephants, without its influence being also extended, as in our own times, over Russia, Germany, Sweden, and England; and consequently, these countries must have, even then, enjoyed precisely "that cold and humid character which favours the growth of peat."

"Some naturalists," says Cuvier, "reckon much on the thousands of ages which they accumulate with a dash of their pen; but, in such matters, we cannot venture to judge of what might be produced in a long time, except by multiplying, in idea, what a shorter period does produce."

We have never yet had any geological account of the extensive peat mosses which ought to have existed in the "antediluvian forests of Yorkshire," and in the rest of Europe; nor can we readily believe that elephants and rhinoceri, could have inhabited such forests, or passed over such swamps, without having been occasionally buried in the peat, and preserved in the same manner as cattle are in our own times.

There can, perhaps, be no stronger ground taken up for the support of the Geology of Scripture, or for the destruction of the theory of indefinite periods, than the argument arising from the nature and extent of peat moss; and, by doubling the short period, admitted by Mr. Lyell, or, obtaining from his abundance, so trifling a boon as a couple of thousand years more than he has already freely given us, we can perfectly account for its comparatively recent formation, as well as for the total absence of tropical animals and plants. Peat is, as Mr. Lyell has well explained, a recent formation, in constant progress in certain favourable situations and circumstances. It is, in short, of post-diluvian growth, and contains only such animal or vegetable remains as are natural to our European climates. The beds of "silt, mud, sand, and stalactite," in which tropical organic remains are mixed up with those of temperate latitudes, are equally superficial; but they owe their formation to a different period, and to a different cause. They are diluvial formations; and as they owe their origin to that destructive period, we cannot wonder that they should contain proofs of the indiscriminate organic ruin, which naturally resulted from that preternatural judgment.

* Principles of Geology, vol. ii. p. 214.

* Principles of Geology, vol. i. p. 3.

have been matted together, and floating on the waters at that eventful time; and that the contents of all the basins of geologists, whether containing coal, or not, must have also become deposited at the same period; the whole of these moist formations being stratified according to the common laws in constant action in the ocean; and, on the depression of the waters into their new bed, becoming, in many places, deranged by depression, and, subsequently, hardened into the stony masses now exhibited to our admiring view.

I now come to the second subject on which I proposed making a few observations in this place; and which presents perhaps, one of the most difficult problems in the whole extent of our geological inquiries.

I allude to the fossil foot-marks, if I may so call them, of animals, which have, in a few instances, been distinctly discovered on the surface of the strata, in sand-stone quarries. I am not aware of more than two known instances of this remarkable fact. The first occurred in a red sand-stone on Corncockle muir, in Dumfrieshire; and the second, in the same free-stone quarry of Craiglieth, where the large fossil tree was discovered in 1830. I do not happen to have read or heard, what are the opinions of philosophers on this remarkable subject; but I cannot help thinking, that the evidences to be found in Craigleith quarry, with respect to the abovementioned fossil trees, will serve as a ground for the most probable conjecture with respect to the true nature of those animal foot-marks on the diluvial sands.

These impressions, of which some of the originals, as well as casts in stucco, are to be found in various collections, indicate a small animal, having a foot about the size of that of a fox. There appears to be considerable variety in the size, but as to the identity of conformation in every case, I have not yet had an opportunity of correctly ascertaining the facts. Trials have been made, by making a variety of animals walk over sand, or moist clay; and I have been informed, that it was the opinion of Sir Everard Home, that the impression of the track of the tortoise was the nearest to those hitherto found in the quarries.

As I am entirely ignorant of the locality of Corncockle Muir, I shall confine myself to those impressions found in the Craigleith free-stone, and of which casts have been placed in the Museum of the Royal Society of Edinburgh.

In endeavouring to solve this geological mystery, we must bear in mind two positive facts, with which we are made acquainted by the evidence of the fossil trees above described: first, that the whole formation of the rock, in which both are found, must have been very rapid; and, secondly, that there is no conceivable means, within the common laws of nature, with which we are acquainted, by which such rapid formation could take place at the present time.

In the course of the view I have formerly taken of the action of the deluge, and its effects upon the "earth that now is," I had an opportunity of explaining what the appearances must probably have been, both on the rise and on the decline of the destructive waters. I have shown, that as the position of the globe, during this awful judgment, remained precisely the same as it was before, and as it ever since has been, the effects of the sun, and of the moon, as exhibited in the tides, must have remained in equal, if not in greater force, than at other times. This action of the tides must have been particularly powerful on the gradual decline of the diluvial waters, at a time when the new lands, in a soft state, began first to appear above the surface; and, in process of time, to be, for a short space, periodically left dry by the ebbing tide, in the same manner as the sandy or muddy shoals on our own, or on the Dutch coast.

Now, in the present course of things upon the earth, the footsteps of any animal, passing over the smooth sands on the ebb tide, could not long resist even the gentlest action of the waves, because the waters of the ocean, in their natural state, are so nearly pure, and free from sediment, that the progress of secondary formations is so slow as to be almost imperceptible to our view. But, at the awful period of which we are now treating, the case must have been totally different. The waters of the whole sea must then have been, as we have before shown, heavily charged with their preternatural burden; and every successive tide must, consequently, have deposited some additional beds upon the growing earth. In this manner alone can we account for the rapid deposition of the trees we have just been considering; and, in this same manner alone can we also account for the preservation of those animal foot-marks now discovered between the strata.

But it will naturally be asked, where was the animal to come from, at a time when the whole living kingdom was in the act of being destroyed; or, (if the foot-marks were made, as appears most probable, on the decline of the deluge,) when all had already perished? To this we reply, that we have here the most positive evidence, that all had not yet perished when these sandy formations were being so rapidly deposited. At whatever period of the deluge this deposit took place, we see, that at least a few individuals, of the animal world, were lingering out a miserable existence, perhaps preserved for weeks or months upon these same vegetable islands which we have seen were being deposited in the immediate neighbourhood, and now exhibited in the form of coal. If the animals in question were of the tortoise or turtle tribe, as has been generally conjectured, and, consequently, of an amphibious nature, we can have the less difficulty in finding a solution for this interesting problem; for, in considering the fossil remains of the natural inhabitants of the sea, we have before found it probable, that by no means a general destruction took place amongst this extensive class at the period of the deluge.

The impressions I have had an opportunity of seeing are of various degrees of freshness; but none of them have the appearance of a longer time than would occur between one ebb tide, and the following flow. If an animal pass along a fresh sand bed, on the present shores, the impression of his steps soon becomes less sharp, as the moisture is evaporated from the drying sands.

These fossil foot-marks have all the appearances exhibited on a recent sand bank. They, in some instances, indicate a short and shuffling gait, with the feet pressing outwards, and are such as we can suppose an amphibious animal to produce. Had the marks occurred in clay, instead of in sand, we can suppose the air to have completely hardened the impression, so as to have preserved it a long time before being covered up. But such is not the case; and we can, therefore, have no manner of doubt that they were occasioned by some animal coming ashore on a sand bank left dry by the tide; and that the returning waters, heavily charged as they must have been, with diluvial sediments, immediately covered up the former strata, and thus preserved entire those most interesting and solitary indications of a still living antediluvian race.

We find in this same quarry of Craigleith, another remarkable evidence of the truth of what has now been stated. For it has been remarked, by the intelligent individual who has the management of these valuable works, that, on the upper surface of the whole quarry, wherever it has been covered up, and protected by the mixed diluvial soils and rounded stones, now so general on the surface of the earth, the upper stratum is marked with grooves or scratches, generally lying in a S. W. direction, and, evidently, attributable to the impression of gravelly substances hurried along by the currents, about the termination of the flood. Similar grooves have long since been remarked, especially by the late Sir James Hall, whose active and intelligent mind has suggested so many original and acute remarks on the phenomena of nature, as well as in the wide field of scientific research. As we have already found that the action of currents is at all times most powerful in the ocean, and must have occasioned many wonderful effects at the period now in question, we cannot be surprised, on the discovery of such self-evident proofs; nor can we avoid being struck with admiration at the consistent and remarkable manner in which all these evidences concur towards the same points, exhibited in the Inspired History. It is to this eventful period, and to it alone, that we must also look for a solution of the great question with respect to the valleys of the earth's surface, about which so many remarkable theories have been, from time to time, brought forth. We can now plainly perceive what, in these philosophical theories, has never been made clear to the intelligence, that the rounded forms of our hills, and the easy rotundity of our secondary slopes, must all have been occasioned by the action of the retiring waters upon the soft and recent deposits. We now plainly perceive why our mountain lowland valleys are much longer and more extensive than the action of their running streams could possibly have occasioned, even in MILLIONS of years.

We now also find a natural and consistent reason for many deep sections of sandy and calcareous rocks, by rapid streams, on every part of the earth's surface. We find the strata of one side so exactly corresponding with those of the other, that no doubt can exist as to their once having formed one united deposit, through which we have, hitherto, supposed the rivers must have taken unlimited periods, to work their deepened beds. We cannot now wonder if we found a difficulty in making these phenomena correspond with the existing laws of nature; for they differ in a manner so material from every thing now observed in action in the world, that no human ingenuity could possibly clear up the difficulty. Nothing short of that Divine Inspiration in the Sacred Scripture History, which has been vouchsafed to us, for the most beneficient ends, could ever have enlightened our benighted minds, which, in rejecting this powerful evidence, have hitherto wandered in a maze of inextricable obscurity. Let it not be urged for the future, as has hitherto so often been done in our philosophical schools, that Scripture was graciously bestowed upon us only for moral, and not for scientific purposes. If we make a humble and proper use of the indications on many philosophical inquiries, which are presented to us in the Inspired Writings, however slight they may appear, we cannot but confess, that every word of Scripture "has been written for our learning," and that no part of it has, consequently, been given us in vain.

From the indications derived from this inspired source alone, could we have attained the conclusions to which the above phenomena consistently lead us:—

First, that coal is an undoubted vegetable production.

Secondly, That it became embedded at a much more recent period, and in a much more rapid manner, than we have hitherto thought.

Thirdly, That it was an aqueous deposit.

Fourthly, That that aqueous medium was MARINE, and not LACUSTRINE; and,

Fifthly, That one or more beds, in many secondary strata, were formed with intervening ebb tides on the decline of the diluvial waters; and, consequently, that the theories of geology, which advocate unlimited periods for the age of the earth, are not only contrary to our reason, but entirely opposed to those leading beacons which Scripture holds out for our guidance and instruction.

CHAPTER XII.

Elephants clothed with Hair and Wool.—Existing Instances of this Variety, even within the Tropics.—Probable Identity between the Mammoth and the Asiatic Elephant.—Cuvier's Theory on this Subject inconsistent with Facts.—More Natural Conclusions.—Erroneous Theories respecting Fossils.—The Mastodon not confined to the Continents of America, as commonly supposed.—Instance of the great Mastodon in England.—Form of the Tusks of the Mastodon.—Erroneous Ideas on this subject.

Having now tried upon its own merits this interesting and important question, respecting the former history of the earth, by the presumptive evidence derived from the northern fossil remains; and having, by conclusive, though indirect proofs, shown that the elephants, found in the ice of the Arctic regions, never could have been inhabitants of such high latitudes, but must, on the contrary, have all been drifted to their present beds by the natural currents, which have, at all times, prevailed in the ocean; and that these natives of tropical climates never could have existed but in the latitudes in which we now find them naturalized, notwithstanding the startling fact of some individuals having been found entire, and covered with a warm coat of hair and wool; I now proceed to bring forward, what may truly be considered a positive and direct evidence of the correctness of those conclusions to which we have been led. For, as many of the theories of geology may be distinctly traced to the remarkable fossil animals, covered with a shaggy coat, which have already been so fully described, it is a point of the very highest interest and importance to geology, to find that the arguments, grounded on this hairy covering, can no longer be of the smallest service in the support of such false and contradictory opinions. For it has, within a few years, been indisputably proved, that though neither the common Asiatic, nor the African elephant, requires, in general, such natural protection, owing to the heat of the climates which they most delight in; yet that a variety of the species actually exists in one district of Hindostan, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Hymalaya range, having a thick and shaggy coat of hair; and being thus suited, by the common laws of nature, to become the inhabitants of a region comparatively cold.

When we consider the admirable manner in which animal as well as vegetable productions accommodate themselves to the particular temperature in which they are placed, we cannot feel surprised, that, in some instances, elephants with hair, should be found to exist. For the common Asiatic elephant cannot be regarded with any attention, without our perceiving that, on almost every part of his bare hide, there is an indication of hair, such as we see on some species of the dog from Turkey, or of the hog from China;* and we may, therefore, safely conclude that, as in both these familiar instances, the clothing, natural to most other animals, is only wanting in the case of the elephant, from the warmth of the climates to which he is, for the most part, confined. This natural clothing, however, which circumstances alone have, in general, caused him to lay aside, is immediately called into action, when a cooler temperature requires its presence. An elephant does not continue long in our temperate climates without this provision being more or less developed; and we have, at this moment, in London, most decided instances of this incipient roughness, in the two elephants belonging to the Zoological Society in the Regent's Park.

The recent discovery of this zoological fact, in a country which has so long been occupied by numbers of our countrymen, may, perhaps, be looked upon as one of the most remarkable parts of it; and though the work I am about to quote has now been for several years before the public, I do not any where find that this new and interesting variety of the elephant has met with that attention to which it may certainly lay claim. That it bears in a most remarkable manner, on the great questions in geology, must be apparent to all who have attended to the line of reasoning so recently explained. For it must be evident, that if the common elephants, of the hottest climates, without hair, were floated by the currents from a tropical to a frozen region, and were there stranded, and sealed up, on the subsiding of the waters; all such as inhabited a cooler climate, even within the tropics, must also have been subjected to a similar mechanical power. But we are not to suppose, because a few fossil specimens may have been found with hair, that all the elephants, whose remains are embedded in the northern or temperate climates of the earth, were of this rough species. On the contrary, it may safely be looked upon as certain, that the number of bodies with hair, bore no greater proportion to those without, than we now find to exist in the living species. We have every reason to conclude, that the elephant is a native only of such climates as furnish, in luxuriance, the vegetable productions on which he feeds. They are no where found, in a natural state, in temperate latitudes; but only in those countries where the herbage may be termed gigantic, and where the jungles are so thick, that the animals may not only be completely concealed from their enemies, but may also find an easy and abundant subsistence. Such is the case, not only in the low and swampy plains of Hindostan, but, also, in the districts of India, bordering on the mountains, where a higher elevation in the atmosphere counteracts, in some degree, the powerful effects of the sun, and occasions a temperature, which, in India, is termed cold, though the thermometer may rarely indicate the freezing point.

The first, and, as yet, only notice we have of this shaggy variety of the elephant, is to be found in the interesting journal of Bishop Heber. It was in the course of that long tour round the district over which his spiritual government extended, that the bishop arrived in the residency of Barielly, a city situated in the plain, in the 28th degree of north latitude, and about 50 miles from the lower range of the Hymalaya. It was at only one day's journey from Barielly, on his way to the mountains, and while passing through the unwholesome forests and jungles of the plain, that he was visited by a native border prince of that district, who invited him to join in the hunting of a tiger, which had lately been seen in that neighbourhood. It is in the short and animated description of this hunt, that the bishop makes use of the following terms: "The rajah was mounted on a little female elephant, hardly bigger than the Durham ox, and almost as shaggy as a poodle. She was a native of the neighbouring woods, where they are generally, though not always, of a smaller size than those of Bengal and Chittagong."

Heber again mentions having met the same rajah, a few days afterwards, "on his little elephant;" and we cannot peruse this concise, yet particular description of so casual a circumstance, without perceiving, that, though he does not enter into details upon the subject of this rough-coated ele-

* It is well known, that many of the hog tribe, especially those from China, have little or no hair, when first brought into our climates. The laws of nature soon, however, take effect; and they not only, in the end, become covered with hair, but they also acquire a complete under-covering of wool, as is well known to all fly-fishers.

phant, yet his attention was, on both these occasions, particularly attracted to so uncommon an animal. I am the more desirous of drawing the attention to the artless and familiar description contained in the above passage, from having found, on inquiry from many who have spent a great part of their lives in the East, that this variety of the elephant is so little known, that much doubt is entertained, by some, as to the correctness of the account of it.

Setting aside, however, for a moment, the character of the individual from whom alone we have, as yet, derived our information of this new living variety, let us consider the collateral circumstances of the case; and we shall find, that this generally, though not invariably small race of elephants, are said to be the natural and wild inhabitants of an extensive range of jungle, where, though ice is rarely seen, yet hoar frost is quite a common occurrence; and where, consequently, the clothing of the native animals might be expected to be warmer than in the burning plains, at a greater distance from the highest mountains on the globe.

We find, that this very animal on which the rajah was mounted, accompanied the bishop to the town or village, where he was to leave his elephants for a time, and to continue his journey on "little white shaggy ponies," in every respect similar to those of Wales, or of Scotland, to which Heber likens them; and in the course of one day's journey further, he begins to mention chamois, which are well known to be naturalized only in very cold climates.*

It is not necessary, however, to urge the probability of the account of any object of that description given by the pen of the amiable Heber. For, however mistaken his views may sometimes have been upon Indian affairs, in the short acquaintance which he was permitted to enjoy with that immense range over which his spiritual authority extended, we cannot, for a moment, doubt his exactness on such points as we are now considering; and as he was, at the time, accompanied by Mr. Boulderston, who had for many years held an official situation in that district, and from whom, Heber says, he derived much information on the natural history of the jungles they were then traversing, it is but reasonable to suppose, that the short description above quoted, was the result of the conversation and inquiry which this new and strange looking animal must naturally have given rise to.

I am happy to say, that, in as short a space of time as the great distance will permit, we may hope to have a full and particular account of the rough-coated elephant. Through the kindness of Dr. Wilkins, Librarian to the honourable the East India Company, in London, letters have been written to the gentleman who is, at present, engaged as a naturalist, in traversing some of the extensive districts of Hindostan, for the purpose of drawing his particular attention to this animal; and to all who enter into the consequences, to be naturally deduced from its discovery, a more particular description of it, from the pen of a naturalist, must afford a subject of the highest interest and expectation.

In the mean time, I must not omit to take notice of one point which has come under my observation, and which certainly corroborates, as far as it goes, my idea of the complete or approximating identity of species, between this existing caste of the elephant, and the shaggy fossil of Siberia, as well as between the common Asiatic race, and the animal whose bones and teeth are so generally distributed over the surface of the earth, and known by the name of the mammoth.

I have before alluded to the interesting specimens of the skin and hair of the fossil mammoth of the Lena, preserved in the Museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, in London. After having examined the three different varieties of hair of which this sample is composed, viz. a sort of wool or short hair; a longer kind, about the coarseness of that of the mane of a horse; and a stronger sort, thicker than any bristle with which I am acquainted; I had an opportunity of seeing, in the same fine collection, the tail of the common Asiatic elephant, with the curious arrangement of hair of which it is composed. This hair is from one to two feet in length, and of such thickness, that it more resembles long rounded strips of whalebone, than any thing else to which I could liken it. The peculiarity of this coarse hair, however, is, that it is neither perfectly round, nor perfectly flat, as that from the tail of the horse is occasionally found to be; but it is irregularly rounded and flattened over its whole surface, in a manner so unlike any other hair, that it may, probably, be looked upon as quite peculiar to the elephant.* It immediately occurred to me, to compare this unusual construction with the coarser sort of hair of the fossil specimen; and though there is not in that sample, (which was sent to Sir Joseph Banks, from St. Petersburg,) any hairs which could be supposed to belong to the tail of the antediluvian animal, yet it is most obvious and surprising, to see the exact similarity which exists between the coarsest hairs or bristles of that sample, and those of the tail of the common Asiatic species.

Such corroborative points, in the chain of our evidence, are not to be overlooked, nor despised; and though Bishop Heber does not give us the slightest notion of the colour of the animal he saw, yet we may naturally conclude, from what we already know of the existing species, that it must have been of a dark brown tint, nearly approaching, in the coarser hairs, to black. If this be the case, it will agree, most perfectly, with the description I have read, and the samples I have seen, of the shaggy coat of the antediluvian animal.

The coarsest hair in the Museum of the College of Surgeons, is, in colour, like that of some dark chesnut horses, which are often called black, but whose manes and tails show a reddish colour when viewed transparently. The tufts of hair from the fossil animal, evidently indicate an inclination to curl; the woolly hair, at the roots of the coarser sort, shows this even more distinctly; and the whole gives at once the idea of its having formerly belonged to exactly such an animal as Heber so graphically describes as being "almost as shaggy as a poodle," to which animal alone it could, perhaps, be properly likened.†

As we have now found, therefore, a situation, within the tropics, sufficiently cold to produce a thick coat of hair, on a race of animals usually bare; but, at the same time, sufficiently hot to furnish a climate fitted for the richest Eastern vegetation, and a jungle grass so high, as nearly to cover the elephants of the hunters, let us imagine, for a moment, such an event to occur, as is supposed by Cuvier to have actually happened in the present Polar regions, at the period of his last revolution, or, what we term the Mosaic deluge. Cuvier supposed that a SUDDEN flood of waters must have occurred,

* "The paharians, or hill people, are quite a distinct race from the rest of the inhabitants of Bengal; and, from every circumstance, may be, with reason, considered as aborigines. They are in stature and figure very like the Welsh," &c.

"Most people conclude the climate of India to be invariably sultry and scorching, whereas the months of December and January are often so cold as to produce a thin coat of ice upon the puddles; and, very commonly, a smart hoar frost on the grass and vegetation."—Field Sports of the East.

* The hair that is next in coarseness to that of the elephant's tail, is that of the tail of the camelopard, which is of a fine round form, and from two to three feet in length. The hair of the hippopotamus is also very strong; but the skin of this animal is usually nearly bare. About the mouth are tufts of strong bristles—as also in the ear: and it is singular, that the form and arrangement of the tail should be the same as that of the elephant. Both are flattened towards the point, and the hairs are only on the edges, and not upon the sides of the flat part of the tail.

† Since writing, the above, I have, by the kindness of the Zoological Society, been permitted to take specimens of the hair from different parts of the body of their small Ceylon elephant; and have compared them with the fossil specimens, in the presence of Mr. Clift, at the Royal College of Surgeons.

This small elephant in the Zoological Gardens of the Regent's Park, has not been many months in England. It is three or four years old, and is not yet larger than a small Highland ox. He is as hairy as many species of pigs; and his coat has a decided tendency to be "shaggy" or curly. His colour is a dark chesnut brown on the back, dirty gray on the stomach and lower parts of the body; and there is most hair, (of a yellowish colour,) about the mouth. In the interior of the ear, the hair is close set, and of a light gray colour, much resembling that called wool, in the descriptions of the Siberian fossil.

The keepers are conscious of the gradual increase of this hair, since the animal has been in England: and the older and larger Mysore elephant, of the same collection, has also a thin coat of hair, of a few inches in length, all over his body, and of the same colour as in the smaller animal. In both, the longest hair is on the neck and shoulders; but it has not yet assumed any appearance of a mane. It is, indeed, probable, that the mane described on the fossil specimen did not more resemble that of a horse, than the longer bristles always found on the neck and shoulders of the hog. Upon the whole, the small Ceylon elephant appears fast approaching to such a shaggy appearance as Heber describes, and as Mr. Adams found on the Siberian fossil elephant.

The resemblance of the hair of the fossil, and of the recent animal, is complete, having that general inclination to red, before remarked; and the longer hair of both is chesnut when viewed transparently, and so similar in this respect, that the one cannot be distinguished from the other.

I have, also, by the kindness of Mr. Cleft, been permitted to examine the tooth of a Siberian fossil, which was sent to Sir Joseph Banks at the same time as the hair. It is completely identical in form and structure to that of the common Asiatic elephant.

and, at the same time, an equally SUDDEN and violent diminution of heat, so as first to envelope the animals in the water, and then to convert that water, almost instantly, into ice; which has been the means of preserving, in an entire state, even the most perishable parts of some of the animal bodies embedded in it.

It must be obvious to every one, that if such an event were, at the present day, to occur in the jungles and forests in the vicinity of the Hymalaya range, now inhabited by a race of elephants more or less "shaggy;" and also by innumerable other animals of every sort, usually found in such latitudes, we should expect to find, on inspecting the frozen mass, that the animal remains were INVARIABLY entire, and, in no instance, exhibiting such decided marks of marine action, as oysters, and other sea creatures, firmly attached to them. Instead of prodigious beds of "mud," mixed with "ice," and "bones," so correctly described by Professor Buckland, as the state in which the shores and islands of the Polar seas are now found, we should look, with a confident expectation, amounting to certainty, for the mass of vegetable substances, and entire trees, which must have equally shared the melancholy fate of the unhappy elephants.

Such, however, is by no means the state of things in the latitude of the mouth of the Lena, in Siberia; and, as every thing there denotes total ruin, and diluvial confusion, we have a right to assume, as a demonstrable fact, that the theory of Cuvier is entirely groundless. It must, however, in justice, be admitted, that the shaggy coat of these fossil animals formed a strong and plausible ground for some such theory. But the enthusiasm, too common on the discovery of a new and interesting fact, was, in this instance, permitted to outrun the discretion so necessary on a point which was to lead to such sweeping conclusions. For the undeniable facts which were assumed from this discovery, led to the following unavoidable results; first, that ALL northern fossils must have been "clothed in wool;" secondly, that the remains of the same class of animals found in less rigorous climates, such as our own, were also those of natives of such climates respectively; and, thirdly, that the climates of the antediluvian earth, as well as the nature of its animal productions, must have been widely different from what they now are.

All these conclusions, and innumerable others which naturally flowed from them, we must now hold to be utterly false and groundless. Every thing denotes, on the contrary, that the earth, and its productions, have been nearly, if not entirely, uniform, ever since they came from the hand of the Creator. We have not yet discovered, it is true, an existing variety of the elephant, exactly similar to that which has received the title of mastodon among geologists; but, as we have now advanced so important and unexpected a step with respect to the mammoth, we may not altogether despair of still becoming acquainted, at some future time, with a living mastodon. Science is a plant of but tardy growth, even under the most favourable circumstances of civilized society; much more, then, in countries where such fostering care cannot be afforded for its protection. In our eastern possessions, for example, so far removed as they are from the parent country, there must still be the richest field for scientific research in every branch of Natural History. Our young men have, however, for the most part, hitherto gone out at an age when the mind is unprepared to take advantage of the vivid impressions which novelty affords. We soon become familiarized to what was, at first, new and surprising; and we are, afterwards, incapable of perceiving that, what is an every day occurrence in a foreign land, may prove of the highest interest to science in our own more cultivated societies. Thus, for example, has this shaggy race of elephants been seen, for years, by numbers of our countrymen, without any one having thought of its being more interesting than the common breed. Geology, or general science, is, probably, but little thought of, in a country where business must require all that exertion and energy of the mind, which is not dissipated by the debilitating effects of the climate. We have, it is true, made a most rapid progress in our knowledge of Natural History within the last half century; but, with almost all China, the greater part of Africa, and nearly the whole of New Holland, still before us, unexplored, we probably have much to learn, before we reach the boundaries of so wide a field for inquiry.*

When we consider, on the other hand, the unfathomable depths of the ocean, an element to which many of those animals must have belonged, which we now generally look upon as extinct, it must be admitted to be extremely probable, that many of our conclusions on that head have been inconsiderate and hasty. We have long been amused, from time to time, with reports of what have been termed sea serpents, of enormous dimensions; and these accounts, though coming from a great variety of persons and places, have usually been set down to the account of ignorance and fable. Without being, by any means, an implicit believer in such stories, I cannot but think it possible, and even highly probable, that there are still many things in the wide earth "but little dreamt of in our philosophy;" and that some such monsters of the deep may exist, and be occasionally seen, as has so often been asserted by many respectable persons.*

It was, formerly, one of the well know facts of geology, that there had once existed a species of CARNIVOROUS elephants. This extraordinary idea, arising from the form of the teeth of the mastodon, is now entirely exploded. It was, also, a prevailing opinion, and reasoned upon as another of these well known facts, that that animal must have been a native of America, as his fossil remains were only found in that country; thus encouraging the groundless notion, that the continents of the New World had existed, as they now do, before the flood. This idea has been subsequently proved to be as unfounded and false, as so many other parts of the theories of philosophy. It may be admitted, that the remains of this particular species of the elephant have been, hitherto, oftener observed in America, than elsewhere; and if it were necessary, it would not be difficult to advance very plausible theories to account for the predominance of the fossil remains of one species over another, in particular localities, in the same manner as we find the greater part of one deposit to consist of fish, and of another of bones, or shells.

Such currents of the ocean as now sweep along the coasts of New Holland, must, at the period of the deluge, have somewhere deposited those animal bodies which might have belonged exclusively to any similar portion of the former dry lands. In the direction of this branch of the currents, or in any of the eddies which it might chance to have occasioned, we should certainly look for such fossil remains as would be rarely found in other parts of the bed of the sea. In the event of such a calamity, in the present day, the peculiar animal and vegetable productions of New Holland would certainly attract a great share of attention, and be productive of much theory in philosophy, supposing that we had still remained ignorant of the existence of that immense country, and of its curious productions, as we were half a century ago. But, as my object is rather to treat of facts than of theories, I shall proceed to give an interesting instance of the fossil mastodon in our own country, and in the immediate neighbourhood of one of the most extensive and remarkable diluvial deposits with which we are any where acquainted. We know, that, in America, the remains of both the mastodon and mammoth are constantly discovered in the same soils. This circumstance would, of itself, be sufficient to destroy the whole theory of geologists, who confine the mastodon to America, as they do the gigantic elk to Ireland, or the Isle of Man, because his remains happen to have occurred in those countries, in several instances. One undoubted instance of the mastodon in Europe would be sufficient, then, for the support of the system we are now defending; and we cannot have the smallest doubt, that, however rare these instances may, as yet, have been, a more intimate and general acquaintance with the distinguishing features of the two fossil varieties, (which are only to be known by the form of the grinders,) will make us acquainted with many more instances than we have at present heard of. †

In a former part of this treatise, and in quoting from the

* We cannot peruse the Monthly Transactions of our different Scientific Societies, without perceiving descriptions of animals and things not already described, and entirely "new to Science."

* Amongst the fossil animals which are now looked upon as extinct, are some species of the saurian, or crocodile tribe. When we consider, that by far the greater part of the interior of Africa is still unexplored, and that we are but partially acquainted with the productions, even of its known rivers, we must suspend our judgment on the subject of the extinct species of the crocodile; and we may reason from analogy, that we shall still become acquainted with many new things; and may conclude, that every new discovery will tend to show the literal truth of the Inspired Record, and the provident care of the Creator, for the preservation of all created species. The crocodile of the Ganges differs much in form from that of the Nile, and greatly resembles one variety of the supposed extinct fossil species.

† Professor Buckland mentions the bones of the mastodon as having formed a part of that remarkable fossil deposit, formerly alluded to, on the banks of the Arno, in Italy.

interesting communication of Mr. Layton, on the fossil remains of the coast of Norfolk, mention is especially made of the skeleton of the "great mastodon" having been found nearly entire, in the neighbourhood of Norwich. Being desirous of ascertaining upon what certain grounds this skeleton was called that of the great mastodon, I wrote to Mr. Layton, to request some further explanation on the subject; and, in reply, I had the pleasure of receiving the following interesting statement.

"Your doubt, as to the great mastodon being found in Norfolk, came not at all unexpected. I should have doubted it myself under almost any other circumstances; as it is, I feel sure and certain of the fact.

"I lived at Catfield, in Norfork, six miles from Hasborough, and about as far from Horstead. From this latter place, marl (soft chalk, with regular layers of flint, about four feet apart, or less,) is carried to all the villages in the neighbourhood, to be spread upon the lands. A boatman, who was in the habit of bringing me fossils, brought a grinder of this mastodon as a curiosity, saying, it had been found in the marl, and given to him by the head pitman. It was the posterior portion of the grinder of the great mastodon, (I am certain of the fact,) containing, as far as I recollect, eight points, none of which had been cut, or brought into use. On the first opportunity, I went to make inquiry about it at the chalk pit. The pitman pointed out to me the place where it was found, and said, that the whole animal was, as it were, lying on its side, stretched out on the surface of the marl. He described it as being very soft, and that a great part of it would at first spread like butter; the whole, however, had been thrown down along with the marl, and carried away. He said he had looked upon it as very curious indeed, but of no use; and he had kept that piece of the tooth merely by accident. He afterwards found another fragment or two of the bones, in his garden, where he had thrown them, and he sent them to me. They are now in my possession, but I am not able to identify them with the mastodon, as distinguished from the mammoth, or elephant. The grinder I sent to Dawson Turner, Esq., of Great Yarmouth, who, probably, has it now. Smith, in his 'Strata Identified,' has given the figure of a very fine grinder, (mastodon's,) said to have been found at Whitlingham, by Norwich; and Mr. Woodward, of Norwich, has a fragment, which appears to be half of one of the points of a mastodon's grinders, found at Bramerton, adjoining Whitlingham."

We have here the most clear and unquestionable statement of this interesting fossil body, and on the testimony of one, who not only possesses, perhaps, the most perfect collection of the teeth of the mammoth any where existing, (amounting to 70, of all ages and sizes, selected out of nearly 200,) but who has, also, made this curious part of geological research his particular study; and who, therefore, could not possibly be misled with respect to the animal in question, distinguished, as it so clearly was, by the form of its grinders. And we have thus a well-defined instance of the fossil existence of a species of animal, in our own soils, which has long been looked upon as exclusively confined to the continents of America alone.

One of the most remarkable features of both the known fossil varieties of the elephant, appears to have been the occasional horn-like, or spiral form of the tusk. It is the opinion of some able comparative anatomists, that all the tusks, even of modern elephants, have a tendency to this particular shape; but this opinion does not appear to be supported either by the fossil or the recent specimens of ivory. The largest recent tusks with which we are acquainted, have seldom been found to exhibit much indication of this form; and, on the other hand, many fossil tusks have been found as uniform in their bend as those of the common elephants most generally exhibited in Europe.*

We are not, however, to infer from these variable evidences, either that all fossil elephants had spiral tusks, or that all recent ones have those of a simple bend upwards.*

On this latter point, as upon the subject of the teeth of the mastodon, we must reserve our judgment until we have a more perfect knowledge of all the existing varieties. We ought to learn caution on subjects which involve such important conclusions, from the numerous instances we, from time to time, experience, of being forced to give up what had long been looked upon as well established facts. From such instances we may safely infer, that nature has not undergone such total changes as we are generally taught to suppose. The planet we inhabit, together with its animal and vegetable productions, remains governed by the same general laws it ever has been subjected to, since the creation. The numerous revolutions of the continental geology must, therefore, now be reduced to the ONE great revolution, recorded in the Inspired Writings, and of which we have now been tracing so many unquestionable proofs. We are thus, every day, more and more securely confirmed in the confidence to be reposed in these inestimable records; and the more closely we examine the evidences by which they are corroborated, the more striking is their resemblance to some deep bedded rock, on which the angry waves of scepticism are for ever breaking in vain.†

We now come to the consideration of a part of the subject of organic fossil remains in rocks and soils, which has, hitherto, occasioned very considerable difficulty, and has

* It is highly interesting to trace the history of such immense animals as the elephant; and when we consider the high value that has, at all times, been set upon his tusks as an article of commerce, it appears surprising that the whole race has not, long since, become extinct. We know that elephants are in some countries hunted exclusively for the sake of their ivory, although some portion of our supply may also be derived from teeth found in the woods, when the animals die, or are destroyed by wild beasts. From the year 1788 to 1799, there was imported into Britain at the rate of 1576 hundred weight of ivory annually! Now, if we take the average weight of each tusk at 40 pounds, which is a very low estimate, we find that upwards of two thousand of these noble animals must have perished each year, to supply the British market alone! Some tusks have been known to weigh from 325 to 350 pounds: and 100 pounds is not an uncommon weight; so that the above number is, probably, rather below than above the real annual consumption. If we add to this the supply necessary for the rest of Europe, and of the Eastern nations, our astonishment is excited at the number of elephants that must annually perish; and at the vast extent of wild country through which such herds must range, in seeking their subsistence.

* In the Museum of the College of Edinburgh, there are two very large fossil tusks, from Siberia. One of these is perfectly formed, with one simple bend; the other is very slightly of the cornuform, which appears, in that instance, quite accidental.

† Before concluding the consideration of the varieties of the fossil elephant, I cannot omit this opportunity of correcting an error in which our ideas of these antediluvian animals have been involved: and this explanation may serve to show how easily the public mind may be misled by the most trifling and casual circumstances. I am enabled to mention the following fact, on the authority of Mr. Clift, of the Royal College of Surgeons, who kindly communicated it to me, and has permitted me to make it public.

In the year 1799, a great fossil deposit, of animal remains, was discovered near Newburgh, on the Hudson River; and in this there were found so many bones of the fossil elephant, called the mastodon, that two nearly complete skeletons were constructed, with some little assistance from artificial means. The most perfect of these remained at Philadelphia, while the other was brought over for exhibition in London; and, in the year 1802, we were thus, for the first time, presented with a specimen of the carnivorous elephant, (as it was then thought to be.)

This curious specimen excited much attention for a time, and some idea of its purchase was entertained; but the price demanded being great, a report arose, and was soon circulated, that it was nothing but the skeleton of a common elephant, and was, therefore, not worthy of so much attention. This idea threatened seriously to affect the profits of the exhibitor; and, in order to prevent this, and to keep up public attention in favour of a highly ingenious and deserving individual, who had, at great expense, introduced so rare an object amongst us, the late Dr. Shaw, of the British Museum, suggested the idea of humouring the public; and, by changing the position of the tusks, of thus giving a totally different appearance to the animal, and restoring its credit as a rare and interesting object. This idea was immediately adopted. The tusks, which had been very properly placed so as to point upwards, as in the common elephant, were now reversed, and placed downwards; and one of the great resemblances to the common race having now disappeared, the animal again came into public favour, and, no doubt, was considered as much more thrown a shade of doubt and uncertainty over the historical account of the deluge, which, however, appears to be totally unwarranted by facts. I allude to the rarity of human fossil remains amongst those of the animated beings, which are frequently discovered in such abundance on the earth. For, it is objected, if all the human race, excepting one single family, perished by the flood, at a period when the population of the world must have been very considerable, there can be no good reason given why we should not also find their remains in the same abundance as those of other animals, on every part of the surface of the present dry lands.

In reply to this objection, it may be answered, that there can be no doubt that we have a consistent right to expect, occasionally, to find such fossil remains. But that we should discover them in any thing like the abundance in which we find the remains of other animals, would be to expect what, from the very nature of the case itself, must be an utter impossibility.

When we look back to the early history of the world, and consider that man was created, one male and one female, from whom the whole human race was to spring; while all the other species of animated beings were produced "abundantly," and the earth at once replenished with them; we must readily perceive, that at the end of any given period, such, for instance, as the 1656 years between the creation and the deluge, there could be, numerically, no proportion between the race of man and that of other animals.* We should come to the same conclusion, even in our own times, and in the most populous countries, where, as in England, the number of inhabitants bears but a small proportion to that of quadrupeds and birds.† Much more then, if we extend our view generally, over the whole inhabited earth, where the immense forest tracts are peopled with millions of quadrupeds and birds, for every hundred of the human species.

For instance, if we conceive any such event as the deluge to happen to the continent of America, at the present time, when the wilds of that country are swarming with deer, wild cattle, horses, and every inferior race of quadrupeds and birds, with a human population, scarcely worthy of calculation, in proportion: we should feel no surprise, if, on being enabled to examine the wreck, we should discover the remains of the former, in thousands of instances, for one of the latter.‡ Instead, then, of exciting astonishment, or creating doubt, the circumstance of the comparative rarity of human fossil remains, ought rather to be looked upon as the strongest confirmation of the general history of the earth, which we are now considering. We must keep in mind, too, that it is only within a few years, and in a very confined portion of the whole earth, that fossil remains, in diluvial formations, have excited the attention which they now do: and that before the study of comparative anatomy became so common as it now is, many bones must have been frequently discovered which ought to have been considered under this head, but which were, in ignorance, mistaken for those of other animals, or attributed to some more recent era. It is certain that, at all times, since the deluge, such remains must frequently have been found; but, in the ignorance and darkness of past ages, these instances have generally been overlooked and forgotten. Besides, as such discoveries must almost always be made, even in our own enlightened day, by the most ignorant of the people, instances must still frequently occur, which would be of the highest interest to science, but which are lost or forgotten from the thoughtless ignorance of the peasants who discover them.*

This darkness is, however, at least in our own country, passing rapidly away; and the love of science is now spreading from our own shores into every part of the habitable globe; from whence, we may hope, that the instances of diluvial human fossil remains will soon be greatly accumulated, and will afford us, from year to year, additional corroborative evidences of the true history of the earth. When we consider, indeed, the few spots on the surface of the globe, either by art, or by nature, laid open to our inspection, we ought, perhaps, to feel surprise at the extent to which our knowledge has already attained.

There is no part of the systems of geology, of the present day, in which more scepticism is evinced than in the instances which have occurred of human fossil remains; and it has even been, by some, considered nearly certain, that human beings had not been created at the period when the other animals, whose remains we find in a fossil state, were the inhabitants of the earth. The instances of human remains, which have been, hitherto, discovered, are not indeed numerous; but they are abundantly sufficient for the support of the general system now under consideration: and the instances which I am now about to mention, bring this branch of our subject, in the most natural and consistent method, within the very same class of facts, as those we have been, hitherto, occupied in passing under our review.

Before entering upon these statements, however, it may be necessary to say a few words upon the subject of the lime-stone caves and fissures, in which such animal remains are so generally found. The nature of some lime-stone rocks to split into fissures, and to become perforated in all directions, by cavities more or less extensive, is well known to have given rise to one of their geological names, that of cavous limestone. This particular character is, as may naturally be supposed, not confined to any country, nor to any district; but is as universal as the extensive secondary formation to which it belongs. Accordingly, innumerable instances of such cavities may be found in all countries; but they have, of late, come more especially into notice from the organic remains of diluvial destruction, which they have, in a great variety of instances, been found to contain. The cave of Gaylenreuth, in Franconia, has long been celebrated for such animal remains; and as an account of one will serve to give a very general idea of all such caverns or fissures, I shall here give Dr. Buckland's account of it; without, however, entering, in any degree, into his theory of the means by which the animal remains of this, or other caves, came into their present remarkable situation.

fierce and carnivorous looking than it was before, being thus furnished with hooks for the capture of its prey.

Drawings and engravings were made of the skeleton in this disguise; and, from that time to the present, the common impression of the public, with respect to the mastodon, is, that it was a fierce and flesh eating animal, and quite unlike the modern race of elephants. In a late number of a cheap and popular publication, intended for the diffusion of knowledge amongst the poor, the figure of the mastodon, or the mammoth, is accordingly given with the tusks placed in this unnatural and inconvenient position.

* "The kingdom of Congo, like most other parts of Africa, produces a prodigious variety of wild animals. Amongst the most remarkable are the elephants, which are found chiefly in Baurda, a province abounding with woods, pastures and plenty of water. They go in troops of 100 or more, and some are said to be of so monstrous a size, that the prints of their feet measure from four to seven spans. They delight in bathing during the heat of the day. Lions, of immense size, tigers, wolves and other beasts of prey, abound in this country. The zebra, the wild ass, the buffalo, and numerous tribes of deer and antelopes, are all most abundant; and the forests swarm with hyænas and wild dogs, which hunt in packs with dreadful howlings."—Bibliot. Univers. de Voyages.

† The population of England, which is not exceeded by that of any country in Europe, in proportion to its extent, is about ten or eleven millions. It is calculated that there are about twenty-six millions of sheep in this country alone; and if we include Scotland and Wales, where the disproportion is infinitely greater, we may form some tolerable idea of how the matter stands, when we add to the sheep, every other species of quadruped and bird, with which our woods and plains are so abundantly peopled.

‡ "The Missouri and Arkansas territories, which would be capable of sustaining, probably, more than fifty millions of inhabitants, if in a state of civilization, are, at present, occupied by something more than one hundred thousand Indians; and they have been computed to contain about one million of square miles."

"The buffaloes go in immense herds, and no one, ignorant of the extent of these fertile prairies, can form any idea of the countless myriads that are spread over, and find support on them."—Hunter's Memoirs of his Captivity among the North American Indians.

"On the south of the river Saladillo, (in Buenos Ayres,) are the immense plains of Pampas, which present a sea of waving grass for nine hundred miles. Their luxuriant herbage affords pasture to innumerable herds of cattle, which rove about unowned and unvalued: they are, also, the abode of immense troops of wild horses, deer, ostriches, armadillos and every sort of game."

* On three several occasions, I have lately had opportunities of remarking the careless apathy with which discoveries, most interesting to science, were regarded, both by overseers and labourers, in extensive works, where objects were every day discovered, most likely to attract their curiosity and attention. In the coal mines, both of England and of Scotland, I have seldom met with any workman who was aware that trees and plants were visible in almost every part of their works; they have no difficulty in admitting the fact when pointed out to them; but the situation of these remains must appear so improbable to them, that they would scarcely credit the evidence of their senses. One pitman, in a Scotch coal mine, appeared, however, to have viewed the interesting objects around him with more attention. Observing that I held my light towards the walls and roofs of the gallery, without, however, having made any remark to him, he said, "there must have been fine confusion here, sir, in the time of Noah." I could not help wishing that this remark had come from some leading member of our scientific societies.

"The mouth of this cave is situated in a perpendicular rock, in the highest part of the cliffs, which form the left side of the valley of the Weissent river, at an elevation of more than 300 feet above its bed. We enter by an aperture, about seven feet high, and twelve feet broad; and, close to it, we observe an open fissure rising from the cave, towards the table-land above.* The whole consists principally of two large chambers, varying in breadth from ten to thirty feet, and in height from three to twenty feet. The roof is, in most parts, abundantly hung with stalactite; and, in the first chamber, the floor is nearly covered with stalagmite, piled in irregular mamillated heaps, one of which, in the centre, is accumulated into a large pillar, uniting the roof to the floor.†

"From the first chamber we descend, by ladders, to a second, the floor of which also appears to have been overspread with a similar crust: this, however, has been nearly destroyed by holes dug through it, in search of the prodigious quantities of bones that lie beneath. This last chamber is connected by a low and narrow passage, with a smaller cavern, at the bottom of which there is a circular hole, descending like a well, about twenty-five feet, and from three to four in diameter. The circumference of this hole, in descending, is, for the most part, composed of a breccia of bones, pebbles, and loam, cemented by stalagmite. The depth to which this extends has not yet been ascertained. The roof and sides of all the artificial cavities, (formed in the search,) are crowded with teeth and bones: but these do not occur in the roof or sides of any of the upper, or natural chambers, above the level of the stalagmitic crust that covers the floor. This observation applies equally to all other lime-stone caverns of this description, and is important on account of the erroneous statements and opinions which exist on this subject. The floor of the first chamber has been already stated to be almost entirely covered with a crust of stalagmite. Through this crust large holes have been dug, and in these we see a bed of brown diluvial loam and pebbles, mixed with angular fragments of rock, and with teeth and bones. I could not ascertain the depth of this diluvium.

"In the second chamber the formation is of the same description, but more abundantly loaded with bones. Its depth appears to be irregular, and, in some parts, extremely deep. A side chamber descends rapidly into the body of the rock, and contains cart loads of teeth, bones, and pebbles, dispersed through a loose mass of brown diluvial loam, but not united by stalagmite." "The distribution of the component materials of the breccia of these caves is irregular; in some parts the earthy matter is wholly wanting, and we have simply a congeries of agglutinated bones; in others, the pebbles abound; in a third place, one half of the whole mass is loam, and the remainder teeth and bones. The state of preservation of these animal remains, when incrusted with stalagmite, is quite perfect, and the colour a yellowish white."‡

This cave of Gaylenreuth is only one of many such lime-stone caverns in the same neighbourhood, all furnished, in this manner, with similiar witnesses of diluvial destruction.

Dr. Buckland's account of the cave of Kuhloch is truly remarkable. "It is literally true," says, he "that in this single cavern, (the size and proportions of which are nearly equal to those of a large church,) there are hundreds of cart-loads of black ANIMAL DUST, entirely covering the whole floor to a depth which must average, at least, six feet, and the cubit contents of which must exceed 5000 feet. If we allow two cubic feet of dust and bones for each individual animal, we shall have, in this single vault, the remains of at least 2500 BEARS, a number which MAY HAVE BEEN SUPPLIED in the space of 1000 years, by a mortality at the rate of two and a half per annum."

Dr. Buckland's theory of the mode by which such animal remains became enclosed in caves, in every similar situation, is simply, that all such caverns were, before the deluge, inhabited by wild beasts, which, in some cases, as at Kirkdale, accumulated the bones of their prey in great quantities in their dens; and in others, as in the above mentioned caves of Germany, the animals died a natural death, when their decomposed remains were gradually added to the common stock; and while the diluvial currents were in force, the waters, filling these caverns, and drifting into them a mixture of mud and rolled pebbles, the whole mass of loam, gravel, and bones, subsided into the hollows of the cave, became mixed up together in the confused state we now find them; and, in the course of subsequent years, the whole surface became incrusted with stalagmite, often forming a hard and stony breccia.

As to the bones of animals, accompanied with loam and gravel, contained in the fissures, or more confined cavities of lime-stone rocks, Professor Buckland looks upon it as certain that these were open fissures before the deluge, and that numbers of the wild animals of that period, endowed, it would seem, with a much smaller degree of natural instinct than those of our own day, carelessly wandering among the woods and pastures, fell in, and perished. That the bones of these animals were of a much less perishable nature, than in our own times, is thus evident; for, during the whole period, previous to the deluge, or for upwards of 1600 years, these open fissures preserved their animal prey; and when the diluvial gravel and earthy sediments came to be lodged in them, the whole of the bones were not compressed at the bottom, as we should naturally have expected, but were mixed up in complete chaos, together with these earthy sediments in every part of the fissures; though they are, in numberless cases, of prodigious depth and extent.

Had the above theory respecting caves, being formed upon the solitary instance of one cave, or even a set of caves in the same locality, containing the bones of one species of animal, such, for instance, as bears, we might have looked upon it as not only highly ingenious, but as having even much appearance of probability: but when we extend our view over the whole earth, and coolly examine all the circumstances of innumerable cases, of a similar nature, we cannot fail to perceive the inconsistency of the whole theory, and consequently, that the abovementioned "ANIMAL DUST" must be attributed to a different cause from that of the gradual decay of "TWO THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED BEARS in the space of 1000 years, at the rate of TWO AND A HALF per annum!"

Amongst other proofs of the solid foundation on which this singular theory has been offered, and so generally accepted as satisfactory, by the scientific world, we must be informed, on the surest evidence, of some one post-diluvial cave, inhabited, like Gaylenreuth, by hundreds of bears at the same time, and of the unnatural habit of these animals to admit of even two and a half putrid carcasses in the year, to rot and moulder to a black "animal dust" under their very feet. The range of the Jura mountains is the exact situation where the professor's search ought to be directed; for there, in a climate very similar to that of Germany, are to be found, in considerable abundance, not only bears in the most savage state, but caves and fissures, of lime-stone rock, of exactly a similar nature. In Geneva, the tables of the curious are every winter spread with this species of game; and the peasants, on both sides of the Jura, are so partial to the chase of the bear, that his haunts and habits are as well known as those of the red deer to the Scottish Highlander. We may add a hope, that the Zoological Societies of London, with that zeal for scientific information for which they are so distinguished, will turn their attention to this important and interesting trait in the natural history of the bear.

I shall now proceed to lay before my readers the accounts of such undoubted instances of human fossil remains as are at present known to science: and that I may avoid, as much as possible, all appearance of prejudice, in favour of the views I am at present supporting, I shall quote the statements of these instances from the works of writers who have held very different opinions from myself; and who appear, in some instances, to have written these accounts under a general and

* It may here be important to remark, that nearly the whole of this part of Germany forms one great table-land, of little variety on the surface, and in which the rivers, (and amongst others, the Rhine,) run, as it were, in trenches, the sides of which often present a perpendicular section of this whole secondary formation; and the sameness of character in both sides of which greatly detracts from the beauty of the scenery for which the Rhine is more particularly celebrated. That all this plain country, connected as it is with the lower levels of Belgium and Holland, on one side, and of Poland and Russia on another, once formed the bed of the sea, is a fact so generally admitted, that it is here unnecessary to dwell upon it. The period at which this state of things existed becomes a more important question; and if I have succeeded in proving that the chalk formations of France, and of England, were in this state immediately previous to the Mosaic deluge, and by that event were elevated to their present level above the waters, we can have no hesitation in carrying the same level, and the same line of reasoning, over all those plains of Germany, in which these cavities are found.

† When water is filtered through lime-stone, it becomes impregnated with a calcareous principle; and when exposed to evaporation in the atmosphere, it deposits a stony matter, in the same form as icicles in a moist cave or cellar; such stony icicles are often seen dependent from the arches of bridges lately constructed, being formed from the mortar used in the building. When the matter is formed on the roof of a cave, it is called stalactite; when on the floor, it is named stalagmite.

commonly received impression, that any thing, of human form, could not be of antediluvian date, or, strictly speaking, fossil. It is not difficult to trace this very common, though erroneous impression, to those theories of geology, which cannot imagine any stratum, or formation of rock, to have taken place, except in the course of a very long period of years; and by which the immense, yet indefinite age of the globe, is thus looked upon as a firmly established fact. By those theories, a regular succession of creations is taught; the animals, found in the lowest secondary strata, being, as a matter of course, less recent than those whose remains are found above them. Man, therefore, having been rarely found in a fossil state, his remains, when discovered in rocks or soils, are generally regarded as accidental occurrences, arising from ancient battle fields, falling into fissures, or the like.

It may, however, be safely asserted, that in the whole history of fossil animal remains, there is nothing more clearly defined, or more completely certain, than the antediluvian date of many human fossils; and it is to be hoped, that the following statements will at once be stripped of all their mystery, to those who have entered into the line of reasoning adopted in this treatise, with respect to the newer secondary, or diluvial strata of the earth.

The first account which I propose considering, is contained in a letter from Mr. König to sir Joseph Banks, published in the Philosophical Transactions for 1814. It relates to the human remains embedded in lime-stone rock, at Guadaloupe.

"All the circumstances," says Mr. König, "under which the known depositions of bones occur, both in alluvial beds, and in caves and fissures of the flœtz lime-stone, tend to prove, that the animals to which they belonged, met their fate in the very places where they now lie buried. Hence, it may be considered an axiom, that man, and other animals, whose bones are not fonnd intermixed with them, did not coexist in time and place. The same mode of reasoning would fully justify us in the conclusion, that if those catastrophes, which overwhelmed a great proportion of the brute creation, were general, as geognostic observations, in various parts of the world, render probable, the creation of man must have been posterior to that of the genera and species of mammalia, which perished at the great cataclysm, and whose bones are so thickly disseminated in the more recent formations of rocks."

I must here remark, that it is not my object, in this place, strictly to criticise the very interesting paper from which the above is taken; but I quote the preface, in order to show the general impression under which the whole of this account was written; an impression which was then pretty generally felt amongst all geologists.

After nearly 20 years of additional experience and knowledge in this interesting science, it may be, by some, considered scarcely fair to bring forward the written opinions of those early times; and I should certainly feel disposed to take this view of the subject, were it not that, however the geological views of the able author of this paper may have changed, with regard to human fossil remains, it must be admitted, that the general impression on this branch of geology, is, at the present day, exactly such as is so clearly defined in the above passage: and when we consider the importance and weight which are very naturally attaehed to the opinions of the great leaders, in the scientific, as in the political world, we cannot but admit the necessity which brings those public and important documents under our strictest review.

"The human skeletons from Guadaloupe, are found in that part of the windward side of the grande terre, called La Moulle; and they are enveloped in what M. Lavaisse, in his Voyage à la Trinidad, (1813,) calls 'Masses de Madrèpore petrifies.' The block brought home by sir Alexander Cochrane was about eight feet long, by two and a half wide, and one and a half thick, being of nearly two tons weight. Its shape was irregular, approaching to a flattened oval. Excepting the few holes, evidently made to assist in raising the block, there were no marks of a tool; and, indeed, the whole had very much the appearance of a huge nodule, disengaged from a surrounding mass. The situation of the skeleton in the block was so superficial, that its presence in the rock, on the coast, had, probably, been indicated by the projection of some of the more elevated parts of the left fore arm."

Mr. König then proceeds to describe minutely the deranged condition of the bones, and states, that the whole of them, when first laid bare, had a mouldering appearance; but, after an exposure of some days to the air, they acquired a considerable degree of hardness. The calcareous rock in which these human remains are embedded, is an aggregate, composed chiefly of ZOOPHYTIC PARTICLES, and the detritus of common lime-stone. Its general colour is grayish yellow, and it is harder than statuary marble. There were shells in the mass; one of which appeared to be the turbo pica of Linnæus; it was in a worn state, and the brown spots were still distinctly seen on its surface. "Besides these bodies," continues Mr. König, "I found near the surface of the block, part of a bone of a concentric lamellated structure, apparently the fragment of a tusk, but of what animal I was unable to define. From this description of the rock, it will be sufficiently clear, that it is by no means of a stalactetic character, and, therefore, cannot be compared either with travertino, or any other chemical calcareous deposition of this kind. Its origin seems unquestionably to be that of common sand-stone; only, that the grains of which it is composed, have, in some parts, become confluent, and have formed a nearly compact lime-stone.

"Respecting the age of these fossil remains, if not much positive information can be derived from the preceding details, this will prove, at least, that the enveloping rock is not of a stalactetic nature; and that the bones, after they were deposited, underwent a degree of violence, which dislocated and fractured them, without removing the fragments to a distance from each other. It may, therefore, be safely concluded, that the surrounding mass must have been in a soft or semi-fluid state; which, whilst it opposed no effectual resistance to a shock from without, readily filled up the chasms produced by it." M. Lavaisse, above mentioned, states, that 'the bed of lime-stone in which these nodules, containing, in many instances, human fossil bones, are found, is nearly an English mile in length along the shore, and is covered by the waves at high water.'"

The head is wanting in this most interesting fossil specimen, and, also, the right arm, both the feet, and the ribs of the right side. Notwithstanding, however, this imperfect condition, the general form stands in high relief from the embedding lime-stone; and as the block is placed in an upright posture, the beautiful proportions of a female form, which appears to imply youth, and a striking, though fortuitous resemblance to the position of the celebrated Venus de Medicis, gives to the whole a degree of intense interest, which no other known fossil can, in the least degree, lay claim to. For, in contemplating this form "of other days," the mind experiences a mixed feeling of wonder, of curiosity, and of commiseration. We long to be made acquainted with the personal history, and to take an interest in the mental feelings which once belonged to this mortal form. What a tale of woe could she unfold, if now again endowed with speech! The dreadful scenes of her latter days would present a picture, which the most lively imagination is totally incapable of conceiving.

The mind derives a painful pleasure in dwelling upon the subject, and in tracing, in various colours, the incidents, the language, and the feelings, by which this stony body was once influenced, in a degree, as acute as we ourselves experience. The skull of Yorick is as nothing, when compared to this, as a moral lesson; for in the delicate female form now before us, we contemplate the actual bodily remains of one, who has painfully experienced the terrible judgments of an OFFENDED DEITY.*

I shall close this short, but interesting account of the human fossils of Guadaloupe, with the remark, that no hesitation could have been felt as to their being of antediluvian origin, had they been the remains of quadrupeds, and not of the human race: but so strong is the effect of pre-conception, that, although every thing here tends to demonstrate the fact in the clearest manner, yet the mind of the very able geologist I have just quoted, found a difficulty in admitting a fact so entirely inconsistent with all the received laws of the continental theories of geology.

We cannot question, however, the clearness of the fact, that this interesting specimen is the mutilated body of an antediluvian female, which, having lost the head, and being, in other respects, far gone in decay, became embedded, in this shattered state, in the muddy sediments of the diluvial waters; which sediments, composed of shelly detritus, and having, also, embedded in it the tusk of some quadruped, and various known

* In a former arrangement of our great national museum, this, the most interesting of all known fossils, occupied a highly conspicuous place. At the present time, it is concealed in an obscure corner of an obscure closet. It is to be hoped, that the managers of the British Museum will make such arrangement as may again exhibit this specimen, as it so well merits, in "the place of honour" of our splendid collection.

marine shells, has since been hardened into "a nearly pure lime-stone." When we examine the specimen of the crocodile, taken from the quarry at Shotover, (and now in Professor Buckland's collection at Oxford,) having sea shells attached to it, we never, for a moment, doubt that it was of antediluvian origin. Let us judge of this human fossil, accompanied, in like manner, by marine porductions, with the same degree of candour, and with an unprejudiced mind; and the theories which thus contradict the inspired narrative, with respect to the period of the creation of man, must for ever fall to the ground.*

I now proceed to state the phenomena exhibited in the lime-stone formation at Durfort, in France, as they are detailed and published by M. D'Hombres Firmas, in the seventeenth volume of the Bibliotèque Universelle, for 1821, p. 33.

M. Firmas opens his account of these phenomena, by remarking, that the environs of Durfort, near Alais, in the department of Garde, in the South of France, are of the highest interest to mineralogists, from the mines of calamine, crystals of barytes, and other minerals, which are abundantly found in that neighbourhood; where are, also, displayed "the most astonishing quantities of silicious, calcareous, and pyritous petrified SHELLS, some of which are of the rarest sort."

When M. Firmas was, for the first time, at Durfort, in 1795, he was informed by the peasants of the existence of a cave, which contained what they called petrified men.

He, at first, thought that this idea must have arisen from the stalactetic formations common to lime-stone cavities; and that the ignorant superstition of the peasants must have attributed to these the supposed human form. They added, however, the supposition, common in the country, that after some very ancient battle, the dead had been carried to this species of catacomb, which was every where known by the name of the Baoumo das Morts. These reports, however, made him very desirous of visiting the cave, and he was, accordingly, conducted to it, a little way to the north of the village, and almost at the top of the mountain of Lacoste, which is "of the old limestone formation," and the height of which is about 500 feet above the level of the Mediterranean. The mouth of this cavern consists of a fissure in the rock, into which one is obliged to descend nearly perpendicularly for above 10 feet, pressing, with the back and the knees, against the sides of the fissures, as chimney-sweepers do. They at length entered the baume des morts, which is a cavity not more than 10 or 12 feet in its greatest width, and in which a man of common stature can scarcely stand upright. The roof, the walls, and the whole interior of this cave, are lined with stalactite of a dirty white colour, approaching to brown. It is neither vast nor brilliant in its interior. "The unequal ground on which he stood, was formed of bones, covered with stalagmite, filling all the intervals which had separated them, and forming a solid mass of various dimensions."

"We detached some fragments from this mass, by means of a hammer and chisil; they were filled with bones, which we recognized as human, or, at least, the greater part of them; for there were many so broken and incrusted, that we could not decide whether they belonged to our own species, or to the bodies of other animals.

"We have shown these bones, such as the cranium, the jaws, and other parts, to some of the savans at Paris, and they admit not of a doubt as to what they must have originally belonged to. They seemed thrown together, pêle-mêle, in the pâte, which incloses them; and they are in such quantities, that they formed more than the half of the whole mass."

M. Firmas then attempts to account for the circumstances and phenomena attending this remarkable cave; in doing which, he first attributes the stalactites to the action of running water; and then very naturally asks, where that water could have come from? "For," says he, "the mountain of Lacoste is entirely separated from all the neighbouring heights; and the brooks, which run between these heights, are, consequently, very low. The rains could not have occasioned them, as it is evident that these stalactites have not made any perceptible progress in the course of the last 25 years.

"This grotto is not accessible to quadrupeds; the bones which it contains do not appear to have been worn by rolling: it could not have been a burying-ground of the country; for they never would have chosen a place so distant, and in the midst of the woods; besides, it would have been too difficult to have introduced bodies by the fissure through which we descended; and we looked in vain, in every part, both of the interior and exterior of the cave, for any other opening.

"There exists," says he, "in other countries, similar deposits of bones. We need not speak of those of Germany, Hungary,* Gibraltar, and the Archipelago; but the human bodies found near Soissons, in 1685; petrified bodies found in Guadaloupe; the incorporated bones in calcareous rocks, in a cave in Somersetshire; and also those of this Baume des Morts, are all evident instances of the fossil remains of our own species."

There is little occasion for further remark upon the fossil remains found in this cave: they are evidently attributable to the same diluvial cause, by means of which the innumerable lime-stone caves of all secondary countries have been so abundantly furnished. In our own country we have a vast variety of instances of this sort; many of them have been very fully detailed by Professor Buckland, in his Reliquiæ Diluvianæ; but from the particular geological theory which has arisen in consequence of his views, with respect to the cave of Kirkdale, viz. that it was inhabited by hyænas before the flood, who preyed upon the ELEPHANTS and RHINOCERI which pastured in the forests of Yorkshire, the true causes of such animal deposits have been hitherto, in a great measure, distorted or concealed. Having elsewhere shown the total fallacy of the whole of this theory, it follows that we must look for a principle less contradictory, and more consistent with the laws of nature, and with the phenomena themselves. This principle I have already, in some degree, explained; but I shall reserve the few remarks I have further to make upon the subject, until we have perused the details of the other fossil deposits connected with this branch of our inquiry.

The third remarkable instance of indiscriminate fossil remains, in which human bones have been very frequently found, is an immense congeries, displayed in a hill called Cueba Rubia, (or red cave,) near the village of Concud, in the province of Arragon, in Spain. This hill takes its name from a kind of red diluvial earth, which has been intersected and laid open by the waters of a mountain stream. Some of the bones contained in it are of the nature of common church-yard bones; some are solid, and well preserved; others seem pulverized, and fall to pieces on exposure to the atmosphere. They belong to a great variety of animals, and lie confusedly huddled together, or, as the French term it, pêle-mêle. Seven or eight human shin bones are frequently seen in one spot, without any other parts of the body. There are many articulations of the larger bones of animals mingled with them; and they are often filled with a crystalline substance. Don Guillermo Bowles relates, that he was informed of an entire human skeleton that had been there discovered: the thickness of this diluvial mass is described as being upwards of 60 feet. We have, in this remarkable instance, a complete identity of character and circumstances, with numerous other fossil deposits, which are of unquestioned diluvial origin: but, as is usual, wherever human bones have been found intermingled, it has been the custom with geologists, in their remarks on this mass, to attribute the whole to some comparatively recent cause. A candid and unprejudiced judgment of the facts cannot, however, fail to lead us to a very different conclusion.

Before proceeding to make any remark upon the similarity which obviously exists between the cave of Durfort with its fossil contents, and those of Kirkdale, Gaylenreuth, and so

* There cannot be a doubt, that if this lime-stone bed, on the sea shore of Guadaloupe, were properly examined, or if there were occasion to intersect it by quarries, we should soon obtain many other conclusive and undeniable proofs of its diluvial origin. A stratum of "pure lime-stone" cannot be supposed to extend a mile, or more, along a coast, without also extending laterally, in an inland direction, for a considerable distance. It has been long looked upon as the most probable origin of this bed, that the waters of the sea having, in many instances, a property of rapidly depositing calcareous matter, must have cemented together the sands upon that coast, and thus petrified every substance that happened to be embedded in them. This, it must be admitted, is taking a very prejudiced and limited view of the subject; for a conglomerate, thus formed of the varied particles of a common sea beach, would present a very different appearance in the fracture, from what is exhibited in the close and equal texture of the specimen in the British museum. There can be no doubt, that in a formation, containing one human fossil, accompanied by one tusk, and various shells, we might, on further inspection, discover such animals as that tusk must have belonged to, besides many other equally distinct proofs of the true period of the origin of this interesting formation.

* In the Carpathian chain of mountains, in Hungary, grottoes are very numerous, in some of the calcareous strata. The principal of these are, Mazarna, and Dupna, in the district of Thurotz; Drachenhole, in that of Liptau; Holgoez, in Zips; Altelek, in Geomor; and Sziliacz, in Torn. Bones and skeletons, partly petrified, are found in these grottoes; and the most beautiful stalactites of every size and form.

deposit, are expressed. The above passage is not written in that style of decided conviction in which he so beautifully expresses himself, when his geological views, however erroneous, are completely satisfactory to his own mind. We find no such hesitation with respect to the hyænas of Kirkdale, although their remains were also accompanied by such RECENT animals as the fox, the weasel, the horse, the fallow deer, the ox, the HARE, the RABBIT, *the mouse, and the water rat.

The remains of all these animals, and of many more, that might, with equal reason, be termed recent, were found at Kirkdale, and in other diluvial deposits, accompanied by those of elephants, lions, rhinoceri, &c., about which no doubt has ever been expressed: and yet, in the instance of Köstritz, the rhinoceros is to be looked upon as ancient and antediluvian, while the hare, the rabbit, the owl, the cock, and the man, are all to be considered post-diluvian; although, it "yet remains to be ascertained, by what means, or at what period," the remains of the two eras became mixed up together.

I have but one remark further to make upon the opinions professed, and the geological doctrines taught by the able author I have just quoted; and I do so, with a repetition of my former sincere profession of my highest respect for him as a public character, though I totally differ with him in the whole view he has taken of the Mosaic deluge. But I can, by no means, perceive the principle upon which he is so constantly and strenuously opposed to the occupation of some parts of the antediluvian world by the human race: for the disbelief, even in the probability of their remains ever being found,† amounts, in fact, to at least a doubt of their having existed at the same time as the animals, whose bones he admits to have belonged to that ancient period.

If they then existed, they must have perished with the other animals by the waters; if they perished, their bodies must have floated, and been submitted to the very same laws of tides and of currents, by which other animal bodies were scattered and dispersed over the bed of the sea, in every direction.

If they were so scattered and mixed up, (and it could not possibly be otherwise,) we can imagine no reason, why we should not find them, as we do other diluvial remains, only in that small numerical proportion, which, we are assured, they must have borne, if the history of Scripture is to be depended upon. That we may place implicit confidence in the information conveyed to us from this Inspired source, we have found many convincing proofs in the whole course of this general treatise; and we can, therefore, have no conceivable plea, short of a distinct desire to prove it wrong, for strenuously opposing the evidence of numerous facts, on the subject of the fossil remains of our own species.

It may, perhaps, here be expected, that some consistent and natural mode should be shown of the origin and cause of these remarkable caves and fissures, which, in so many instances, characterize the lime-stone formations, and intersect them in every direction. I should be sorry to involve either my readers, or myself, in the difficulties which this part of the subject might very possibly lead to. It has, hitherto, been too much the custom for science to endeavour, by some means or other, to account for every individual phenomenon presented to the view on the surface of the earth. By such injudicious attempts, many able men have led themselves into contradictions, beyond which they could not advance, and from which it was difficult to retrograde; and it is to be feared, that many of the errors of our geological theories have arisen from this mistaken course. Upon this subject of cavernous lime-stone, therefore, I do not hazard more than a passing opinion, confining myself to the facts which all such cavities invariably exhibit, and leaving this branch of the subject open to the more extended researches of future observations.

If it be true, as the Inspired Writings informs us, and as every appearance on the face of the present dry lands corroborates, that the "earth that NOW IS," is different from the "earth that THEN WAS;" and if my idea of the probable means by which the deluge was effected, is founded in reason, viz. that either the former dry lands sunk, or that the bed of the former sea was elevated, (in either of which cases the effects would be the same;) if these premises be well founded, it must naturally follow, that the lands we now inhabit, formed, before the deluge, the bed of the ancient ocean. If this be true, and that many of the secondary calcareous formations, which now almost every where cover the surface of the continents, were the result of gradual marine deposits, embedding sea shells in vast abundance, but no where containing remains of QUADRUPEDS, or other LAND PRODUCTIONS, we must conclude, that on the subsiding of the ocean, (or, as we term it, the diluvial waters,) into its new bed, the lands that were then, for the first time, left above the level of the sea, must have been in a soft and saturated state, and containing abundance of that marine fluidity, in the midst of which they had gradually been formed. We have already found, in the instance of that most extensive formation, the chalk, containing, as it every where does, positive and invariable marks of marine origin, without any indication of a single land production, that upon its moist and still movable surface, the retiring waves had produced a partial mixture between it and the diluvial gravels and soils, containing the remains of elephants, and other quadrupeds, besides vegetable substances in great abundance, (as on the coasts of Kent and Norfolk). Had it been the nature of chalk to crack and divide itself into such cavities and fissures, as we find in some other calcareous deposits, it is very certain that we should have found these cavities furnished, more or less, with those gravels, or loams, containing the remains of organic bodies. This is not frequently the case in the chalk, because it is not part of the nature of this formation to be cavous; but we have, even in the chalk, certain cavities also filled with diluvial gravel, of the origin of which it would be very difficult to give even a plausible conjecture. I allude to those well-like cavities so often seen in the chalk pits near London, and also frequently found in the sections of the French and English sea coasts.* We have, also, in the chalk an insuperable difficulty, in accounting for the regular cavities in which flint nodules have subsequently been formed. I say subsequently, because this fact is demonstrably certain, from the fossil shells, of the chalk formation, often embedded in the flints, as in the purest water.†

If we find ourselves in difficulty, with respect to these minor cavities, which must have occurred under the level of the sea, much more shall we despair of plausibly accounting for the more extensive and even stupendous grottoes peculiar to other marine deposits, as palpably having formed a part of the bed of the antediluvian ocean. One thing, however, is a well established fact, that there is an intimate and constant connection between the latest sediments of the waters of the deluge, with their animal and vegetable contents, and these upper calcareous formations. In the instance of the gypsum of the basin of Paris, the organic remains are not contained in cavities, but are completely incorporated in the body of a rock, so hard as to require to be blasted with gunpowder. Here is a positive proof that gypsum is a chemical deposit or formation, which was once in a fluid state; and we can have no hesitation with respect to the period at which this fluidity existed, illustrated, as the point is, by the identity of some of its fossils, with those of the superincumbent diluvial soils. If, therefore, gypsum was a fluid, at the period of the deluge, in the basin of Paris we have the strongest reasons for coming to a similar conclusion, wherever that calcareous rock is found to exist. At Köstritz, the gypsum is split into fissures,

* Reliq. Diluv. p. 17, 18. † Reliq. Diluv. p. 169, 170.

* These remarkable cavities, in the form of regular wells, of various depths, and, occasionally, of irregular forms, are exhibited in a remarkable manner in the chalk pits at Greenhithe, on the south bank of the Thames, between Dartford and Gravesend. There is, indeed, nothing more interesting, or instructive, in the geology of England, than the obviously diluvial origin of the superincumbent strata, upon the chalk, every where near London, where the wants of man, and the laws of nature, have, in so many places, combined to lay the whole formations completely open to our inspection. The almost invariably horizontal surface of the chalk, with the very marked irregularity of the new diluvial surface in the neighbourhood of Greenwich, Woolwich, Shooter's Hill, and all over that part of Kent, as well as on the northern shores of the Thames, must serve to explain this branch of our subject in the clearest and most obvious manner.

† I have formerly had occasion to make some remarks upon the fossil shells of the chalk formation, often found attached to, or filled by, pure flint. I have lately seen one of these fossil specimens, which has been cut through, and polished by a lapidary. The polish given to the flint is of the finest kind; and in looking into the transparent mass, we find many of the small spines, with which the shell was originally covered on its exterior surface, perfectly preserved, and lying in various directions, as if preserved in ice. No proof can be more distinct, that the flint was once in the state of a perfect fluid; and that this fluid state was subsequent to the deposit of the chalky mass, may be looked upon as equally certain. The cause of the irregular, though stratified cavities, in which flint nodules have been subsequently formed, must ever remain, however, a matter of conjecture; although, the obscurity of the cause does not, in any degree, affect the truth of the facts presented to our contemplation.

often filled, as they naturally would be, with the superincumbent gravel under which it is found. But the animal remains are of the very same description in the gypsum at both places, and the bones are in the same state of decay or preservation. We, therefore, have a right to conclude, that as the Paris gypsum was a diluvial formation, the bones, contained in it, could be no other than those of antediluvian animals. We must judge of the Köstritz gypsum by the very same law; there can, therefore, be no hesitation in considering the human bones of those quarries, as well as those of the domestic cock, and the rhinoceros which accompany them, as indisputable remains of the ancient world. The nature of all lime-stone cavities appears to be nearly the same in all countries. We hear of the bones of elephants in New Holland,* as well as in America, and in Europe, contained in similar caverns; and as we know of no other calamity so destructive as the Mosaic deluge, either from history, tradition, or animal remains, we must conclude that every LAND production, (together with such marine shells as often accompany them,) when found in our rocks and soils, is attributable to the action of the Mosaic deluge, and to that period alone.

CHAPTER XIV.

On the Situation of Paradise; together with both Critical and Geological Evidences of the spurious Character of that descriptive account of it, found in all Modern Copies and Translations of the Book of Genesis.

As the chief object of this treatise has been to show, from the evidence of history, corroborated by physical facts, that the greater part of the present dry lands of the earth formed the bed of the antediluvian sea, and that the former lands were utterly destroyed at the period of the deluge, "the earth, that now is," being thus distinct from "the earth, that then was,"† a question respecting the situation of the Paradise in which our first parents were placed by their Creator, has probably arisen in the mind of every one; and but for the interruption to the general course of the subject which this question must have given rise to, it should undoubtedly have been considered at an earlier period of this work; as there is, perhaps, no part of the Old Testament, as found in our translations, which has been so fruitful a source of error and misconception, as the descriptive account of the rivers of Paradise. These rivers are described as being four in number, of which the only one at present known is the Euphrates. The names of the other rivers, and the extraordinary and inconsistent geographical account of their supposed courses, have long been a source of anxious critical inquiry, as well as of local research: for almost all travellers who have visited the East, and had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the course of the Euphrates, have anxiously sought for the situation of Paradise; and have, invariably, been obliged to relinquish the subject, from the utter impossibility of applying the description, in the slightest degree, to any part of the course of that noble river.

Mr. Granville Penn, in his "Comparative Estimate of the Mineral and Mosaical Geologies," has entered, at considerable length, and with his usual ability, into a critical examination of this subject; and has most clearly shown the high probability, amounting almost to certainty, of the descriptive part of the Garden of Eden, as found in all modern translations of the original text, having been originally annexed, as an explanatory note, to the margin of an early MS. and having been, subsequently, incorporated into the body of the work, by the ignorance of a subsequent transcriber, as has also occurred in some other parts of the Sacred Writings.

In support of this opinion, he shows, on the authority of the most learned critics, both ancient and modern, that copies of the Hebrew Scriptures formerly existed, which exhibited variations, arising from marginal glosses and insertions, originally designed as illustrations of the text, but which illustrative glosses had become, in some instances, incorporated into the text in subsequent copies.

One remarkable example, given by this able writer, of an incorporated gloss in the New Testament, and which is not so generally known as it deserves to be, is well adapted to show the nature of similar incorporations, and of the serious mischief to which they invariably lead; for truth is, in all instances, so consistent and simple, that any deviation from the plain tenor of its course, must, generally, excite observation, as the following remarkable instance has frequently done. This example is found in the remnant of a very ancient Greek MS. of the New Testament, in the Royal Library at Paris, entitled the Codex Ephremi, which has been pronounced, by Wetstein, to be of the same date as the celebrated Alexandrian MS. In this work, the first five verses of the 5th chapter of St. John's Gospel are thus read:

went down at a certain season into the pool. Now there is at Jerusalem by the sheep-market a bath which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches. In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, blind, halt, withered,* and a certain man was there which had an infirmity thirty and eight years.	troubling of the waters.
When Jesus saw him, &c.

* For an angel After this, there was a feast of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. Now there is at Jerusalem, &c. &c.

† Waiting for the troubling of the waters.

"In the MS. in question," says Mr. Penn, "the text, and the marginal sentences, though both are in the same uncial character, are written by different hands; and it is evident, from the language, and from an itacism, perceptible in the latter, that they are of a date posterior to the former. It is equally manifest, that they were marginal notes, annexed with the design of illustrating the popular superstition, under which the infirm man was waiting at the bath: but, at the same time, they adopt the superstition, and aver it to be true. The original text was free from that blemish; and the simplicity and close sequence of the recital, bear internal evidence that these marginal passages are alien to it. The superstitious clause, therefore, does not pertain to the evangelical historian, but has become incorporated into his history in the progress of transcription."*

Although the passage we are now to consider in the second chapter of Genesis, in which the descriptive account of the situation of Paradise is found, has not the advantage of so clear and distinct an evidence of its spurious character, as that of St. John above mentioned, yet there does appear, in the narration itself, the strongest internal evidence of the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th verses of that chapter, having been, subsequently, inserted into the original text, in a manner precisely similar, from a marginal note, intended, by some ignorant transcriber, as an illustration of the subject. When we add to this internal critical evidence, the remarkable geological proofs of the correctness of this view of the subject, the mind becomes fully confirmed in this opinion; and this, the only part of the Inspired Writings which stood in contradiction to the geology exhibited in the rest, becomes at once both consistent and clear.

It appears, therefore, nearly certain, that the text and gloss originally stood thus, as Mr. Penn has most ably shown:—

* Specimens of fossil bones and wood were sent home by Mr. Crawford from the district of Ava, in latitude 21 degrees north. Amongst these bones were found those of two new species of the mastodon, together with the bones of the hippopotamus, rhinoceros, antelope, deer, the ox, the hog, the tortoise, and the alligator.

From the instances, few as they are, with which we are already acquainted, of such fossil deposits, in tropical, as well as in temperate and polar regions, we can have no doubt of the general and indiscriminate dispersion of animal bodies over every region of the earth; and that if the wants of man, in Asia, and in Africa, required such extensive operations under the surface of the ground, as have brought to light so many fossil treasures in Europe, and in America, we should often there discover the remains of animals as unnatural to hot climates, as the elephant and alligator are to cold ones.

The above passage is not written in that style of decided conviction in which he so beautifully expresses himself, when his geological views, however erroneous, are completely satisfactory to his own mind. On the Situation of Paradise; together with both Critical and Geological Evidences of the spurious Character of that descriptive account of it, found in all Modern Copies and Translations of the Book of Genesis.

As the chief object of this treatise has been to show, from the evidence of history, corroborated by physical facts, that the greater part of the present dry lands of the earth formed the bed of the antediluvian sea, and that the former lands were utterly destroyed at the period of the deluge, "the earth, that now is," being thus distinct from "the earth, that then was,"† a question respecting the situation of the Paradise in which our first parents were placed by their Creator, has probably arisen in the mind of every one; and but for the interruption to the general course of the subject which this question must have given rise to, it should undoubtedly have been considered at an earlier period of this work; as there is, perhaps, no part of the Old Testament, as found in our translations, which has been so fruitful a source of error and misconception, as the descriptive account of the rivers of Paradise. When Jesus saw him, &c.	† Waiting for the troubling of the waters.

"In the MS. in question," says Mr. Penn, "the text, and the marginal sentences, though both are in the same uncial character, are written by different hands; and it is evident, from the language, and from an itacism, perceptible in the latter, that they are of a date posterior to the former. It is equally manifest, that they were marginal notes, annexed with the design of illustrating the popular superstition, under which the infirm man was waiting at the bath: but, at the same time, they adopt the superstition, and aver it to be true. The original text was free from that blemish; and the simplicity and close sequence of the recital, bear internal evidence that these marginal passages are alien to it. The superstitious clause, therefore, does not pertain to the evangelical historian, but has become incorporated into his history in the progress of transcription."*

Although the passage we are now to consider in the second chapter of Genesis, in which the descriptive account of the situation of Paradise is found, has not the advantage of so clear and distinct an evidence of its spurious character, as that of St. John above mentioned, yet there does appear, in the narration itself, the strongest internal evidence of the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th verses of that chapter, having been, subsequently, inserted into the original text, in a manner precisely similar, from a marginal note, intended, by some ignorant transcriber, as an illustration of the subject. When we add to this internal critical evidence, the remarkable geological proofs of the correctness of this view of the subject, the mind becomes fully confirmed in this opinion; and this, the only part of the Inspired Writings which stood in contradiction to the geology exhibited in the rest, becomes at once both consistent and clear.

It appears, therefore, nearly certain, that the text and gloss originally stood thus, as Mr. Penn has most ably shown:—

Now the Lord God had planted a garden in Eden from the first; and there He put the man whom He had formed; and out of the ground the Lord God had made to grow every

And a river went out of Eden, for to water the garden, and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads (or sources).* And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that goeth in front of Assyria; and the fourth river is Euphrates.	And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it, and to keep it, &c. &c.

* Specimens of fossil bones and wood were sent home by Mr. Crawford from the district of Ava, in latitude 21 degrees north. Amongst these bones were found those of two new species of the mastodon, together with the bones of the hippopotamus, rhinoceros, antelope, deer, the ox, the hog, the tortoise, and the alligator.

From the instances, few as they are, with which we are already acquainted, of such fossil deposits, in tropical, as well as in temperate and polar regions, we can have no doubt of the general and indiscriminate dispersion of animal bodies over every region of the earth; and that if the wants of man, in Asia, and in Africa, required such extensive operations under the surface of the ground, as have brought to light so many fossil treasures in Europe, and in America, we should often there discover the remains of animals as unnatural to hot climates, as the elephant and alligator are to cold ones.

* Comp. Estim. vol. ii. p. 233.

and does not answer to the text, is manifest; for the text mentions only one river, whereas, the gloss undertakes to describe four rivers.

"Michaelis shows, that the original word, translated heads, denotes sources, in the Syriac and Arabic languages; and he expressly states, that it never signifies the branches of a river in the Oriental tongues. Thus, the final confluence of four contributary streams, from the four sources or heads, to which the historian traces them in Eden, produced one river, discharging itself out of Eden, of which he speaks; which four heads, therefore, can have no relation to the four rivers recited by the scholiast in the gloss; because, no river separates itself into different rivers downwards; on the contrary, it is the nature of all rivers to grow by confluence."

Mr. Granville Penn proceeds thus:—"Most certainly," observes Kennicott, "the closest attention should be paid, in biblical investigations, to all such mistakes as introduce confusion and contradiction. Neither of these could have obtained originally; and both of them have frequently been objected by the advocates of infidelity."

"But," adds Mr. Penn, "the case before us exhibits a signal example of that contradiction; and, therefore, of the obvious necessity of demanding, and therefore warranting, the critical interposition which has here been undertaken. For the destruction of the primitive earth is a fact rooted in the very substance of the Sacred Scriptures, and spreading its roots from the text of Moses to that of St. Peter; whereas, the contradiction of that fact, contained in the above geographical gloss, lies loosely and unrooted on the surface, and only on this particular point of it. Since, then, a manifest contradiction of the former is produced by the presence of the latter; and since the one must, of necessity, give place to the other, it is unquestionably the office and the duty of sound and scrupulous criticism, to demonstrate the invalidity of the latter, in order that the important testimony of the former may stand unimpaired."*

Having now viewed this part of our subject critically, we may proceed to the geological proofs above alluded to, which proofs, being altogether unknown to Mr. Penn, at the time his valuable work was written, the judgment he has above given becomes of the greater value. Since the period of his publication, we have had the advantage of perusing the descriptive sketches of an intelligent traveller in the East, whose remarks, as far as they relate to our present subject, are of the greater consequence, from the circumstance of their having been written without any theory in view, without any geological knowledge, or the smallest desire of supporting or opposing any particular question.

The traveller I allude to is Mr. Buckingham, who, in the year 1816, accompanied one of the caravans which cross the Syrian desert from Aleppo to Mousul, on the Tigris, from whence he proceeded to Bagdad, on his way to India. He thus had an opportunity of passing through the region of Mesopotamia, which is bounded by the two great rivers, the Euphrates, and the Tigris; and by a route across the deserts of that country, which had not been passed by any European writer during nearly a century.

I shall now proceed to give a few extracts from Mr. Buckingham's work, which must throw the most important light upon the subject of our present inquiry; and as the nature of the soil over which he passed, is mentioned merely in a casual manner, and is altogether unconnected with the chief objects he had in view, there can be no just cause for hesitation or doubt as to the correctness of the statement.

He first came upon the river Euphrates, at Beer, where he crossed it, and where he considered its breadth to be about that of the Thames, in London.

"Its greatest depth did not seem to be more than ten or twelve feet. Its waters were of a dull yellowish colour, and were quite as turbid as those of the Nile; though, as I thought, much inferior to them in sweetness of taste. The earth with which it is discoloured, is much heavier, as it quickly subsided, and left a sediment in the bottom of the cup, even while drinking; whereas, the waters of the Nile, from the lightness of the mould, may be drank without perceiving such deposit, if done immediately on being taken from the river."

"The town of Beer, which is the Birtha of antiquity, is seated on the east bank of the Euphrates. The river is here about the general breadth of the Nile, below the first cataract to the sea, and is at least equal to the Thames at Blackfriars bridge. The people of Beer are, in general, aware of the celebrity of their stream; and think it is the largest in the world. It still preserves its ancient name, with little corruption, being called by them Shat-el-Fraat, or the River of Fraat. It is known, also, as one of the four rivers of Paradise; and the only one, seemingly, which has preserved its name. The river Gihon, which is mentioned, also, in the Koran, was thought, by an Indian pilgrim of our party, to be the Gunga of the Hindoos; and the rest assented to its being in the innermost India. It is true, that it is said to compass the whole land of Ethiopia; but Herodotus speaks of Indian Ethiopians in his time; and, among early writers, the word Ethiopia was applied to the country of the black people generally."

We have here another instance of the error and inconsistency which is evident in the descriptive clause respecting the rivers of Paradise. The whole geography of the Euphrates is now well known, and that it runs into the Persian Gulf, after being, like all other rivers, enlarged by many additions, of which the Tigris is the most considerable. It is, therefore, both unnatural that it should divide into large rivers, of various diverging courses; and, contrary to fact, that any part of it compasseth the whole land of either Indian or African Ethiopia.

But this idea of Mr. Buckingham, respecting INDIAN Ethiopia, appears entirely without foundation, in as far at least as Scripture is concerned.

Mention is very frequently made of Ethiopia, and of the Ethiopians, in various parts of the Old Testament, both in the historical and in the poetic books; but in no one instance does the term imply any allusion to India, or to the East. On the contrary, Egypt, and Ethiopia, are almost always mentioned together, as forming parts of the same great African continent.*

Salust, in his Jugurthine war, gives us a very luminous view of the geography of Africa, and of its various nations, as far as both were known in his day; and he places Ethiopia next to "loca exusta solis ardoribus," or the countries burnt up by the heat of the torrid zone. This same valuable historian, in a fragment which has been preserved, tells us, "that the Moors, a vain and faithless people, as all Africans are, would make us believe, that, beyond Ethiopia, there is an antipodes, a just and amiable people, the manners and customs of which resemble those of the Persians."

We shall have occasion, in the next chapter, to notice some customs amongst the Africans of the interior, which are evidently derived from their Asiatic progenitors.

"The banks of the river, at Beer, are steep on both sides, and of a CHALKY SOIL." "There are many perpendicular cliffs within and around it, indifferent directions; in these are many large caves, and smaller grottoes. They are of a hard CHALKY substance, and the cavities have furnished the materials for the building of the town.† The whole presents a mass of glaring white, which is painful to look upon in the sun."

After leaving Beer, and on his way to Orfah, over a very flat and desert country. Mr. Buckingham proceeds; "we were now come into a more uneven country than before; the height of many of the eminences gave them the character of hills; and they were, throughout, formed of lime-stone rock, of a rounded surface, and, generally, barren. In the valleys

* Comp. Estim. vol. ii. p. 242.

* A few instances from the Old Testament, in order to show this close connection, may here be of use.

"Now it came to pass, in the days of Ahasuerus (this is Ahasuerus which reigned from India, even unto Ethiopia, over 127 provinces;") &c.—Esther i. 1. also viii. 9. that is, from east to west, or from the most distant parts of Asia, even unto the interior of Africa.

"For I am the Lord thy God the Holy one of Israel, thy Saviour; I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee."—Isaiah xliii. 3.

"Thus saith the Lord, the labour of Egypt, and the merchandise of Ethiopia, &c. shall come unto thee."—Isaiah xlv. 14.

"Philistia, and Tyre, with Ethiopia."—Psalm. lxxxii. 4.

"Moreover, the Lord stirred up against Jehoran, the spirit of the Philistines, and of the Arabians, that were near the Ethiopians."—Chron. xxi. 16; that is, the Red Sea only dividing them.

"Ethiopia and Egypt were her strength, and it was infinite."—Nahum iii. 8 and 9.

Moses, also, when residing in Egypt had married an Ethiopian woman.

"He shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt; and the Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps."—Daniel xi. 42; see also the whole of the 20th chapter of Isaiah. Besides these, many distinct instances might be quoted, to show that Ethiopia is never alluded to in Scripture, but with reference to a province of Africa; and, consequently, that there could be no possible connection between any branch of the Euphrates, and that distant country.

† It is highly probable, from the nature of the secondary rock above described, that these "large caves and smaller grottoes" were such natural cavities as are peculiar to some calcareous formations.

were some few patches of cultivated ground, but the rest was covered with a long wild grass." We have here, again, on these extensive plains, all the outward form and character of that chalky formation, exposed to view in the channel of the Euphrates, at Beer.

On arriving at Orfah, we find a repetition of the above secondary indications, in the following extract. In the course of a walk round the outside wall of the city, Mr. Buckingham remarked, in the construction of the wall, three distinct periods of very ancient building. The foundation was evidently of an extremely remote period. "The surface of the blocks of stone," says he, "was, in general, much corroded by the action of the air; and, on a close examination, I was surprised to find them mostly blocks of coral and sea shells, such as are seen in the cliffs along the shores of the Red Sea, in a state of decay. In some of these, the substance seemed to be a mass of lime, in a state of decomposition, which crumbled at the touch, into a white salt-like powder. In others, the large oyster, with the small queen, or fan shell, was repeatedly and distinctly seen, with still more numerous examples of those smaller ones, like ram's horns, so frequent among the sands of every sea-beach. Other parts, the surfaces of which had become hardened by the action of the air, looked like coarse lime-stone, crossed by harder and finer veins of pure marble. These stones were all in the original structure of the wall, though, of what age, it would be difficult to determine. But the nature of the stone is well worthy of remark, in a situation so remote from any sea, and so elevated above the level of the ocean, beneath which, alone, it could have been formed. I had seen no such rocks in the way to Orfah; though no doubt the quarries from which the stones were taken, are not far remote; but, in the neighbourhood of Aleppo, there are several masses of hardened shells and coral, appearing above the surface of the ground."

We find a similar instance of secondary formation mentioned by Xenophon, in his Anabasis, 3. p. 212, who describes, in the following terms, a very large city, which the Ten Thousand passed in their famous retreat: "marching, the rest of the day, without disturbance, they came to the river Tigris, where stood a large uninhabited city, called Larissa," (probably, the Resen, mentioned as a great city, Gen. x. 12.) "anciently inhabited by the Medes, the walls of which were 25 feet broad, and 100 in height, all built of brick, except the plinth, which was built of stones, and 20 feet high. The plinth of the wall was built of polished stone, FULL OF SHELLS,* &c."

These very casual observations, on the Geology of Mesopotamia, serve to indicate, in a remarkable manner, the general secondary and diluvial nature of the whole surface of that eastern region, which is composed either of secondary rocks, or diluvial sands and soils; for the calcareous or chalky character of the rocks, appears evident from the distinct mention of the fossil sea shells contained in some of the few specimens to which the traveller's attention had been attracted. The object, in quoting these extracts, is not with the view of any general information, as to the secondary nature of a great part of Syria, and the regions east of it; as our former general view of those regions tended distinctly to prove that the whole of that part of the continent of Asia, with but few exceptions, was of that secondary character. But as the chalk formation is here described as forming a considerable part of the course of the Euphrates, upon which the primitive Paradise is said to have existed, the subject is thus brought, geologically, to a positive issue.

For if it has been satisfactorily proved, in the course of this treatise, that the chalk formation formed a part of the bed of the antediluvian ocean, and that the chalk basins of geologists must have become charged with their present diluvial contents at the period of the deluge, it is an inconsistency, of the most glaring kind, to look for the site of the primitive Paradise upon the surface of a secondary country, then forming the bottom of the sea, as is satisfactorily proved by the nature of its rocks, and by the marine fossils contained in them; which, like all secondary formations, in other parts of the earth, could only have become habitable dry land, by the interchange of level between the old lands and the ocean, at the period of the deluge.

No one can, therefore, persist in his search for Paradise, in a country avowedly secondary in its rocks, and diluvial in its sandy deserts, or richer soils, without advocating a theory in geology still more inconsistent and wild, than has yet been advanced; for as we can trace, over all these regions through which the Tigris and the Euphrates flow, the same monuments of the flood, which are so remarkable in every other quarter of the world, in the form of boundless deserts of sand mixed with salt and shells, we might as well look for the rich and beautiful regions of our first parents in the plains of America or of Africa, as expect to discover any trace of them on the banks of the river Euphrates.

We thus come to the same point, geologically, which various writers have before reached critically; and we have, in this united evidence, a striking example of what must ever happen, where human reason interferes with the sublime and consistent simplicity of DIVINE REVELATION.

CHAPTER XV.

On the Creation of Mankind.—The Origin of Language. What was the Primitive Language?—High Probability in favour of the Hebrew.—On the Diversity of Colour among Mankind.—Testimony of the Jews on this Subject.—Origin of the American Indians.—Their traditions and Customs.—Their Religious Belief.—Religious Rites in the Interior of Africa.—On Sacrifice.—Traditions and Belief in the Friendly Islands.—Historical Evidence of a common descent from Noah.—On the Identity of Words among the most distant Nations.—On the universal use of a Decimal gradation.—Natural Inference from all these Considerations.

It may, by some, be looked upon as an inconsistent and uncalled-for departure from the geological inquiries which form the main object of this treatise, to take, in this place, a rapid view of a subject so apparently unconnected with the structure and phenomena of the earth, as the languages, the complexions, the traditions, and the customs of many of the most distant nations. But when we consider, that the design of thus tracing the history of the earth, as recorded by inspiration, is to oppose those theories of philosophy which would expand the well-defined periods of the Mosaic history into indefinite periods, during the long lapse of which, both the mineral world, its inhabitants, and its languages, gradually became what we now find them, by the progress of society, in the one case, and by the mere laws of nature in the other, without any aid from a superior power; it may be readily admitted to be a point of no small importance, in corroboration of the correctness of the views we have taken of the earth, if we can discover, from an equally general view of the human race, and of their various languages and customs, decisive proof of the recent creation of man, of the still more recent action of the deluge, and, consequently, of the entire confidence with which we may refer to the Mosaic record, for a true account of the early events upon the earth.

The evidence which may be adduced of the general origin of all the languages of the globe, when added to the remarkable traditions of the deluge, which have already been noticed, may serve to confirm, in sceptical minds, the unerring truth of the sacred volume, when it announces to us, first, that all mankind have sprung from one pair, created on the sixth and last day of the creation; secondly, that, after upwards of sixteen hundred years of increase over a portion of the then dry land, the whole of that race perished by an awful judgment of the Almighty, excepting one single family; thirdly, that whatever the languages of the antediluvian world might have been, that single family had but one individual language, which was handed down by them to their descendants; and, fourthly, that from the deluge to that period in which the descendants of Noah had so far increased in number, and in wickedness, as to endeavor to elude any similar effect of the divine wrath, by building the tower of Babel, in the plains of Shinar, "the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech," which language was there "confounded," or scattered, by the will of the Almighty; so that the people were interrupted in their impious intention, and "scattered abroad," in various tribes or clans, "over the face of the whole earth."

With respect to the original language which Moses describes our first parents as making use of, from their very first creation, we are no where informed in what manner they first acquired it, nor how it was communicated to them. It is, indeed, probable that the inspired historian addressed himself to those who were much less sceptical on such subjects than ourselves; and that this remarkable endowment, peculiar to the human race, and by which they so far excel all other created beings, was never, in early times, doubted as having been directly communicated from the same wise and provident source from whence the human race itself had arisen; and the researches of the wisest and most learned men of all ages have invariably led them to the same natural conclusion.

* The great pyramid of Cheops, in Egypt, stands, like the other pyramids of that country, in a plain, composed of calcareous rock. It is formed of lime-stone, of a grayish white colour, and which exhales a fetid odour when broken by a smart blow. Thus we find another instance, of one of the earliest edifices, of post-diluvian man, formed of a secondary rock, and standing on a secondary formation.

We have no direct means of positive knowledge as to what relation the primitive language of the earth may have had with existing tongues; but, in the absence of such evidence, we may form some conjectures on the subject, which are certainly marked with the highest probability. In the first place, we must consider that the numbers of the antediluvian human race, and their consequent divisions into nations, could not have been nearly so great as in the present day, from the comparatively short period they had existed, and from the comparatively unrefined condition natural to a primitive race of beings, on whom the gift of reason was obviously bestowed by the Creator, for the purposes of exertion, and of gradual cultivation and improvement. We must not here suppose, however, with too many advocates of an erring philosophy, that man was, at first, naturally savage, or in the state we now find the wild and uncultivated natives of savage countries; or that religion and knowledge were, in the first days, in the debased condition we now too often find them, in the remote corners of the earth. The savage state is not natural to man; but, on the contrary, is brought on by erring from the true path of knowledge, in which both Adam and Noah must have brought up their first descendants; and which, in both instances, was communicated in a direct manner, from the unerring source of every good which mankind now enjoys. In considering the progressive stages of society, we are too apt to content ourselves with merely looking back, from our own times, into the darker ages of barbarism, and thus to form our ideas on the false supposition, that the primitive nature of man is one of perfect ignorance, and such as we now find amongst the savages of Africa or America: whereas, if we trace the progress of society, in its proper and natural course, by descending from the creation, and from the deluge, instead of ascending from our own times, we shall find that the primitive state of mankind, even immediately after the creation, was one of intelligence and understanding, if not in arts and sciences, at least on the leading point of religion, which is, of all others, that in which the savage falls most short of the civilized man. It pleased his Creator to bestow upon primitive man a full and perfect conception of the relation in which he stood towards the Supreme Being; and it was in order to preserve a knowledge of the true religion among men, that a certain family and race were afterwards expressly chosen; we find, accordingly, that to whatever state of idolatrous ignorance, or savage barbarity, the various ancient nations of the earth were, from time to time, reduced, there was always some portion of the world, and especially of the Jewish race, which adhered to the true faith, and which was, consequently, preserved from that state of unnatural debasement from which man has a constant tendency and desire to emancipate himself. It is, therefore, highly probable, that as we hear of no diversity of language on the earth, until after the deluge, the whole primitive race was "of one language, and of one speech," and that that language must, consequently, have been the same spoken by those few individuals who were preserved from the flood.

Now, when we consider the great scheme of the Almighty, foretold from time to time, from the days of Adam to those of Abraham, and continued from thence, in a well defined course of history, to our own times; when we consider the wonderful and miraculous events that were foretold, and were afterwards so literally fulfilled, in the line of the chosen people of God; that, through them, and through their language, the Inspired Writings of the early times, were to be for ever handed down to the generations of men; that of all the languages of the earth, the Hebrew tongue, like the Hebrew people, has hitherto withstood every change and every calamity; and been, like them, miraculously preserved by the Almighty will, for a great and beneficent end; and when we further consider the strong analogy and filiation, so easily traced, in all the languages of the earth, to the Hebrew, as the most probable post-diluvian original tongue; when all these considerations are combined, is it unreasonable to conclude to the high probability of the original language of the Sacred Scriptures being the pure and original tongue first communicated to man by his Maker? In considering, then, the language of the Hebrews as the most probable source from whence all other tongues have been derived; and when we trace in all these other tongues, the gradual varieties that have arisen, and are still now proceeding in the dialects of the earth, by the secondary causes, and, seemingly, trivial accidents, by which the different shades of language are brought about, are we not strongly reminded of the same character which we have traced in the primitive and secondary formations of the mineral world? Are we not justified in drawing a comparison between the miraculously preserved primitive language, and the no less miraculously preserved chosen people, who are the constant living miracle, bearing unwilling witness to the truth of Inspiration, to all the generations of mankind? We are reminded, that it was repeatedly foretold in prophecy, that the Hebrew nation should be dispersed into all countries; yet that they should not be swallowed up and lost amongst their conquerors, but should subsist, to the latest times, a distinct people; that, "though God would make an end of the nations, their oppressors, He would not make an end of them."

In the common course of human events, who has heard of, or seen, so unusual a thing? The mighty monarchies of Assyria, of Persia, of Greece, and of Rome, have vanished, like the shadows of the evening, or passed rapidly away, like the shining meteors of the night. Their places know them no more; nothing remains but the great moral of their tale. But this chosen people of God, contemned by all nations, without a friend or protector, yet secure amidst the wreck of empires, oppressed, persecuted, harassed by edicts, by executions, by murders, and by massacres, has outlived the very ruins of them all. Well may we exclaim, "Truly this is the Lord's doing, and, therefore, so marvellous in our eyes."

Before, however, proceeding further with the consideration of the languages of the earth, it may not be uninteresting, or uninstructive, to make a few observations on a different subject, which, like language, has given rise to much theory and hypothesis amongst men; and on which subject, the same remarkable people may assist in enlightening us. I mean, the varied colour of the human race.

Notwithstanding all the arguments which have been made use of, and the modified exceptions which may be produced, there is no general conclusion more certain, than that the complexions of men are influenced by the temperature of the climates they have long inhabited; and that, in common circumstances, the equatorial regions, nearest the level of the sea, are inhabited by the darkest of the human race; while the cooler temperatures of the earth, either from atmospheric, or polar elevation, produce a race of men, of various degrees of whiteness. We must not, however, estimate the degree of heat in any climate, merely by its distance from the equator; for the climates of the earth are most materially affected by a variety of circumstances; such as their elevation above the level of the sea; the height of the neighbouring mountains; the comparative extent of land and water, and the like. Thus, there are no native negroes in America, although the torrid zone extends across that continent. But the extent of its neighbouring oceans, its lofty mountains, in many instances covered with perpetual snow, cool the scorching breezes of the torrid zone, and convert it into a comparatively temperate climate. The inhabitants of this New World are, therefore, found to be only of a tawny, or copper-coloured complexion.

But the most remarkable instance of the effects of climate, in changing the colours of men, after a certain period, may be found in the history of the Jews; that race, which we know were once all of one colour, but which are now found dispersed among the nations, and assuming, in every clime, the varied tint of the individual people amongst whom they dwell, without, however, having one drop of blood in their veins but what has flowed in a direct line from their patriarch Abraham. In Britain, and in more northern countries, they are fair; in Spain, and Portugal, they are brown; in Arabia, and Egypt, they are copper-coloured; while in Abyssinia, and in India, they are almost wholly black.

Dr. Buchanan, is his Christian Researches, in treating of the Jews of Cochin, in India, says, "It is only necessary to look at the countenances of the black Jews, to be satisfied that their ancestors must have arrived in India many ages before those of the white Jews. Their Hindoo complexions, and their imperfect resemblance to the European Jews, indicate that they have become detached from the parent stock, many ages before those of the north and west."

Bishop Heber, in his Journal in India, makes the following just and interesting observations on this subject. "The Indians consider fairness as a part of beauty, and a proof of noble blood. They do not like to be called black, and they taunt the Abyssinians, who are sometimes met with in the country, on the charcoal complexion of the Hubshee. Much of this taste has, probably, arisen from their country having always been a favourite theatre for adventures from Persia, Greece, Tartary, Turkey, and Arabia: all white men, and all, in their turn, possessing themselves of wealth and power. It is remarkable, however, to observe, how surely all these classes of men, in a few generations, and without any intermarriage with the Hindoos, assume the deep olive tint, little less dark than a Negro, which seems natural to the climate. The Portuguese natives form unions among themselves alone, or, if they can, with other Europeans; yet they have, during a three hundred years residence in India, become as black as Caffres."—Heber's Journal, vol. i. p. 54.

It is evident, therefore, that in the many various shades which mankind are found to assume in different parts of the earth, according to the different temperatures of climate, there can be no sound argument raised against a common origin from a parent stock. The varied colour of mankind appears to be the effect of a mere law of nature, instituted, no doubt, for a beneficial purpose by the Creator, which purpose may, probably, be one day explained, like so many other obscurities in the wonders of creation.

It has been found by Dr. Franklin, that black transmits heat more readily than any other colour; and the subject has since been investigated, and confirmed, in various conclusive experiments, by Mr. Leslie, and Count Rumford. We may, therefore, reasonably conclude, that the dark colour of the human race, which is found to increase in proportion to the scorching influence of the sun, is a wise provision of the Almighty, for cooling the fever of the blood, under the intemperate rays of a tropical climate.

But to return from this digression, to the subject of language, which we were before considering.

As recorded history cannot be looked for in wild and savage nations, we can only hope to find some traces of the origin of such nations in their traditions, or in their language. In the former of these, however, we can, in general, only look for approximations to truth; as, however sound their foundation may originally have been, they generally become, in a long lapse of time, so clouded with error, and obscured by the superstition which usually accompanies the ignorance of uncivilized states, that even the early histories of the most polished nations are unsatisfactory and obscure. Much less then can we expect any defined account of the rise or progress of the nations of the New World, or in the still more distant parts of the earth. All travellers in America, however, who have taken any notice of this subject, record the tradition, common amongst many of the tribes of that continent, with regard to their originally having come from a great distance, and having been urged forward by the advance of other tribes, in much the same manner as the European states were overrun by the northern hordes towards the decline and fall of the Roman empire. But whether these American tribes were urged on, by sea or by a land communication with the Old World, towards the north, must probably now remain for ever a subject for speculation and conjecture.

It may be interesting in this place, however, to make a few remarks upon some of the customs and traditions of the Indian tribes in America, which, in many instances, tend to confirm, in the most remarkable manner, the fact of their descent from the common parent stock in the Old World, although the manner of their entering the American continent has not yet been in any degree, ascertained. A tradition is mentioned by Hunter, as common to many of the Indian tribes, that their ancestors were forced to migrate from a north or north-east direction, towards the south. It has already been remarked, that these Indian tribes all count their time, or days, from sunset to sunset, in the same manner as the Hebrews, though contrary to our established customs in Europe. Their year, also, begins with the spring, and is divided into 13 moons.* They relate, that the Great Spirit created, at first, one of each sex, and placed them on an island in the midst of the great waters, which, as the human race increased, was enlarged, by supernatural means, to the present extent of the earth. Their traditions respecting the general deluge have been already noticed. They are a highly moral people, and acknowledge one supreme, all-powerful, and intelligent Being, called the Great Spirit, who created and governs all things. "They believe, in general, that after the hunting grounds had been formed and supplied with game, He created the first red man and woman,* who were very large in their stature, and lived to an exceedingly old age; that He often held councils, and smoked with them, and gave them laws to be observed; but that, in consequence of their disobedience, He withdrew from, and abandoned them to the vexations of the Bad Spirit, who has since been instrumental to all their degeneracy and sufferings."—Hunter's North America, p. 214.

"By the term Spirit, the Indians have an idea of a being that can, at pleasure, be present, and yet invisible."

"They have no particular day set apart for devotion, though they have particular times, such as a declaration of war, restoration of peace, the season of the harvest, and the new moons.† In general, however, a day seldom passes with the elderly Indians, or others, who are esteemed wise and good, in which a blessing is not asked, or thanks returned to the Giver of life; sometimes audibly, but most generally in the devotional language of the heart." "All their serious devotions are performed in a standing position." "On some occasions of joyous festivals, lamps, constructed of shells, and supplied with bear's grease, and rush wicks, are kept burning all the preceding and following night." "In all the tribes I have visited, the belief of a future state of existence, and of future rewards and punishments, is prevalent."

"I have seen an instance, wherein a prophet, or priest, burnt tobacco, and the offals of the buffalo, and deer, on a kind of altar, formed of stones, on a mound." ‡

In Lander's Journal, to explore the course of the Niger, in Africa, we find the following account of a sacrifice offered annually at Kiama. "This is the eve of the Behum Sàlah, or Great Prayer Day, on which day, every one here, who possesses the means, is obliged to slaughter either a bullock or a sheep; and those who may not have money sufficient to procure a whole one, are compelled to purchase a portion of the latter, at least. The Mallams make a practice of slaughtering the sheep which may have been their companion in their peregrinations for the past year; and as soon as the feast is over, they procure another to supply its place, and to undergo the same fate on the following year." After describing the religious ceremonies of the day, Mr. Lander proceeds: "When the priest had finished, he descended from the hillock, and, with his assistants, slaughtered a sheep, which had been bound and brought to him for sacrifice. The blood of the animal was caught in a calabash; and the king, and the most devoted (devout) of his subjects, washed their hands in it, and sprinkled some on the ground."

The very remarkable analogy between this African ceremony and the Jewish passover, and other sacred ordinances, is too striking to require comment. Amongst many other savage nations, the custom of an offering is so common, that a glass of water is never drank, or a morsel of food made use of, without a little of it being first thrown upon the ground, as an offering to their deity or fetish.

This, and many other instances of sacrifice, to be found in the best accounts of the American and the African savages, would be, of themselves, sufficient to prove, most distinctly, their descent, in both cases, from Adam. For it has always been admitted, that the ordinance of sacrifice could have, in no way, occurred to the human mind but by a direct command from the Creator, such as must have been given to our first

---

* This most natural idea of beginning the circle of the year with the Spring, is highly interesting, when found to exist in a savage country like America.

The ancients were of the same opinion, as we find from many passages in their writings; and especially in those beautiful lines in the second Georgic, where the Poet describes the effect of Spring and proceeds thus:

> Non alios prima crescentis origine mundi
> Illuxisse dies, aliumve habuisse tenorem
> Crediderim; ver illud erat, ver magnus agebat
> Orbis, et hibernis parcebant flatibus Euri,
> Cum primum lucem pecudes hausere, virumque
> Ferrea progenies duris caput extulit arvis,
> Immissæque feræ silvis, et sidera cluo.—Geor. 2d, 336.

* It is a circumstance not unworthy of remark in this place, that the name of our first parent Adam was bestowed upon him from the red earth, from which he sprung; Adam having this signification in the Hebrew tongue.

† "Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast day.

"For this is a statute for Israel, and a law of the God of Jacob."—Psalm lxxxi. 3, 4.

parents themselves; and which, in the case of their two eldest children, led to the acceptance of the one, and the rejection of the other, from the presence and the absence of belief or faith in its efficacy. From Cain and Abel, and their descendants, we hear of a continual course of sacrifice, both in the line of the true believers, and in heathen nations, down to the times of Christianity; whence it has been carried on, in Christian countries, by the new dispensation; and, in the heathen nations, by the varied course of blind superstition, common to a state of degenerate man.

In Mr. Mariner's sketch of the Friendly Islands, we are informed, that the savage of Tonga believe in gods, or supreme beings, who have the power of dispensing good and evil to mankind, according to merit; and that there are also, evil spirits, or mischievous gods, who torment the wicked, as a punishment for their deeds. The respect which they pay to these imaginary beings is so great and universal that scarcely any instance is known of direct impiety, though they consider many things meritorious which we consider criminal.

Their ideas of the origin of the world are so singular, and so strong an indirect proof of their original descent, that I shall here mention them. They believe that originally, there was no land above the waters of the sea; but that when one of their gods, named Tangaloa, was fishing in the ocean, his hook became fixed at the bottom; he exerted his strength, and presently there appeared, above the surface of the waters, several points of rock, which increased in number and extent, the more he drew his line. The rocky bottom of the ocean was now fast advancing to the surface, when, unfortunately, the line broke, and the Tonga islands remain to show the incompleteness of the operation. The earth thus brought to the light of day, soon became replete with all kinds of plants and animals, (such as exist in an imaginary island, called Bolotoo, or the residence of the gods,) but they were of an inferior quality, and subject to decay and death. Tangaloa now sent two of his sons to dwell in Tonga, and to divide the land between them. But one of these sons was industrious, and the other idle, and envious of his brother, whom at length he killed. On which his father confined him, and his race, to the Tonga islands for ever, to be black in their persons, and to have bad canoes; while he sent the children of his murdered son into a distant land, to be white in their colour, as their minds were pure; to be wise and rich, and to have axes and large canoes in the greatest abundance.

That this singular tradition, in these the most remote islands of the earth, must have been handed down from their continental progenitors, clearly appears from some of their customs, which bear a close analogy to those of ancient Asia, as well as from some words in their language, which will be afterwards noticed.

At their funerals, they wound the head, and cut their flesh with knives and shells, as a testimony of respect to the memory of the dead. This is a custom which we find expressly forbidden in the 19th chapter of Leviticus, 28th verse. "Ye shall not make any cutting in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you; I am the Lord." The natives of these islands also practise circumcision, a custom so remarkable, that it could only have been derived from the very ancient religious rite, commanded at first to Abraham. They also offer sacrifices to their gods; and, as in other countries, an INNOCENT victim, such as a young child, is considered most likely to expiate sin. This sacred rite, so universal in the world, and one which unassisted reason never could have conceived, is, of itself, sufficient to show the primitive descent of these distant islanders, from the parent stock of Noah.

When we add to these remarkable customs and traditions, the conclusive evidence of the common tradition of a general deluge; and, also, the equally convincing proof to be derived from an almost identity of language in many general expressions, common to all nations; we cannot resist the conclusion to which we are led; we must admit, that accident alone could never have produced such remarkable identity; and, consequently, that the truth of the Mosaic record is fully established, as to the gradual descent of all the present human race, from the one family preserved at the deluge.

It only now remains for us, after having thus found such circumstantial evidence of a common descent, to consult the most authentic history on this interesting point, and we shall find the strongest reason to give up all hesitation or doubt that may have still lurked in our minds. The historian I am about to cite, is Josephus, a writer, whose works are of such importance to history in general, and to Scripture history in particular, that many have not hesitated to consider him nearly in the light of an inspired authority. Though this may be going too far, yet it must be admitted, that this remarkable man, from the uncommon circumstances in which he was placed, at a period of the Jewish history, avowedly miraculous; from his great candour, his extensive learning, and admitted probity, in the difficult situation in which he was placed, as the intimate friend of the enemy of his country, can scarcely be looked upon in the light of a common historian. When we add to these, his almost miraculous escapes from death, his prophetic dreams, and his luminous writings, preserved entire, while so many others, of that period, have been for ever lost, one can scarcely fail to be convinced that this man was raised up by the providence of God, for great and useful purposes, which no subsequent writer could be expected to accomplish, with a like authority.

This valuable historian, in taking a general view of the early history of the world after the deluge, distinctly shows the origin and names of a large proportion of the nations then known to the Romans. He was addressing this review of the early events on the earth, to an enlightened and learned people, amongst whom, as the intimate friend of the Emperor Titus, he held a high rank. He appears, in his writings against Apion and other Greek authors, who had attempted to throw a doubt upon his accounts of the early history of the Jews, to have had the most full and minute acquaintance with the whole range of Grecian and Egyptian literature, and was, therefore, by his equally intimate acquaintance with the history and traditions of the Jews themselves, perhaps the only individual that can be named, who was qualified to view the subject in a wide and unprejudiced field.

Josephus, then, in taking a general view of the early events in the post-diluvian world, distinctly shows the origin of many of the nations, then known to the Greeks by other names than they originally had; and proceeds thus:

"After this, they were dispersed abroad on account of their languages, and went out, by colonies, every where; and each colony took possession of that land which it lighted upon, and unto which God led them, both the inland and maritime countries. There were some, also, who passed over the sea in ships, and inhabited the islands; and some of these nations do still retain the denominations which were given them by their founders; but some have lost them also; and some have only admitted certain changes in them, that they might be the more intelligible to the inhabitants; and they were the Greeks who became the authors of such mutations; for when, in after ages, they grew potent, they claimed to themselves the glory of antiquity, giving names to the nations that sounded well in Greek, that they might be better understood among themselves; and setting agreeable forms of government over them, as if they were a people derived from themselves."—Antiquities, book 1st, chap. v.

Without entering more fully into the clear account given of the dispersion of mankind, in the 6th chapter of the first book of the Antiquities of the Jews, I shall here content myself with strongly recommending its perusal to the attention of any one desirous of following out this interesting subject; and with referring to the annexed genealogical scheme, which comprises the whole information given us by Josephus on this point; it will clearly show, at a glance, the outline of the first dispersion of mankind from Noah. The subsequent stages, and more minute ramifications of this vast tree, must be traced out by history, and by the customs, traditions and languages, now existing among the nations.

We may now proceed to the consideration of the identity in some parts of the languages of various nations, before alluded to; but this part of our subject has been already so ably handled by Dr. Mason Good, in his Book of Nature, that I shall not hesitate, (in adopting his views of the subject,) to present to my readers an extract from that most able work, which will place the subject before them in the clearest possible light.

"Articulate language," says that able writer, "is of two kinds, oral and legible; the one, penned, or printed, and addressed to the eye; the other, spoken, and addressed to the ear. Written language distinguishes civilized man from savage man, as speech distinguishes man in general from the brute creation. It is of so high an antiquity, that, like that of the voice, it has been supposed, by many good and wise men, in all ages, to have been a supernatural gift, communicated either at the creation, or upon some special occasion, not long afterwards; yet there seems no satisfactory ground for either of these opinions.

"That it was not communicated, like oral language, at the creation of mankind, appears highly probable, because, first, it by no means possesses the universality which, under such circumstances, we should have reason to expect, and which oral language actually displays. No tribe, or people, have ever been found without a tongue, but multitudes without a legible character; and amongst the different tribes and nations that do possess it, it is far from evincing that unity, or similarity in the structure of its elements, which may be traced in those of speech, and which must be the natural result of an origin from one common source; for the system of writing, among some nations, consists in pictures, or marks representative of things; among others, in letters, or marks, symbolical of sounds; besides, there does not seem to be the same necessity for Divine interposition in the formation of written characters, as in that of oral language; the latter existing, the former might be expected gradually to follow, in some shape or other, from that imitative, and inventive genius which belongs to man, especially in a civilized state.

"With respect to oral language, those who have most deeply studied the subject have generally come to the conclusion, that nothing short of Divine Power could have given rise to so wonderful a gift.

"Some schools of philosophy, indeed, have supposed, that man, when created, had no greater gift of tongue than is found amongst the various kinds of brutes; and that it was only by gradual steps in civilization that perfect language arose. This is arguing upon the same principle as the strange opinions of Buffon, and others, who derive the race of man from monkeys, and who, in exhibiting the ourang-outang, have hence denominated him the satyr, or man of the woods.

"If the above opinion were admitted to be just, we should have a right to expect that the language of a people would always be commensurate with their civilization. It so happens, however, that although language, whatever be its origin, is the most difficult science in the world, (if a science it may be called,) it is one in which savages of all kinds exhibit more proficiency than in any other. No circumnavigator has ever found the inhabitants of the most distant islands deficient in this respect, even where, in every thing else, they were almost in a state of nature.

"There is, in all the languages of the earth, a general unity of principle, which evidently bespeaks a general unity of origin; a family character and likeness, that cannot possibly be the effect of accident. The common divisions, and rules of one language, are the common divisions and rules of the whole; and hence, every national grammar is, in a certain sense, and, to a certain extent, an universal grammar, and he who has learnt one foreign tongue, has imperceptibly made some progress towards a knowledge of other tongues. Diversity of language consists, not in different sets of articulations, but only in a difference in their combinations and applications. No people have ever been found so barbarous as to be without articulate sounds; and no people so refined and fastidious, as to wish to add to the common stock.

"But independently of an uniform circle of articulations, and an uniform system of grammar, there is also an uniform use of the very same terms, in a great variety of languages, to express the same ideas, which cannot possibly be accounted for, except upon the principle of one common origin and mother tongue. I mean, particularly, those kind of terms, which, under every change of time, and every variety of climate, or of moral or political fortune, might be most naturally expected to remain immutable; as, for example, those of family relationship, and patriarchal respect, or descriptive of such other ideas as cannot but have occurred very generally to the mind, as those of earth, sky, death, Deity, &c."

I do not here propose following Dr. Mason Good through the whole course of his most interesting research, but shall merely select a few of the most striking examples, which must be fully sufficient for my present general purpose.

"In our own language, the term papa, and father, describe the paternal character, both are as common to the Greek language as our own, and have, probably, alike arisen from the Hebrew source; and it may fearlessly be affirmed, that there is scarcely any language or dialect in the world, polished or barbarous, continental or insular, employed by blacks or whites, in which the same idea is not expressed by the radical of the one or the other of these terms. The term father is still found in the Sanscrit, and has decended to ourselves, as well as to almost all other nations in Europe, through the medium of the Greek, Gothic, and Latin. Papa is still more obviously a genuine Hebrew term, and has a much wider spread over Asia, Africa, and the most barbarous islands of the Pacific, extending from Egypt to Guinea, and from Bengal to Sumatra and New Zealand.

"The terms for son are somewhat more numerous than those for father; but one or other of them may be traced almost as extensively, as may the words brother, sister, and even daughter, which last, branching out, like the term father, from the Sanscrit, extends northward as far as Scandinavia.

"The generic names for the Deity, are chiefly the three following, Al, or Allah, Theus, or Deus, and God. The first is Hebrew, the second Sanscrit, the third Persian; and besides these, there is scarcely a term of any kind by which the Deity is disiguated in any part of the world, civilized or savage. Among the barbarians of the Philippine Islands, the word is Allatallah, obviously the God of Gods, or the Supreme God, and it is the very same term in Sumatra. In the former islands, we meet with the terms malahet for a spirit, which is both direct Hebrew and Arabic; is and dua, one and two, which are Sanscrit and Greek; tambor, a drum, which is also Sanscrit; and inferno, hell, a Latin compound of Pelasgic or other Oriental origin. In the Friendly, and other clusters of the Polynesian Islands, the term for God is Tooa; and in New Guinea, or Papuan, Dewa, both obviously from the Sanscrit, whence Eatooaa, among the former, is God the Spirit, or the Divine Spirit, ea meaning a spirit in these islands. They also apply the Hebrew el, as the Pelasgians and the Greeks did, to denote the sun; whence ellangee means the sky, or sun's residence, and papa-ellangee, father of the sky or spirits.

"The most common term for death, amongst all nations, is, mor, mort, or mut. It is mut in Hebrew and Phœnician; it is mor, or mort, in Sanscrit, Persian, Greek, and Latin; it is the same in almost all the European languages; and it was with no small astonishment, the learned lately discovered that it is the same in Otaheite, and some other of the Polynesian Islands, in which mor-ai is well known to signify a sepulchre, or, literally, the place or region of the dead; ai meaning a place or region in the Otaheitan, precisely as it does in Greek; an elegant and expressive compound, which is, perhaps, only to be equalled by the Hebrew zalmut, literally death shade, but, in our Bibles, rendered shadow of death.*

"Sir, in our own language, is the common title of respect; and the same term is employed, in the same sense, throughout every quarter of the globe. In Hebrew, sir, or sher, imports a ruler, or governor; in Sanscrit and Persian, it means the organ of the head itself; in Greek, it is synonymous with Lord; in Arabia, Turkey, and amongst the Peruvians in South America, it is employed as in the Greek; and is not essentially different in Spain, Portugal, Italy, and France. In Germany, Holland, and the contiguous countries, the s of the Hebrew sher, is dropped, and it is converted into her.

"Man, in Hebrew, occurs under the form of maneh, a verb signifying to discern or discriminate, and, as a noun, signifying a discriminating being. In Sanscrit, we have both these senses. Hence, menu, in both Sanscrit and ancient Egyptian, means Adam, or the first man, emphatically THE man. Menes was the first king of Egypt, and Minos the chief judge amongst the Greeks. Hence, also, in Greek, men and menos, signifying mind, and the Latin mens, the mind, is the same. In the Gothic, and in all the northern dialects of Europe, man imports the same idea as in our own tongue. In Bengal and Hindostan, it is manshee; in the Malayan, manizu; in Japanese, manio; in Atooi, and in the Sandwich islands generally, tane, tanato, or tangi, while manawe imports the mind or spirit; and in New Guinea, or Papuan, it is sonaman. In this utmost extremity of the southern world, we also meet with the term Sytan, for Satan, or the source of evil; and Wath (German Goth,) for God. But it may perhaps be observed, that, in all the southern dialects of Europe, we meet with no such term as man, nor even in the Latin, from which so many European languages are derived, and which has homo for man. Yet, it is clear, that homo itself is derived from the common root. Its adjective is hu-man-us, human, while man, or min, is found in every inflection below the nominative case, as homin-is, &c.: the former nominative itself was ho-men, from whence it is clear that ho is redundant, and did not originally belong to the word. The negative of homo is ne-homo, now pronounced nemo in the Latin; in which latter the ho has been dropped. The ho is also omitted in the feminine of homo, which is fe-min-a, and was, at first, FEO min-a, from feo, to produce; literally, the producer of man or min. From feomin-a, we have also our own, and the common Saxon term wo-man, the f, and v, or w, being convertible letters in all languages, of which we have a familiar instance in the words vater and father, in German, and English."

* In Otaheite, the natives direct their voyages by the sun, moon, and stars; and they have names for many of the constellations, resembling, in several instances, those of the Greeks.

All the above cases, and many more that might be produced, are confederating proofs, that the various languages and dialects that are now, or ever have been spoken, have originated from one common source; and that the various nations that now exist, or ever have existed since the deluge, have originated from one common cradle or quarter of the world; and that that quarter was an eastern region, as we might, a priori, have supposed, from Asia having been the first land peopled after the flood.

"But besides this singular coincidence in language, over the whole inhabited earth, there is, also, a most remarkable confirmation of the same unity of origin, in the correspondence between all nations whatever, where any traces of the art of arithmetic exist, in the employment of a DECIMAL gradation.

"Whence comes it to pass, that blacks and whites, in every quarter, the savage and the civilized, wherever a human community has been found, have neither stopped short of, nor exceeded a series of ten in their calculations; and that as soon as they have reached this number, they have, uniformly, begun a second series with the first unit in the scale, as one ten, two ten, &c.? Why have not some nations broke off at five, or others proceeded to fifteen before they began a second series? Or why have the generality of them had any thing more than one single and infinitesimal series, and consequently, a new name for every unit? Such an universality cannot possibly have existed, except from a like universality of cause; and we have, in this single instance alone, a proof equal to mathematical demonstration, that the different languages into which it enters, and of which it forms so prominent a feature, must, assuredly, have originated not from accident, at different times, and in different places, but from direct determination and design, at the same time, and in the same place; that it must be the result of one grand, comprehensive, and original system. Such system could not have been of human invention: what then remains for us, but to confess that it must have been of Divine and Supernatural communication?

"Such examples, though few, are abundantly sufficient to establish the point; and they even lead us to a second and catenating fact, namely, that the primary and original language of man, that language divinely and supernaturally communicated to him, in the early ages of the world, has been broken up, confounded, and scattered, in various fragments, over every part of the habitable globe; that the same sort of disruption that has confounded former continents and oceans, and intermingled the productions natural to different hemispheres and latitudes, this same Power has assaulted the world's primeval tongue, has overwhelmed a great part of it, wrecked the remainder on distant and opposite shores, and turned up new materials out of the general convulsion: and if it were possible for us to meet with an ancient historical record, which professed to contain a plain and simple statement of such supernatural communication, and such subsequent confusion of tongues, it would be a book, which, independently of any other information, would be amply entitled to our attention, for it would thus bear an index of commanding authority on its own forehead.

"Such a book is now in our hands. Let us prize it, for it must be the WORD OF GOD, as it bears the direct stamp and testimony of His works."*

CONCLUSIONS

To which we are naturally led by the general tenor of the foregoing inquiry.

Having completed the proposed general survey of the system of geological phenomena, on every part of the earth's surface, let us now take a retrospective view of the various conclusions to which we have been led, in regarding the Creation, and the laws to which all created beings have been submitted by the Almighty. And, first, we have found it unreasonable, and unphilosophical, to subscribe to the doctrines, too commonly taught, wherein the first production of all things is supposed to have arisen by the mere laws of nature, or from secondary causes, within a chaotic or imperfect mass; because, in adopting this opinion, we find ourselves as far removed as ever from the ORIGIN of things of which we were in search: for even were we to admit, with the Wernerian school of philosophy, the primary existence of an aqueous chaos, and that the laws of nature have, in an indefinitely long period of time, gradually produced the beautiful order and arrangement we now admire in the universe; we should still have to account for the component parts of that chaotic mass, which could not have come into being by any of the known laws of nature: and being thus driven to acknowledge a Creative Power, capable of producing even a chaos out of nothing, and of establishing those wonderful laws which now govern the world, we should find ourselves, without any available object, derogating from the Wisdom and Power of a Creator, by denying a PERFECT creation of all things in the beginning. If we are forced to this conclusion, with regard to the actual structure of the mineral body of the earth, we are even more forcibly convinced of this great truth, by a survey of the animal and vegetable world with which it is furnished. For when we consider the evident design, which is so remarkably displayed in the structure of these bodies, we must feel satisfied, that though the laws of nature may, and do, now regulate them, they never could have, at first, produced them. We have found, that as it is unreasonable to suppose the first man to have ever been an infant, or the first oak tree to have sprung from an acorn, we are forced to the adoption of the only other alternative left for our choice; and we must, therefore, conclude, that both animal and vegetable productions were, at first, CREATED in their mature and perfect forms, and were then submitted to those laws which have ever since been in action in the world. And when we are unavoidably led thus far by our reason alone, and when we then consult the only History of the early events of the world that is within our reach, we find this Record announcing, in the most unequivocal terms, that "in the begining, God CREATED the heaven and the earth;" and that, "in six days He made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, resting on the seventh day, and hallowing it," as a day of rest and of worship for all the generations of men.

And with respect to the nature and duration of those six days, so particularly defined in the Record, which it pleased the Creator, for an obviously wise and beneficent end, to occupy in this incomprehensible work of creation, we can have no reasonable doubt that they were such days as are now, and ever have been, occasioned by one revolution of the earth on its axis; first, because a perfect creation may be as easily the work of one day, or of one moment, as of thousands of years; secondly, because the supposed longer periods of philosophy, were only called for in the erroneous idea of gradual perfection, from an imperfect creation, which idea we have found such reason altogether to condemn; and thirdly, because that Record, on the evidence of which our confidence has been confirmed, on the subject of perfect creation, has distinctly defined each of these days by its evening and its morning, which terms, so often repeated, can be, in no way, applicable to the supposed indefinite periods above alluded to.

Secondly,—We have found reason to conclude, that the first great geological change which took place after the creation of the solid mass of the globe, was occasioned by that fiat of the Almighty, on the third day, by which the waters, equally covering the whole mineral surface during the first and second days, were "gathered together into one place," that the "dry land" might appear; and as this "gathering together of the waters" of the sea, could not have taken place, according to the laws of gravity and of fluids, by accumulation, it must have been effected by a depression of a portion of the surface of the earth, into which the waters would naturally flow. This depression could not have taken place without a partial derangement of a thin portion of the earth's surface; and from this partial derangement, acted upon by the laws which have, at all times, governed the ocean, we derive the earliest secondary formations, now found resting upon the primitive mineral mass.

Thirdly,—We discover an adequate and reasonable origin for a great portion of the other secondary formations, now found upon the earth, in the action, during a period of sixteen hundred and fifty-six years, of those laws of nature, by which a constant removal of mineral debris is taking place, from the dry land, to the bed of the ocean: and in considering the existing action of those laws which govern the waters, we find a natural and easy solution of the problem of horizontal stratification, and individual mineral arrangement, which has occasioned so many erroneous conclusions in some schools of philosophy. And we further discover the most convincing proof of the erroneous nature of the Wernerian theory, of primitive rocks having been formed in an AQUEOUS chaos, in the circumstance of no primitive creation, such as granite, having ever been discovered amongst what are denominated secondary rocks, although these latter are known to have arisen in the self-same AQUEOUS medium.

* The Book of Nature, by Dr. Mason Good.

Fourthly,—We have found, in considering the subject of the deluge, that, as the phenomena presented to our consideration, over every part of the present dry lands, correspond minutely with the terms of the Mosaic record, where it informs us of the intention of the Almighty to destroy the antediluvian dry lands, as well as their inhabitants; that great and awful judgment must have been occasioned by the gradual interchange of level between the former seas and lands: that we are, consequently, now inhabiting the bed of the antediluvian ocean; and that all the fossil remains of animals, or vegetables, now discovered in our rocks or soils, were either embedded in the course of the gravel formation of the secondary strata, under the waters of the former sea, (as in the case of the marine productions in chalk, and many other calcareous marine formations,) or were thrown into their present situations by the waters of the deluge, and embedded (as in the case of quadrupeds, vegetables, human beings and other land productions,) in the soft soils and strata so abundantly formed at that eventful period, by the preternatural supply of materials for secondary formations.

Fifthly,—As it can be plainly demonstrated, by existing causes, and existing phenomena, that the animals and plants, the fossil remains of which are now found in uncongenial climates, could not have existed in a living state, where their remains are often now discovered; as a general inundation could not possibly take place upon the globe, without the entire destruction of animal life, and the total overthrow of the whole vegetable kingdom; as it is a well known law of nature, that animal bodies, when destroyed by drowning, invariably float at one period of their decomposition; and that almost all vegetable substances, being specifically lighter than water, must always come to the surface, at least for a time; and as such floating animal and vegetable bodies could not but follow the action of the winds, the tides, and, more especially, the CURRENTS of the then universal ocean, some of which currents have, at all times, a tendency from the equatorial regions towards the poles; from all these several reasons, we cannot come to any other rational conclusion, but that all the fossil remains of land productions, over the whole surface of the present dry lands, became embedded in their present situations at the period of the Mosaic deluge; and that, consequently, the climates of the earth have been, in no way, suddenly changed, as some philosophers have thought it necessary to suppose; but that, on the contrary, the antediluvian animals and plants must have been distributed over the various climates of the former dry lands, and in nearly the same latitudes in which similar existing species are now respectively found.

Sixthly,—As we have found the most conclusive proofs, that, amongst other animal fossils, the remains of the human race are not unfrequently found, although, in that small numerical proportion to those of other species, which the sacred history would lead us to expect, we must entirely reject those doctrines of philosophy which teach a gradual perfection in the animal creation; and which suppose that man was not yet created, at the period when those animals, the remains of which we now discover, existed on the earth.

Seventhly,—We feel our belief in the Mosaic record, of all these wonderful events, strengthened and confirmed by the many traditional, and other proofs that have been brought forward, of all the present human race, in every climate of the world, having sprung from one family, and from one period, which period was that of the Mosaic deluge; and that that post-diluvian family origin must have first arisen in Asia, is proved by the affinity of so many common expressions in the languages of even the most remote islands, with the original languages of that portion of the globe.

Lastly,—As all these conclusions, to which we have been naturally led, in the course of this inquiry, tend to corroborate, in the most distinct manner, the history of the early events on the earth, as given in the Mosaic, and other books of Scripture, our confidence in the unerring accuracy of these records, is firmly established; for by such collateral evidence we should try the veracity of any other ancient history: but when we add to the usual qualifications of a correct historian, the incomprehensible guidance of divine inspiration, so clearly evinced by numerous prophecies distinctly fulfilled, we feel that the conclusions to which our inquiries have conducted us, by the simple evidence of reason and of facts, are only such as might have been anticipated, when we consider the unerring source from which this divine guidance or inspiration flowed; and that both the events, and the inspired record of them, which has been so wonderfully preserved for our information, are SUPERNATURAL and DIVINE.

ON

PORTIONS OF THE PSALMS.

BY

ANDREW THOMPSON, D. D.

LATE MINISTER OF ST. GEORGE'S, EDINBURGH.

LECTURE I.

"Give ear to my words, O Lord; consider my meditation. Hearken unto the voice of my cry, my King, and my God: for unto thee will I pray. My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up. For thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness; neither shall evil dwell with thee. The foolish shall not stand in thy sight; thou hatest all workers of iniquity. Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing; the Lord will abhor the bloody and deceitful man. But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy; and in thy fear will I worship toward thy holy temple." —PSALM v. 1.—8.

You have been often addressed on the subject of prayer, —on the obligations you are under to engage in it; on the importance and necessity of attending to it; and on the encouragement which you have respecting it, from the example and experience of the people of God in every age. Now, let me ask you, if you really make it a part of your Christian work? Do you ever pray? Are you frequently at a throne of grace? Is it the habit of your life to "make your requests known unto God?" Can you affirm with truth that, regularly, or as often as occasion requires, you ask in order to receive from him the various blessings which are essential to you, both in this life, "and in that which is to come?" Just consider what judgment must be pronounced upon you, on the supposition that conscience commands you to answer these questions with a negative, and that you must be counted among those who "restrain prayer before God."

In the first place, you act in opposition to your sense and your confession of what is right. You know that you ought to pray. You are convinced that this is incumbent upon you. You allow that those are far wrong who neglect such an institution. And how then can you repel the charge of inconsistency, when prayer, notwithstanding, is excluded from your practical system? We desire you not to pray, merely in compliance with our earnest exhortation, or in conformity to the pious example of your brethren. In this, as in all other cases of a similar description, we say, "let every one of you be fully persuaded in his own mind." Take the matter into consideration. Examine it attentively and thoroughly. Try it by the test of reason; weigh it in the balance of the sanctuary; adopt every proper mode of bringing it to a just and conclusive issue. And if the inquiry shall terminate in showing you, that you are not bound to pray—that there is no propriety in praying—that neither your comfort nor your interest is concerned in it—then, do not pray. We ask you not in any case to act contrary to the serious and decided dictates of your own mind. And, above all, we ask you not to act thus in a case like the present, in which a conscious approval of the exercise is necessary to prevent it from being at once unacceptable and profane. But, on the other hand, if the lesson which you learn from Scripture—if the determination of the question to which you have come—be, that men should, and must pray—and that you can learn any other lesson on this point from Scripture, or that you can come to any other determination of the question respecting it, as professing Christians, may be held impossible—then have we not cause to wonder and to complain that, in spite of what you have learnt and of what you admit to be your duty, you are as negligent of prayer, as if you had learnt, and as if you maintained, that it was not your duty? You acknowledge that you ought to pray—nevertheless you forget, or you refuse to pray. Is not this a palpable and unworthy contradiction in your character? And why should you permit it to exist? What excuse can you bring forward to justify it? Or how can you account for it, except by tracing it to an ungodliness and a depravity in the heart which overpowers the efforts of your understanding, and proclaims your bondage to that sin from which it is the very province of prayer to seek deliverance? We call upon you to banish this practical solecism. Let your conduct correspond with your real and avowed convictions. And let the first voice of your supplications be for grace to make you love what you know to be dutiful, and to infuse into your soul the spirit, while it guides you to the practice, of true devotion.

But we must remind you, in the second place, that by neglecting prayer, you resist the authority of God. Are not you aware, my friends, that God has commanded you to pray?—that he has not left you to discover this by mere inference, but has announced it in terms not more precise than they are emphatic?—and that the injunction holds such a conspicuous place, and is so frequently repeated in his word, as to show the vast importance which he attaches to the manner in which it is treated? And, aware of these things, how can you venture to treat it with contempt, and yet hope to prosper? What title have you to expect that, in this particular, more than in any other, you can disobey God with impunity? Think you that he does not mean what he declares, or that he will not fulfil what he has promised, or that he will not execute what he has threatened? Or can any apology be wisely or successfully pleaded for withholding from him the homage which he demands, and refusing to put up to him those petitions, which are equally called for as tokens of submission to his will, and of respect for his character? No, my friends: it is from the throne of unlimited sovereignty that he speaks, when he commands you to pray; and disobedience to this is just as criminal and just as dangerous as disobedience to any other precept of his law. I say that he speaks to you from the throne of unlimited sovereignty, that you may be deterred from trifling with his behests when he exacts from you the tribute of prayer. But I must add that his throne of sovereignty is a throne of grace; and that if the commandment comes armed with the sanction of stern authority, it also comes recommended by the charms of tender mercy. God is the hearer of prayer, in virtue of his compassion to sinners: and, had he not been a being in whom compassions abound, so far from giving you access to his presence, and laying it upon you as a peremptory obligation and an express duty to make use of that privilege, he would have forbidden you to address him, and shut his ear against your cry, and left you to perish in your apostacy. But, looking upon you with pity, and desirous to extend to you every needful blessing, he is ready to listen to your applications; and, in order to secure, as it were, your coming to him that you may have your every want supplied and your every evil remedied, he not only opens up "a new and living way" of approach, but he clothes himself in majesty, and, by issuing his high mandate, shuts you up to the necessity of praying to him, under the penalties of disobedience to the united voice of righteous authority and unmerited love. And I put it to you, my friends, how you can bring yourselves to be guilty of such disobedience, and yet go on to live as if you were submitting to the divine will by being men of piety and prayer. O do not continue any longer in such a delusion as this. Either cease to neglect prayer before God, or cease to think that you are submissive to him. Either be habitually given to this exercise, or acknowledge that you are self-convicted rebels against the government of him who "ruleth over all." And remember that rebellion here is as fatal to those who are chargeable with it, as if they had violated the most important enactment of the moral law.

And now I have to state, in the third place, that without prayer, vain will be to you all the provisions that are made in the Gospel for your deliverance and happiness. The Gospel is a dispensation of divine wisdom and goodness. It proposes to bestow upon sinful men the benefits of salvation. But it proposes to bestow them in a certain way, and according to a certain scheme. And nothing is clearer than that they cannot be received and enjoyed without a humble acquiescence, on the part of those to whom they are communicated, in the method by which it has pleased God to impart them. Now, do you know any ground for thinking that these benefits can ever belong to those who do not pray for them? It is distinctly taught, that if you ask them in prayer, believing, they shall become yours. But where is it taught within the whole compass of the Bible, that the prayerless sinner shall be saved?—that you need not supplicate one of the blessings of redemption, and yet be as sure of obtaining them all as if you had?—that pardon has even been procured, or that heaven has ever been reached, by a single individual who has not sincerely felt, and cordially put forth the desire for them? There is no such thing taught in the Bible; and you must be sensible that the very contrary of this is what the Bible uniformly maintains and inculcates. You cannot fail to perceive that, agreeably to the constitution of the Gospel, salvation is the end at which you aim, and prayer the means by which you are to attain it; that the connection which God has established between these is close and inseparable; and that the husbandman may as well expect to reap a harvest where no seed has been sown, and no culture bestowed, as that you can inherit the fruits of Christ's labour, though they have never been to you the object of devout and believing supplication. And, impressed with the truth of these things, on what principle, or with what consistency, can you neglect to pray? Is not such neglect tantamount to a deliberate casting away of every spiritual and every eternal hope? Is it not equivalent to saying that you grudge to pray more than you wish to be redeemed? And, if persisted in, must it not necessarily have the effect of separating you for ever from God, and Christ, and immortality? Yes, brethren; such must be the inevitable and awful consequence of your being strangers to prayer. And what is more, I defy you, by any ingenuity you can employ, to get quit of this alternative, or, continuing to believe in the Bible, to flatter yourselves for a moment, that it is either of trivial importance or of the least uncertainty. I intimate to you a truth which you cannot gainsay, and which should go home to the heart of every one of you with awakening power, that while God will confer upon those who pray for it as they ought, not only to the half, but even to the whole of his kingdom—not one good thing, as pertaining to salvation, will he convey into your lot, if you persevere in disregarding the instrumentality by which it is his holy and sovereign pleasure that you shall seek for it, and come to the possession of it. Your guilt shall remain uncancelled. Your hearts shall be still under "the bondage of corruption." The Holy Ghost will remain at a distance from you. Heaven will refuse to unbar its everlasting doors. The terrors of unpropitiated and undeprecated wrath will hang over you, and close in upon you, and at last bury you in utter and irretrievable ruin. And all this misery will come upon you with the unspeakable aggravation that you might have escaped it, had not you so "hardened your heart" against God, that you would not even pray to him—that you would not implore from him the deliverance which you needed—that you would not offer up one cordial petition for that which he was willing to grant you, and which he is now commanding you to ask for, that you may receive it, and be happy for ever. O then be persuaded to go to the throne of grace. Lift up your soul to him who delights in the supplications of the penitent. Join yourselves to them of whom we can say, in the language of mingled admiration and pleasure, "Behold! they pray." And let this exercise be so dear to you, and of so much importance in your regard, that you shall sympathize with the Psalmist, and catch his devout spirit, and enter into his pious resolutions when he thus speaks, "Give ear to my words, O Lord, consider my meditation. Hearken unto the voice of my cry, my King and my God; for unto thee will I pray. My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up."

1. It becomes us, my friends, to form and adopt the purpose of the Psalmist. His purpose was to pray; and that purpose should be ours. We have many motives and inducements to engage in this exercise. And if we consider these aright, and submit to that influence which they are fitted to hold over our feelings, they will speedily and effectually determine us to address ourselves to God in these words, "Unto thee will I pray." We will be satisfied that it is our high honour, our distinguished privilege, our bounden duty, our purest comfort, and our truest advantage: and, viewing it in these lights, we cannot but resolve to attend to it, and to give ourselves to it, as an observance of the utmost consequence to our welfare. Even the speculative conviction of its excellence, as thus contemplated, must, if we are actuated by the ordinary principles of a rational nature, constrain us to fix our attachment upon it, and to employ it as the means of improvement and of happiness. But how much more powerful will be our regard for it, and how much more deeply and decidedly will it affect our minds and our practice, if we know from personal experience all the advantages which it confers, and all the joys which it imparts! Having felt what it is to commit ourselves to God in prayer—having received the mercy to pardon, and the grace to help that we implored—having been rescued from dangers, supported under trials, fortified against temptations, strengthened for duties, and comforted amidst sorrows, in answer to the petitions that we had offered up—this must endear the throne of grace to us, attract our hearts to it, and encourage us to make it our habitual and chosen refuge, amidst all the vicissitudes, and in all the circumstances, of our Christian pilgrimage. And, aware how apt the world is to break in upon our devotional duties; and how much we are in hazard, from that and various other causes, of neglecting to perform these as they ought to be performed, or of postponing them to concerns and occupations of a secular nature, we shall just feel the stronger necessity for "building ourselves up" in this pious resolution, and making a covenant with our own minds, that we will allow nothing to come in between God and our souls, but that, in whatever we are employed, wherever we are placed, and whatever befals us, "unto him will we pray."

2. Then it will be with great earnestness that we pray to God. We will not go about the duty in a cold, formal, or perfunctory manner, as if it were a matter of indifference to us, whether we were successful in our application or not. This would be unsuitable to the character of the Being to whom our application is made, and to the importance of the blessings that we are desirous to obtain. The God whom we address, looks with a jealous eye on the frame of mind in which we approach him, and could not fail to be angry with us, if he saw us careless and unconcerned, either as to the things which we asked from him, or as to the tone of feeling which we cherish, and the mode of supplication which we employed, when bending at his throne. It would be irreverence and mockery, which would have the effect of bringing upon us a curse, instead of a blessing. And then, if we had no vehemence of desire, and no fervour of expression, would it not be a proof that we attached but little importance to the benefits themselves, which yet we profess to seek? And if we attach but little importance to the benefits which Christ has purchased with his blood, which God has commanded us to aspire after with the utmost sincerity and diligence, and which are, in every aspect indispensable to our present and our eternal advantage—how can we expect that our prayers will meet with the acceptance that is essential to their success, or be attended with any one of the advantages of which prayer is so productive to the true worshipper? When we pray to God, therefore, let us be truly anxious that our prayer may experience his favourable regard. Let our hearts be engaged in the exercise, and engaged in it with an ardour and solicitude becoming the case of those who must have from him what they pray for, or perish. Let us wrestle with the angel of his presence, omitting no importunity of sentiment or of language which the occasion may justify. Let the words which we utter be the vehicle of that earnestness which we feel, and let us beseech him to hear them as coming from the dependants and pensioners of his bounty. Let us meditate with deepest interest on the extent and urgency of our need, and entreat him to "consider our meditation," and think of the necessities of our condition, and exert his wisdom as well as his mercy, in giving a supply to all our various wants. Let us cry to him with all the fervour of men who have no other refuge but himself, to whom there is no hope but what is to be found in the riches of his grace, and whose ruin is inevitable, unless he will have pity, and send deliverance; and let us implore him to "harken to the voice of our cry," as the cry of guilty, condemned, helpless, and miserable creatures. And, alive to the unspeakable moment of receiving from him an answer in peace, let us not cease to cherish all this intensity of desire; let every dawning day find us in the spirit, and in the attitude, of importunate supplication; let our powers, when invigorated by the refreshments of sleep and rest, be called forth to the performance of this good work; and let our minds be continually and earnestly directed to heaven, as the source from which we are to draw whatever is needful for our pilgrimage through life, and for our felicity in a better world.

3. But we are not to pray, as if God were unwilling to hear us, and to bestow the blessings that we need. He has revealed himself as the hearer of prayer. He has manifested his readiness to give us whatever our situation requires. "He that spared not his own Son, but freely delivered him up to death for us, how shall he not with him, also freely give us all things?" And having by this wonderful display of love, and by various affectionate declarations of his word, taught and encouraged us to confide in him for the attainment of every thing for which we are either permitted or instructed to pray, it follows that our prayers should always be accompanied with lively faith, and with humble hope. Considering the representations he has afforded to us of his character, and the assurances he has reiterated us of his mercy, any thing like distrust or despondency is as unbecoming, as the carelessness and indifference against which we have already warned you. You must honour God, as well as consult your own comfort, by giving place to no doubt or disbelief, when you draw near to him in prayer. Rest implicitly on the faithfulness of his promises, which are all "yea and amen in Christ Jesus;" and pleading on the merit of your great High Priest and Intercessor, plead with the boldness, and the expectation of those who know that they "have an advocate with the Father," whom he "heareth always," and with whom he is ever "well pleased." But while you "look up" to God with the conviction that he will not turn away your prayer from him, nor his grace from you, let this conviction be mingled with humility, when you recollect your great unworthiness, and the weakness and imperfection of your faith itself. Let it be mingled with submission, that you may not be cast down and disappointed, when he withholds any particular blessing which you had asked with peculiar solicitude, and on which you had counted as at once important to your welfare, and certain in its attainment. And let it be mingled with that patience which shall prevent you from repining at delay in the communication of what you have besought your heavenly Father to send, which shall make you still trust in him for the accomplishment of all that concerns your well-being, notwithstanding the frustrations of hope which you may have experienced, and which is not only quite consistent with a continued and unwavering expectation of the gifts that you implore, but imparts such a tone of holy resignation to the petitions in which you supplicate them, as to give additional grace and piety to the sacrifice which you thus lay on the altar of your God.

4. And, finally, you must not forget that the God to whom you pray is a holy God. It is true he allows us to approach Him as sinners; and, as sinners, to ask from him with the hope of receiving all the blessings of salvation. But then, in this act of condescension, he does not, and he cannot renounce that purity and rectitude of character which belong to him as the infinitely perfect Jehovah. We have access to him by the blood of Christ: but by the shedding of that blood in sacrifice, he has set before us a most emphatic demonstration of the divine holiness, which the sacrifice of Christ was appointed to maintain and vindicate. And though, in virtue of Christ's meritorious sufferings, God is now "reconciling the world to himself," and free to bestow salvation upon our fallen race, yet he has not ceased to be as much distinguished by holiness in his own character, and as peremptory in his exaction of it in the character of his creatures, as he was before the existence of any atonement, or of any satisfaction. Most true is the representation here given of him by the Psalmist; and most necessary is it that we bear it in mind, and be influenced by it, in all our devotional exercises. "He has no pleasure in wickedness. Neither shall evil dwell with him; the foolish shall not stand in his sight; and he hateth the workers of iniquity. He shall destroy them that speak leasing or falsehood; he will abhor the bloody and deceitful man."

Now, this statement, of which we need not at present give any particular illustration, its general meaning being quite obvious, and quite sufficient for our purpose, is not set before us to deter us from praying to God. It would have that effect, indeed, were we to confine our views to the immaculate holiness of God on the one hand, and to our moral depravity and guilt on the other. But we know that God is merciful as well as just; that while his mercy is displayed, his justice is satisfied; and that according to the wonderful plan of redemption, even the chief of sinners may return to him through the appointed mediator, and for the sake of that mediator, be pardoned, and accepted, and saved. Still, however, if we thus believe in Jesus Christ, and thus return by him to God, our very faith, and our very return, necessarily direct our views to him as a God, "glorious in holiness," and requiring holiness in all that draw nigh to him, and are admitted to the enjoyment of his favour. And, accordingly, it is one provision of the gospel, that we be sanctified for his service, while it is one prescribed qualification for engaging in that service, that we have "clean hands and pure hearts." When we pray to him, we must pray in the spirit of penitence. We must be animated by a hatred of sin; for, "if we regard iniquity in our hearts, the Lord will not hear us." We must have a sincere, and decided, and paramount affection for holiness; for without this, we could not fix our minds with comfort, or with hope, on him whom we pretended to worship. If conscious that we were "enemies to God in our minds, and by wicked works," and that we were persevering in our enmity, notwithstanding all that he had done to subdue it, we could not possibly cherish towards him one devotional sentiment, or utter one sincere supplication. It becomes us, therefore—it is requisite for us—to be holy, that we may pray to God as we ought. And, for the purpose of impressing us with the importance of having that qualification, and with the necessity of having it in active operation when we address God in prayer, let us always contemplate God as he is here delineated by the Psalmist. And while a sense of our guiltiness before such a holy Being, determines us to seek for acceptance through the sacrifice of Christ, let the purity of him to whom we pray determine us to be earnest in seeking for the renewing and purifying influence of the Divine Spirit, in banishing from our hearts every sinful affection and every unworthy thought, and in cultivating all those graces and virtues which shall qualify us for holding communion with the "father of our spirits" upon earth, and for enjoying his beatific presence in the kingdom of heaven.

But while the holiness of God is a commanding reason for our praying to him in the spirit of penitence, we may also take encouragement from it to apply to him when men are assailing and persecuting us. This was the particular view of it taken by the Psalmist in the passage we are considering. He knew that the conduct of his enemies could not fail to be most offensive to that Being who ruled the world in righteousness, and who saw in their hostility to his servants, a practical contempt of his law, and a daring opposition to his authority. And, therefore, he concluded that, however unworthy he was in himself of the divine favour, and however necessary it was to pray in the name of a mediator, the very perfection of God's moral excellence, would justify him for asking his interposition, and for asking it with the assured hope that it would be granted. In like manner, when we suffer from the malice and injustice of our foes, and apply to God for deliverance or for help, it is a warrant for us to do so that he is infinitely holy and just. Were he "altogether such a one as ourselves," were his nature tinctured with sin, or were he indifferent to its prevalence among his creatures, we could not expect that he would "give an attentive ear" when we besought him to guard us against the machinations and the malignity of those who, by the commission of it in some of its most obnoxious forms, aimed at our destruction. But, convinced that he is "the Holy One of Israel," that every species of iniquity is hateful in his sight, that the workers of it are the objects of his displeasure, and that one great purpose of his administration must be to check and to punish them, we feel ourselves constrained to make use of that as an argument for "calling upon him," when we are treated by our fellow-men with cruelty or injustice. It is appealing to the honour of his character and of his government, and to the pledge which he has given, in all that he has revealed of himself in the law and in the gospel, in the ways of providence, and in the word of truth, to prevent the triumph of ungodliness, when we invoke him as a God of righteousness, to come between the oppressor and the oppressed, and to save us from our false, deceitful, and blood thirsty foes. We must never forget that this attribute of God should make us approach at all times with much self-abasement, and with reliance on his mercy through the blood of atonement; but neither should we forget that, in particular circumstances, it furnishes the most animating motive that we can have for fervent supplications; and that, when situated as the Psalmist was, we may freely adopt the language which he employed, when he said, "I will direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up; For thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness; neither shall evil dwell with thee."

The Psalmist did not satisfy himself with private prayer; he also resolved to engage in the exercises of public worship. The same feeling of piety which constrained him to do the one, constrained him also to do the other. And then, he did not think himself at liberty to go to the house of God, without a due consideration of the service with which he was to be there occupied, and of the dispositions and views which it required from him, as both becoming and necessary. "As for me," says he, "I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy; and in thy fear will I worship toward thy holy temple."

The resolution of the Psalmist should be ours. We may be tempted by our natural disinclination to spiritual employment, and by the allurements of a degenerate world, and by the example and counsel of ungodly men, to "forsake the assembling of ourselves together." But, "as for us," if we are actuated by the principles and the spirit of true religion, we will resist all these temptations, and account it our honour, our privilege, and our duty, to "wait on the Lord" in the services of his sanctuary. This we will do, regularly and punctually, in the ordinary circumstances of life. But we will especially have recourse to God in his house of prayer, when we are distressed by the hostility and persecution of our foes, in order that we may derive consolation from the communion which we there hold with our heavenly father, and be instructed by what is there delivered to us, in all that can reconcile us to our troubles, and guide us in our difficulties, and support us under our trials. And, far from rushing into his holy place, as too many do, without any serious thought concerning him to whom we are about to pay our homage, and the manner in which he must be approached, if we would approach him with acceptance,—we will study to have our minds impressed with just conceptions of his character, to bring with us those offerings which the occasion requires, and to present them with suitable affections, and in a suitable manner. Instead of merely going to his tabernacles, we will go to them with the conscious purpose of worshipping him,—of offering to him our prayers and our praises, and of listening to his word. And instead of merely going to worship him, we will go to worship him in that way which is suggested by the nature and circumstances of the duty, or dictated by his own express injunctions. Contemplating the immaculate purity by which he is distinguished, and aware of our own unworthiness and guilt, it will be with the deepest humility that we enter his courts; it will be with dependence on his unmerited mercy; and it will be with a believing reference to that scheme of reconciliation by which his mercy has been manifested to sinful men. And though drawing near to him in faith, and beholding and trusting in him as a God of mercy, we will feel ourselves encouraged to hope for a favourable reception, yet still thinking of his unspotted holiness, and of our own great depravity, it will be with godly fear that we lift up our eyes to "the place where his honour dwelleth," whether we give him the tribute of our thanksgiving, or ask from him the blessings that we need. Thus going into the house of God "in the multitude of his mercy," and worshipping towards his holy temple "in his fear," we may cherish the expectation that he will graciously receive us; that he will "cause his face to shine upon us;" that he will listen to the voice of supplication which we lift up to him from amidst "the assembly of the upright;" that he will help us in the performance of our sacred duties; that he will bless them for our comfort and advantage; and that he will make the services of his temple below, a preparation for the purer and more exalted services of his temple above.

LECTURE II.

"Lead me, O Lord, in thy righteousness because of mine enemies: make thy way straight before my face. For there is no faithfulness in their mouth; their inward part is very wickedness; their throat is an open sepulchre; they flatter with their tongue. Destroy thou them, O God: let them fall by their own counsels cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions; for they have rebelled against thee. But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice: let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them: let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee. For thou, Lord, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield."—PSALM v. 8. —END.

David had addressed himself to God as the hearer of prayer, and he did so, when he was in distress by reason of the opposition and hostility of ungodly men. He took encouragement in praying for help and deliverance, from the consideration that God was a holy being, who had "no pleasure in wickedness," and who would take part with his servants when they were persecuted by the workers of iniquity. And he expressed his determination, amidst all his trials and troubles, to adhere closely to the worship of his Maker, to approach him in a dependence upon his mercy, and to "serve him with reverence and godly fear."

He proceeds thus: "Lead me, O Lord, in thy righteousness, because of mine enemies: make thy way straight before my face." David's enemies were numerous, malicious, and inveterate. They watched to spy out his faults; they waited for his halting: they were anxious to discover him acting inconsistently with his professions: they longed for some violation of that law by which he pretended to be guided, for some departure from that character by which he laboured to be distinguished—that they might accuse him before the world, that they might disgrace him in the eye of the church, that they might overwhelm him in infamy and ruin. Now, in this situation of peril, he applied to God. He was sensible that of himself he was not proof against their enmity; that if left to his own wisdom and strength and resolution, their assaults would be successful and their object accomplished; that nothing could preserve him but the interposition of divine aid. And, therefore, he trusted in it, and he prayed for it. He prayed that the Almighty would prevent him from committing any sin which would have given his foes an advantage over him, or an occasion against him; that he might be enabled at all times, and in all circumstances, to present to them the commanding aspect of a blameless and holy life; that the way of duty might be made so plain to him, that he could not miss it; that its ruggedness and its difficulties might be so smoothed down, that he could walk in it easily and surely; that those who looked on him with the most suspicious and malignant eye, might be unable to detect any fault in his conduct; that their captiousness might be ungratified, their clamours put to silence, and their expectations disappointed.

Now, my friends, we are in one sense, situated like the Psalmist, and we must act like him. We have all of us enemies to encounter, whose aim is deadly, whose vigilance is ceaseless, whose attacks are unremitting, whose numbers, and power, and devices are formidable. And what have we wherewith to resist them? Nothing that is adequate to the arduous task. Unskilful, ignorant, and weak; apt to slumber at our post; easily tempted, or easily frightened into dangerous concessions; unwilling to undergo the toils, or to submit to the sacrifices which our warfare demands,—we have scarcely begun the contest, when we lose the victory, and fall a prey to those who have nothing else at heart than our everlasting destruction. But though such is our condition, is it quite helpless and irremediable? No, brethren: the God whom we serve is for us, and he is mightier by far than all that can be against us. He has promised guidance, and protection, and assistance; he has promised to give courage to our hearts, and wisdom to our counsels, and vigour to our arm; he has promised to be himself our leader and commander, to support us through the perils of the combat, and to conduct us to conquest and to triumph. What then should we do, but confide in these promises, and pray for their fulfilment? Let it be our fixed purpose to oppose a firm and unyielding front to our adversaries. Let us be resolved, that in spite of all their efforts, we will "hold fast our righteousness, and never let it go;" that nothing they can say or do shall prevail upon us to surrender one iota of our principles or our purity; that we will wage interminable war with them, rather than suffer them in a single point to acquire the mastery over us. And let all the means which we possess of repelling their assaults, of counteracting their stratagems, and of defeating their attempts, be employed with every degree of care and energy. But still, with all this, let us never forget that there is no hope for us, if we rely on our own independent resources; that we must be "strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might;" and that his all-sufficient help must be obtained by prayer and supplication. Let us, therefore, beseech him "to lead us in his righteousness, because of our enemies, and to make his way straight before our face." Let us not only ask him to be thus mindful of us, and thus assisting to us, in the extreme or more trying exigencies of our lot; but let us habitually apply to him for the wisdom that is necessary to direct, and the strength that is necessary to resist, and let us be specially careful to implore grace to prevent us from doing any thing, which, though apparently or comparatively insignificant, may yet pave the way for a succession of evil works, which would gradually undermine the foundations of our Christian character, and finally involve us in the moral desolation which our enemies are seeking to accomplish. And let us thus labour, and thus pray, not merely because it is requisite for working out our own personal salvation, by keeping us stedfast in the path of God's righteousness, but also because it contributes to the honour, and the influence, and the prosperity of that great cause which we have espoused, as believers in the Gospel, by depriving our foes of that handle with which our misconduct would furnish them for "blaspheming the holy name by which we are called," and by exhibiting to them the virtuous and irreproachable deportment which is formed, and nurtured, and matured by the religion of Jesus Christ.

The Psalmist next gives an account of his enemies, and petitions for their destruction. "For there is no faithfulness in their mouth; their inward part is very wickedness: their throat is an open sepulchre, they flatter with their tongue. Destroy thou them, O God; let them fall by their own counsels: cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions, for they have rebelled against thee." They had no regard to truth, and scrupled not to invent and propagate deliberate falsehoods, if they could thereby injure the interest, the reputation, or the comfort of the King of Israel. And this they did under the influence and by the impulse of inherent depravity, of an inborn enmity against God and the people of God, which neither kindness nor virtue could subdue, and which startled at no lie and at no malignity, by which its feelings might be gratified and its purposes gained. Nay, they carried this odious and reckless passion so far, that they thirsted for David's blood; they were ready to devour him; and insatiable as the grave, which never says "it is enough," they longed to swallow up not him only, but all who were embarked in the same holy cause, and distinguished by the same devotedness to the King of Heaven. And so far did they carry their diabolical practices, that they put on the mask of friendship, and spoke in the accents of applause, that thereby they might more easily lull the suspicions, and effectuate the ruin of all who were the objects of their hatred.

Such were the Psalmist's enemies; and he prayed for their destruction. He prayed that they might be subjected to the punishment which they had so justly merited; he prayed that the counsels which they took, and the measures which they devised against others, might be so overruled as to turn to their own overthrow; he prayed that in the midst, and on account of, their multiplied offences, they might be cast out from the land of the living, and the place of hope. These were dreadful imprecations, and could only be justified on peculiar grounds, in explanation of which, we would offer these two short remarks. In the first place, David did not pray for the destruction of his enemies, from any feelings of personal resentment. They had, indeed, given him every provocation that insult and persecution could furnish. But he did not yield to it; he took higher and more important views. His own wrongs were forgotten amidst the affronts that were offered to the majesty of heaven. It was upon this ground that he pleaded for the divine vengeance to fall upon his enemies. In aiming a blow at him, they were opposing the appointments of Jehovah, and they were doing so by means which implied a violation of the most important and sacred enactments of the moral law; and hence, he urges his suit against them with this argument, "for they have rebelled against thee." And in the second place, when interpreting this and similar passages, we must never forget that David sustained a particular character, and was the champion of a particular dispensation. He was the anointed King of Israel; he was inspired, and invested with the prophetical office; and he was ordained to act a most important part in carrying forward the arrangements of God, not merely for the immediate safety and prosperity of the Jewish state, but also and chiefly for the coming of the Messiah, and the ultimate salvation of the world. When praying, therefore, for the destruction of his enemies, he was not an unguided, unauthorised individual, praying for ruin to the common enemies of his person, or of his country. But he was an individual, specially gifted and called of God, and "moved in what he spoke by the Holy Ghost," praying for the destruction of those who "set themselves" obstinately and malevolently "against the Lord and his anointed," who were levelling the shafts of their malice against the cause both of God and man, and doing what they could to frustrate the counsels of heaven concerning the advent of the Saviour, and the redemption of the human race.

But while these extraordinary circumstances fully justified the Psalmist in imprecating destruction upon his enemies, there is nothing in our situation by which we can be justified in following his example. Evil men may calumniate us, and do us all manner of injury; and in afflicting us they may they must, be offending God; but we have no more warrant to pray for divine wrath to consume them, than we have warrant to cherish personal revenge against them. We are under the law of Christian charity; and that law forbids undue resentment; it requires us to "love our enemies, and to pray for them." We must be regulated by the example of Jesus; and from the cross of his agony, he lifted up the voice of intreaty in behalf of his murderers, and said, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." We must be "followers of God as dear children;" and we know that he has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but is willing that all men should come to repentance," and therefore it becomes us to pray that even those who, in the wantonness or the wickedness of their hearts, have done us most evil, may be "converted from the error of their ways," and made partakers of that grace in which we ourselves rejoice, and which teaches us to remember the very worst of them in our supplications at the throne of mercy.

When we come, however, to consider our spiritual enemies, the case is altered, and in so far as we exclude from our regard whatever is at once an object of pity and capable of change, it is not only allowable but dutiful in us to pray for their destruction. With that limitation, it is impossible for us to be on any terms with them, and not endanger our well-being. And as we should use every method in our power, for breaking down their dominion and annihilating their very existence, seeing that their hostility is equally directed against us, and against God, and against all that is good and holy, we must not omit the instrument of prayer, which, when employed in sincerity, and in faith, and with perseverance, is not less availing than it is necessary. It is right for us to pray that the kingdom of Satan may be overturned, that he may be seen as "lightning falling from heaven," that he may be banished from the hearts and the habitations of all men, and driven away, baffled and defeated, "into his own place." It is right for us to pray that the spirit which "worketh in us as the children of disobedience," may be crushed and subdued—that "the old man with his corrupt deeds and deceitful lusts" may fall down and die—that every vestige of that authority which sin has established in our fallen nature, may perish and become as if it had never been. It is right for us to pray, that the world may be divested of its charms to seduce, and of its terrors to frighten us from the paths of virtue; that it may fall prostrate and without strength at the feet of a triumphant faith; that it may be hurled from its proud pre-eminence among men; and that on its ruins may be erected the bright and purifying hope of that "new heaven and that new earth, in which dwelleth righteousness." And if among our fellow-men, there are those who by their counsel, their example, or their ridicule, are trying to wound our conscience, to shake our confidence, and ruin our souls, and thus proving themselves to be the worst enemies with whom we have to struggle,—it is right also to pray with respect to them, that the character in which they appear as foes to the followers of Jesus Christ may be utterly extinguished; that the very devices which they have contrived and are executing against us, may be made the instruments of their discomfiture; that, whether by mercy or by judgment, the Lord may be pleased to break their stubborn wills, and bring them into subjection to himself and into captivity to Christ; and that the enmity of their minds being thus conquered, and all the strong holds of unbelief taken from them, and their souls spoiled of every carnal affection and every hostile feeling, they may be so effectually converted as to become "lovers of God," the friends of his people, and the supporters of his cause throughout the world. It is right for us to pray in this manner and to this extent for the destruction of our spiritual enemies: and if we thus "pray with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit," He to whom our petitions are addressed will answer us in mercy, taking to him his great power, and thereby accomplishing our deliverance, securing us equally against the wiles and the violence of our foes, and giving us that victory over them all, which shall terminate in "glory, honour, and immortality."

Having described the enemies of God and prayed against them, the Psalmist next describes the people of God, and prays for them. "But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice; let them ever shout for joy; because thou defendest them: let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee. For thou, Lord, wilt bless the righteous, with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield."

God's people are described as putting their trust in him. Their confidence is withdrawn from the creature, and reposed in the Creator. They contemplate his perfections; and in them, they behold every thing which can render God worthy of their affiance as a guide, a protector, and a friend. They read his promises; and these, while they come from him who is faithful and almighty, apply so kindly and minutely to all their circumstances, as to invite and secure their unsuspecting reliance upon him for all that they need. And the experience they have had of his gracious and providential treatment of them during what is past, teaches them to look up to him, with an unwavering conviction, that he will not forsake them during all that yet remains of their earthly pilgrimage. They "trust in him at all times:" they trust in him with their whole heart: they trust in him for present safety: they trust in him for support at death: they trust in him for the happiness of eternity.

God's people are also described as loving his name. He is the object of their devout and grateful attachment. Their understandings have been enlightened to see, and their hearts have been purified to relish, the transcendent excellence which resides in his character. And the forbearance, the mercy, and the kindness which he has shown them, and which run through all their temporal, and all their spiritual lot, have drawn their hearts to him in delighted admiration and everlasting gratitude. So that they think of him with complacency. They take pleasure in every thing by which he condescends to make himself known. They are gladdened by every token of his bounty which they themselves receive, and by every demonstration of grace and power which he gives in the world around them. And they long for the period, when from that clearer view of his character, and from that more enlarged experience of his mercy, and from that more sainted capacity of appreciating "the beauties of holiness," which they shall attain in heaven, they shall be enabled to love him with boundless, uninterrupted, and never-ending affection.

God's people are also described as righteous. To confidence in his attributes and administration, and sentiments of devoted attachment to him as their heavenly Father, their almighty friend, their eternal portion, they add the substantial and practical attainment of conformity to his will. They do not rest satisfied with honouring him by the mere feelings of dependence and affection: they honour him also by the obedience which he requires, and which it is at once their privilege and their duty to render to his holy law. They are righteous in their principles: they are righteous in their tempers: they are righteous in their conduct. Righteousness is their grand distinction. It adorns them wherever they are, and points them out as children of the most High, and as heirs of immortality; and following after it with unremitting zeal, and willingly subjecting themselves to "the sanctification of the Spirit," their "path is like the shining light which shineth more and more until the perfect day."

Such are God's people according to the description given of them by the Psalmist. And, juding of yourselves by this test, are you, my friends, among the number of God's people? If you are not, I need not tell you how much you are lost to all that is greatest and happiest and best. There is but one other alternative; and if you have chosen it; if you are indeed the enemies of God; if, instead of "trusting in him," you are trusting in "refuges of lies;" if, instead of "loving his name," you are hating, and blaspheming, and turning away from it; if, instead of being "righteous," you are living in sin, eager in its pursuits, and contented with its pleasures; then, what can you expect, or what can we hold out to you, but the destruction for which David prayed, and which the Almighty has threatened, and with which he will assuredly visit all those who will not "repent and be converted" that they may be saved? O be persuaded to forsake your evil ways, and to return to the Lord. Abandon the ranks of his foes. "Come out from among them, and be ye separate." And join yourselves to them who love God and keep his commandments. He will "receive you graciously." He will pardon you freely for the sake of his dear Son. He will treat you with every mark of affection that may be hoped for from a tender parent—from a reconciled God. He will put it into the hearts of his saints to pray for you, as David prayed for the righteous. He will teach them the supplications they are to prefer in your behalf. And, among all the various blessings that, under his guidance, will be the subject of their petitions, this will be none of the least fervent nor least effectual, that you may be "comforted concerning all that has befallen you;" that you may be enabled to rejoice in God, to whose friendship you have been restored, and "under the shadow of whose wings" you have taken refuge from the guilt and the calamities of an unholy life; that you may even "shout for joy"—the joy of perfect security from all that once harassed your mind and robbed it of its peace—the joy of complete triumph over the foes under whose cruel power you were fast "filling up the measure of your iniquities," and fast sinking into the "perdition of ungodly men,"—the joy of unwavering faith in the merit and intercession of him who redeemed you, and opened up the way of return to your offended Maker—the joy of assured hope that the time is not far distant when you shall be rescued from every remaining evil, be admitted into the celestial presence of your redeeming God, and there rejoice for ever with "a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory." And most unquestionably this prayer will be heard and answered. God is already pledged by his character and by his promises to grant what is thus implored. "For he will bless the righteous; and with favour will he compass him as with a shield." You need his blessing, and you shall have it; and you shall find that it is "a blessing which maketh rich, and addeth no sorrow." You need his favour, and you shall have it; and you shall find that his "favour is life, and his loving kindness better than life." You need his defence, and you shall have it; and you shall find that they whom the Lord defends have a shield which compasses them about on every side, and keeps them in perfect safety. And, amidst all your difficulties and all your dangers, this will be your song, till you reach the temple out of which you shall no more go out, and the kingdom that shall never be moved; "The Lord is my light, and my salvation, whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes come upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell. Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear: though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident. One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life to behold the beauty of the Lord, and inquire in his temple. For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion: in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me: he shall set me up upon a rock. And now shall mine head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me: therefore will I offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy. I will sing—yea, I will sing praises unto the Lord."

LECTURE III.

"Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour. In whose eyes a vile person is condemned; but he honoureth them that fear the Lord: he that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not. He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent. He that doeth these things shall never be moved."—PSALM XV.

PART I.

Nothing can be more important than the inquiry with which this Psalm commences. It refers not to a subject of idle or useless curiosity; nor to a subject involving some merely temporary interest; nor to a subject about which we may be indifferent, and at the same time neither compromise our wisdom, nor endanger our safety. It refers to a subject which comprehends at once our prospects of eternal felicity, and the practical concern that we must necessarily feel, and the practical efforts that we must necessarily make, in order that these prospects may be certainly realized. And, therefore, it is infinitely more deserving of our regard than the most momentous of all the various inquiries that were ever engaged in by men of science, or by men of the world, whose views were confined to the circumstances and the comforts of a present state.

And yet how little of the patient attention of most men, and how little of their serious meditation, does it occupy! To every thing else, whether grave or trifling, they are more than sufficiently alive. They are eager in asking, and they spare no trouble in ascertaining, by what means their "knowledge, which puffeth up," may be enlarged, or their worldly advantages secured, or their personal gratifications promoted, or their animal life prolonged, or their passing amusements varied, and multiplied, and heightened. Listen to their conversation, and you will hear how much they are in earnest about these objects of pursuit. Look to their conduct, and you will see what sacrifices they are ready to make, in order to attain what they thus so vehemently desire. Examine their whole system of life, and you will find them giving their days and their nights, their warmest affections and their most vigorous efforts, to the engagements and the pleasures of a present world; seeking after these with insatiable curiosity, and unwearied activity; and as intent upon them as if they comprised all that is alluring to human ambition, and all that is requisite to human happiness. As they do not deny that they have immortal souls, and that there is a coming retribution from which they cannot escape, one might expect that the thought of this would exact from them some consideration, even in their busiest hours, and that now and then they would devote to it their solemn and exclusive regard. But no: they speak and act as if they had no real or thorough belief that there is a hereafter, or as if they judged themselves to have no individual concern in it. "What shall we eat? What shall we drink? Wherewithal shall we be clothed?" How shall we get honour? How shall we acquire wealth? How shall our time pass most pleasantly away? How must we be qualified for this scene of business? And how shall we be arrayed for that scene of gaiety?—These are the questions, and the only questions which they are at pains either to put or to answer; and their spiritual and everlasting condition is as much unheeded, as if they had no eternity before them, and had no account to render.

The folly of all this is so obvious, that we could scarcely believe it possible, were not the fact presented every day and every hour to our observation. O if there be any now hearing me to whom the description applies, let me beseech you, were it but for one moment, to reflect on the infatuation which besets you. Suppose that within that range to which you limit your concern, you possessed and enjoyed every thing that your hearts desired; that you had no want unsupplied, and no wish unfulfilled; that every species of evil were a stranger to your lot, and every species of good familiar to your feelings and your experience; that, in short, the whole "world, and the fulness thereof" were yours at will;—what in truth have you obtained? Why, it is not too strong language to say, that you have obtained nothing. You and the world, closely as you are now linked with it, and cordially as you are now attached to it, and little as you now think of leaving it,—you and the world must part. You must die, and go into another world—a world in which a righteous judgment shall pass upon you, and in which you shall have an endless, unchangeable existence either of happiness or woe. Are you prepared for that world? Have you provided for the dread alternative which there awaits you? And have you any good ground to hope that you shall "escape the wrath to come," and be admitted into heaven? The case supposes that you have no such prospect, and no such meetness; and on that supposition, what are all the honours, and all the treasures, and all the joys of "the life that now is?" We repeat it, and you cannot in your conscience gainsay it, that they are nothing,—lost and forgotten amidst the realities of that eternal state of being, in which they cannot secure for you one gleam of comfort, or one ray of hope. Nay, they are worse than nothing; for though they pleased, and even enraptured you during the short and fleeting hours of your mortal career, they were all the while concealing from you the glories of immortality, chaining down your ambition to the pursuits of sense and sin, and deluding you to your everlasting ruin. What infatuation, then, to be taking no heed to your future well-being, and lavishing all your care and all your anxiety on "the things that are seen and temporal!"

Take the converse of the supposition we have made, and observe how it brings you to the same conclusion. Suppose that you had the most moderate portion of worldly prosperity and indulgence that ever fell to the share of the unfortunate; suppose that all the possessions of which you are taking such a fast hold, and all the gratifications to which you are so much devoted, were to vanish from your grasp for ever; suppose that your cup of terrestrial bliss were dashed to the ground, and there were put into your hand, and pressed to your lips, a cup overflowing with the bitter waters of sorrow and adversity, which you were compelled to drink to its very dregs;—what of all this, if you were "rich towards God;" if you were travelling to the "kingdom that cannot be moved;" if you were heirs of the "inheritance which is incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away?" Your sorrows in the one case would as quickly pass away, as must your joys in the other case; and as the departure of your joys in the other case was but the prelude of ceaseless and unmingled misery, so the termination of your sorrows in this case would be succeeded by a felicity, perfect in its nature, boundless in its extent, and endless in its duration. Only lay up for yourselves an interest in the substantial and undecaying blessedness of the celestial paradise; and all that this transitory scene can visit you with, either of pleasure or of pain, will be "as the small dust of the balance, without weight and without regard." And the very privations and afflictions, by which, as worldlings, you would be bowed down to the dust, and amidst the severest of which you could have no support and no consolation, would not only be borne by you, as Christians, with patience and resignation, but would serve by elevating your hearts, and purifying your characters, to give you a larger capacity, and a diviner relish, for "the glory that is to be hereafter revealed." O how foolish, then, to be eager in every inquiry, and intent upon every employment that has a reference, however remote, to your connection with the things of time; and never once, or seriously, or fervently, to "lift up your souls" to him "who inhabiteth eternity," and say in the language of the Psalmist, "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell in thy holy hill?"

But there are some who often think of heaven, and often speak of heaven, and often direct their face towards heaven, and who notwithstanding do not attend to the meaning of the Psalmist's question, or do not properly apply it, or do not sufficiently act upon it. They seem to be quite convinced that there is such a place as heaven, and that every wise man will be desirous to reach it: and they seem not only to partake of that desire, but to be satisfied that, with respect to them, it will be ultimately and certainly realised. And all this, although they do not spend one serious thought on the qualifications which heaven requires of every one who would inhabit its holy and happy mansions. They have inquired about the reality of these mansions, and have no doubt of being at last admitted into them: but they never put the question, "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle, who shall dwell in thy holy hill?"—Or they put this question, and they get it answered, and they entertain correct and scriptural notions concerning it, and are just as orthodox on the subject as you could desire them to be. But then their knowledge of it is altogether speculative, or if practically used, is made to refer to every human being but themselves. They look around them, and they decide with great readiness on the future fate of others—determining who shall finally be introduced into heaven, and who shall finally be excluded from it: and if they refrain from passing such specific sentences on their fellow creatures, they also refrain most carefully from considering how far they, for their own part, can look forward with hope and confidence, as those in whom there is a personal meetness for the kingdom of God, by their possessing those qualities to which the promise of that kingdom is annexed, and satisfy their minds with having an accurate acquaintance with the doctrine, and an unwavering belief in the doctrine, that they who go to heaven must be distinguished by that character which is delineated and prescribed in the sacred scriptures. Or if they do make this self-application of the great and important truth that admission into heaven is a privilege necessarily, authoritatively, and exclusively bestowed upon a particular class or description of men; if they are persuaded that it is indispensably requisite for them to belong to this class, if they would enjoy that privilege; and if, under the influence of this persuasion, they set themselves to the work of preparation, and seek to be adorned with that excellence which shall constitute their fitness for eternal life,—still they allow their proud reason, their corrupt passions their worldly interests, so to interfere with what divine authority requires them to do and to be, that there are some duties which they will not perform, some vices which they will not abandon, some sacrifices which they will not make, though hell be the penalty, and heaven the reward.

Now these are all wrong; and their errors must prove fatal. Nobody surely can get to heaven merely by believing that there is such a state, and desiring to be there, however firm the belief, and however intense the desire may be. There must be at least superadded to this, some knowledge of that character which those must possess who shall be admitted into it; some concern felt upon that subject; some endeavours made to acquire distinct apprehensions of it; and some measure of success in obtaining the requisite instruction. Nor is this by any means sufficient. To our belief in heaven and our ambition to enter it, we may add the most minute inquiries into the character which fits for the enjoyment of it, and the most correct acquaintance with all the qualities of which that character is composed,—still that can do us no good so long as we make use of it for no other purpose than that of judging of the future condition of other men, and think not of its just and individual application to ourselves. And though we should apply it to ourselves, and be satisfied not only that a particular and specified preparation is indispensible, but that we must have that preparation, still, if in making it, we leave out what the word or God declares to be essential to its completeness and its acceptance, and do nothing more than aim at those attainments which suit our own depraved or fanciful views, there is no ground on which we can consistently lay claim to heaven, or rationally expect to be its inhabitants at last. "Eternal life is altogether the gift of God;" he has intimated that it is the portion of none but those who are qualified for its exercises and its pleasures; he has fixed what these qualifications are, and has plainly revealed, and authoritatively prescribed them; and it is beyond all controversy that we must inquire about them, that we must become acquainted with them, that we must labour to be invested with them, that we must actually have them, in order that we may be among the number of those "who shall abide in the tabernacle of the Lord, and dwell in his holy hill,"—of those who shall be the real members of his church upon earth, and shall finally ascend to the place of sublime and everlasting recompense.

PART II.

Having said this much on the question here put by the Psalmist, let us now attend to the answer that he gives. "He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour. In whose eyes a vile person is contemned; but he honoureth them that fear the Lord; he that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not; he that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent."

We are evidently not to regard this as a complete enumeration of the virtues which constitute a meetness for heaven. A complete enumeration can only be made by travelling through the whole sacred volume, and collecting all the principles that are laid down in its pages, and all the precepts that there are enjoined for the regulation of human conduct. It is not from detached passages of revelation that we learn particularly and fully what the Christian character is, but from its various truths, and maxims, and commandments gathered together, and combined into one practical system. "All scripture is given by inspiration, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction and instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works." That we may be "perfect, and throughly furnished unto all good works," we must study the whole of the inspired record, and make ourselves minutely acquainted with its contents. But the Divine Spirit has seen proper, in describing those who shall "enter into life," to mention sometimes one part of their character, and sometimes another, to the apparent exclusion of the rest. Thus, in the twenty-fourth psalm, when it is asked, "who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? and who shall stand in his holy place?" this answer is subjoined, "He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully:"—in which words the acquirements of a successful candidate for heaven, are limited to freedom from gross outward sins, and from sensual desires—from undue attachment to "the things of the world," and from false and fraudulent oaths. In our Saviour's account of the general judgment, the sentence of approbation which he will pronounce upon the righteous, who are to go "away into life eternal," recognizes no other Christian grace in them as authorising this glorious destination, than the exercise of charity,—of charity too, in its most ordinary form,—as directed not to the welfare of the soul, but to the comfort of the body, and to that comfort as promoted and cared for by the cheapest, and most common-place officers of humanity. "I was hungry, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me." Christ also, in his sermon on the Mount, ascribes salvation to the possession of one particular excellence, without even glancing at its connection with any other, and without speaking of it as forming a portion only of a great and comprehensive whole. Thus he says, "Blessed are the peace makers, for they shall be called the children of God: Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted: Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." The same great reward is annexed to the principle of faith, without any express notice of those acts of moral obedience which are yet affirmed to be necessary for proving our faith to be a faith of saving operation; "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved;"—And to the sentiment of love to God, without any detail of those deeds of piety and goodness by which it is at once evinced and perfected—thus the things are unimagined, which God "hath prepared for them that love him;"—And even to the verbal confession of Christ in the world, without any allusion to that practical submission to his will, and humble imitation of his example, by which all his disciples must necessarily be distinguished; as, "with the mouth confession is made unto salvation;" and "whoso confesseth me before men, him will I also confess before my Father who is in heaven." And in the passage before us, though in it a greater number of virtues are particularised than in most other passages of scripture, where holy character is stated in connection with its heavenly reward, yet it is obvious that many are altogether omitted, and that of those which are specified, there are some less valuable in comparison than others which might have been introduced into the catalogue. This, however, is quite according to the analogy of scripture; and we shall endeavour to show, in a few particulars, that it is rational, consistent, and useful.

1. In the first place, as we have already hinted, it is not intended that one part of the scripture should be understood and acted upon independently of the rest. Its great object is to tell us how we are to prepare for heaven; and surely it is both wise and requisite, that we learn this lesson in its full meaning and extent; that we direct our attention to all the dispositions we must cherish, and to all the habits we must cultivate, in order to be ripe for glory; that we neglect nothing, however inconsiderable, which the wisdom or the holiness of God has demanded of us for that purpose. Even though all the virtues required of us were brought into one list, and presented to us at one view, with a single solitary exception, and that this single virtue were to be found in the least interesting, and most neglected corner of the Bible, to that corner we must go for it, and bring it into its natural and appointed fellowship with the rest, and give it as firm a hold of our heart, and as fixed a place in our deportment as any of them. And why? For this simple reason, that it stands within the precincts of revelation; that it is recommended, sanctioned, and enforced by an authority, which it is not competent for us either to question or disobey; that it constitutes one of the features of that character, which every obligation of gratitude, and every prospect of futurity teach us to maintain; and that if we continue destitute of it, especially when warned of its necessity, we are worse than unprepared for the regions of immortality.

It is in vain to say, that as you find the promise of eternal felicity appended to the exercise of a single virtue, your exercise of that one is perfectly sufficient, and all others are but works of supererogation. We shall immediately show you, that when you speak thus, you mistake the import of Christian virtue. But, in the mean time, we may observe, that so long as you admit the Bible to be the directory of your faith, and hope, and conduct, it is quite impossible for you to limit your regard to any single virtue whatever, or to any circumscribed number of virtues that you may choose to bring together. The authority which enjoins, the love which constrains, the hope which animates to the practice of one, enjoins, and constrains, and animates to the practice of them all. The moment that you make a selection in this respect,—however few, and however unimportant those may be which you exclude,—that moment you cease to pursue heaven in the way that God has instituted; and surely you cannot be so bold as to presume that you shall be able to attain it in some other way. It is very true, the scriptures says, as you have heard, that charity shall prepare you for heaven; but does not the scripture say also, that justice, temperance, humility, and patience are as much connected with that destination as charity is? If you dwell on those passages which speak with commendation of visible and active performances of duty, I would remind you of the passage which affirms, that "the pure in heart are blessed, for they shall see God." You may quote to me the declarations which bear, that they who "keep the commandments," and "abound in good works," shall "enter into life;" but I must also quote the declarations which affirm, that "without faith it is impossible to please God," —that "by grace are ye saved through faith,"—and that "whosoever believeth in Christ, shall not perish, but have everlasting life." And to those who take the opposite view, and refer to the statements in scripture, which trace our title to the unfading inheritance to a simple belief in the Saviour, I must proclaim the language, and the doctrine of this Psalm, which most distinctly represent that inheritance as reserved for those who "walk uprightly, and work righteousness, and speak the truth in their heart; who backbite not with their tongue, nor do evil to their neighbour, nor take up a reproach against their neighbour; in whose eyes a vile person is contemned, but who honour them that fear the Lord; who swear to their own hurt, and change not; who put not out their money to usury, nor take reward against the innocent." Thus, though the happiness of heaven is connected with the possession of a particular grace, yet being connected with the possession of every other particular grace, they must all be considered as equally essential, and none of them can possibly be excluded from the character of meetness, or the work of preparation, for that happiness, without opposing the authority of God, and breaking in upon the harmony of the Christian scheme.

2. But in the second place, independently of the explanation now given, the propriety of annexing the promise of heaven, to a certain portion of the Christian character, may be illustrated by considering what that portion of it truly and necessarily implies. It is nominally, but not really insulated. It stands by itself in the enunciation; but it does not stand by itself, when traced to its origin, and to its genuine effects. It has a natural or an instituted relation to every other religious and moral excellence in the Christian life; and whatever portion it be, if it belongs to pure, personal, practical Christianity, the individual to whom it adheres, possesses every other portion which can be required to constitute the sum total of Christian deportment.

Take the principle of faith for example. If your faith be genuine, it is the consequence of "the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." But the change which that produces, affects the whole man, and leaves no part of him under the reigning power of sin, but brings along with it a universal conformity to the law of God. So that possessing genuine faith, you of course possess every other good principle by which the heart ought to be pervaded. And then looking to the effects of this faith, it "purifies the heart," and as necessarily gives birth, and nourishment, and permanency to practical holiness in him whom it actuates, as "a good tree bringeth forth good fruit." So that when heaven is promised to you who believe, it is promised to you as having been "born again," and as being "holy in all manner of conversation," as well as relying on the atonement and righteousness of Christ, the former constituting your meetness for heaven, as the latter realises your title to it.

Again take the example of love to God. This affection is "shed abroad in your hearts by the power of the Holy Ghost given unto you." But surely it cannot be that the Holy Ghost should kindle up this affection in your souls, and not kindle up every other affection which might render them a temple fit for his inhabitation. And then, loving God, it follows by necessary consequence, that you "keep his commandments," that you submit to his will, that you seek to promote his glory. So that the hope of seeing him, and enjoying his presence in heaven, though warranted and cherished by conscious love to him, is connected with that love as implanted by the regenerating and sanctifying influences of the Spirit, and as constraining you in whom it dwells, to lead a life of universal and cheerful devotedness to the work of moral obedience, and of unfeigned piety.

Take now an example or two from outward conduct. It is common to speak with confidence of a man's future fate, if he was a man of strict and sterling honesty. And we have no objections to join in expressing that confidence, provided you give to honesty its real and scriptural import. A man of strict and sterling honesty does not merely signify a man who does not steal, and does not break his bargains, and does not violate his promises. He does not receive, and he does not deserve the title, if he refrains from these things for no other reason than that he is afraid of detection and punishment, of loosing his worldly reputation, and of injuring his secular interest. Were this all that could be affirmed of him, you might call him, in common phraseology, an honest man, but all your charitable indulgence, and all your recklessness of speech would not allow you to say, that such honesty will carry him to heaven. And why? Because such honesty is mean and selfish in the considerations which give rise to it, and is quite consistent with a character, in all other respects, base and unworthy. What we desiderate in this case is, that the honesty be practised from right principles and motives. Then we may safely connect it with eternal life, because then it forms a part of the spiritual life, and there can be no doubt of its being associated in the individual, with all the other duties of Christianity; for if a man be honest, because he fears God, and loves the Saviour, he must, from the operation of these powerful and permanent springs of holy living, be distinguished also by personal purity, and relative fidelity, and social benevolence, and divine piety. Hence it is, that in scripture, justice stands for the whole of practical religion and moral obligation. The true Christian is denominated the just man. The just are said to "live by faith;" and when we go to heaven, we go to "the spirits of the just made perfect."

Take another example from the passage before us. There are various excellent qualities here enumerated, of which we shall afterwards give an exposition. But let us select the least significant of them; that which says, that he who is to dwell in God's holy hill, "doeth no evil to his neighbour." This is a very negative virtue, and one to which you would not readily attach the greatest value; and yet that he who doeth no evil to his neighbour, shall inherit the kingdom of heaven, is a scriptural proposition, and indubitably true. And why? Because, doing no ill to our neighbour is not a mere passive goodness, proceeding from constitutional indolence, or natural softness, or fear of giving offence, or want of opportunities and temptations to mischief. But it is a branch of Christian love, for "love worketh no evil to his neighbour;" and love, with which this is inseparably united, and from which it directly flows, is a "fruit of the Spirit," whose "fruit is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth;" and it stands united with love to God, for "he that loveth God, loveth his brother also;" and loving God, he will not only love his brother, but he will study to do all those things which please God; and so extensive are the connections and dependencies of this sentiment, and such an all governing influence does it exercise, that it is declared to be "the bond of perfectness, and the fulfilling of the law."

We shall just give one instance more. Our Lord has told us, that if we "confess him before men, he will confess us before his Father in heaven." Now nobody can suppose that any sort of confession will answer the purpose; that we may confess what we do not feel; and that a mere verbal and public testimony to Christ will come up to the meaning of his requisition, and secure his open testimony to us at the last day. This would be promising reward to that very hypocrisy against which he uttered so many dreadful denunciations. No: the confession to which such a glorious and encouraging promise is annexed, necessarily implies sincerity in him who makes it, and is to be recompensed for it. It implies that Christ, whom he confesses, is the object of his faith, and of his gratitude, and of his reverence, and that he confessess Christ, just because these regards for him are animating his heart, and influencing his deportment. And then it is evident, that a true confession of Christ carries along with it, and cannot be separated from, the various other excellencies which make up the aggregate of Christain character, and form the qualification for eternal life; for not to speak of the renewing of the mind in which the whole originates, and which brings the individual who has experienced it under total and willing subjection to the Saviour, we may easily see that since confession of Christ, is produced by faith in Christ, this faith will not merely produce that declaratory effect, but, being genuine, will produce all the other sanctifying effects on the mind, and temper, and deportment of the believer, which are its native operation, and which constitute a life of faith upon earth, and a meetness for glory in heaven.

3. We observe in the third place, that this method of stating the doctrine is attended with some important advantages. The scripture is intended for habitual perusal. If we would derive from it all the practical benefit which it is designed or calculated to impart, we must read it through, and we must read it again and again. It must be our regular and unceasing study. Now, had it contained only one detailed enumeration of the Christian virtues, and had it been only with that one that the prospect of future happiness was connected, and had there been nothing in the rest of scripture, but general statements of the Christian character, or general allusions to it, accompanied with reference to the final recompense, we might indeed have become acquainted, both with the recompense and the character, and with the essential bearing of the one upon the other, but the impression could neither have been so lively, nor so forcible as it is by the mode of teaching and inculcating this branch of the Gospel system, which the Spirit of God has actually adopted. According to this mode, the specific virtues of which the Christian character is composed, are continually recurring to our observation. They are presented to us in every variety of form and aspect which can be given to them by precept, and by fact, and by parable; and in this way, not only do we get a more perfect illustration of their meaning and their application, but they are more closely interwoven with all our other knowledge and sentiments respecting sacred subjects, and acquire a firmer hold both of our memories and our affections. And then, by being individually associated with anticipations of future and eternal reward, they assume a character of infinitely greater moment than they could otherwise do. Taken in a state of separation from their appropriate recompense hereafter, or taken collectively in a state of union with that recompense, our feeling of their importance and their obligation, would be comparatively vague, and indistinct, and feeble. But coming in reiterated statements before us; pressed upon our attention one by one, as well as again and again; and each of them having the weighty sanction and recommendation of a blessed immortality attached to it,—they enforce upon our minds the impression of their unspeakable consequence to every candidate for heaven, and constrain us to an assiduous and faithful cultivation of every single virtue which can adorn our character, or prepare us for mingling with the inhabitants of heaven. They secure infinitely better than any other arrangement could do, our being "holy in all manner of conversation;" our being "fruitful in every good word and work;" our "standing perfect and complete in all the will of God."

Having made these observations on the propriety and usefulness of that mode of connecting the promise of eternal life with single virtues, and with partial delineations of character, which is adopted by the sacred writers,—we would shortly apply them for your "correction and instruction." We apply them to you who "are far off;" and we beseech you to consider the Christian character, not in that loose, and distant, and indefinite way in which you have been accustomed to regard it, but in that spiritual sense, and connected view, in which it is represented to you in scripture. Do not content yourselves with the semblance of any particular virtue on which you may have chosen to fix your peculiar attachment; but attend to its true intrinsic meaning, look to its necessary union with all the other duties of religion and morality, and examine yourselves by this broad, and legitimate, and searching standard, that you may see how far short you are of what God requires of those that shall be saved, and that you may be led to the blood of atonement for pardon and acceptance, and to the Holy Spirit for the transformation of your moral nature, and to the word of God for that system of faith and conduct to which every expectant of immortality must conform, if he would not be disappointed on the great day of the Lord. And we apply them to such of you as have been "brought nigh by the blood of the cross," exhorting and beseeching you, in your life of faith, and godliness, and good works, to guard against all partial contemplations of Christian character. Let your studies be directed to all that is revealed for your guidance and your government as followers of Christ. Meditate deeply and habitually on the spiritual import, and relative bearings, of every precept that is given you, and of every grace that you are required to cultivate. Beware of letting any one virture stand as a substitute or compensation for another. Look well to the state of your hearts; to your principles and motives; to the uniformity and unreservedness of your obedience. And while you have continual recoures to the atonement of Christ for the "remission of your sins," have continual recourse also by prayer to that Spirit, who will make you meet for "abiding in the tabernacle, and dwelling in the holy hill of God."

PART III.

Let us now turn our attention for a little to the character, as here pourtrayed, of those "who shall abide in the tabernacle, and dwell in the holy hill of God." You will observe, that it does not consist in mere profession of religion, however orthodox and however flaming that profession of religion may be. It is moral practice that is insisted on;—not that profession is either improper or useless; it is dutiful and indispensable; but it is of so little value, comparatively speaking, that it is not once mentioned or hinted at, while all the stress is laid on the maintainance of holy conduct. You will also observe, tha tthe mere outward acts of virtue are not rested in, as if they were sufficient: its internal principles and operations are also brought forward as no less important and necessary. You will observe still farther, that the account is not confined to that mere negative worth or harmlessness on which so many plume themselves, as entitling them to the reputation and the hope of Christians. That indeed is a requisite attainment, and, considering the many temptations to active and mischievous sinfulness with which we are beset, is an attainment of no inconsiderable difficulty, and no inconsiderable value. But still it is not so valuable as to supersede the pursuit of positive excellence, the discharge of substantial duty; and in the passage before us, we are taught that while we "do the one," we must "not leave the other undone." And you will observe, finally, that the catalogue of graces here given is not limited to those that are of a more showy and striking kind. With these we are extremely apt to be satisfied, or at least to be so much enamoured as to neglect the humbler and less significant virtues. But it is plain from this, as well as many other passages of scripture, that there is no moral quality so humble or so common-place as not to merit and demand our practical regard; and that while we should make the highest efforts of integrity and generosity which fall within the compass of our power, there is no species of good conduct so obscure, and so little noticed, as to be unworthy of our cordial attachment, and our diligent endeavours.

1. The man who shall abide in God's tabernacle, and dwell in his holy hill, is said to "walk uprightly." He is not a man of mere outward or literal obedience; he obeys with the heart. Whatever he does in conformity to the enactments of the law, he does "out of a good conscience." He acts from principle; from respect for God's authority; from faith in the Redeemer, and love to him; from all those pure motives with which religion furnishes its votaries, for giving real excellence and undeviating uniformity to their conduct. He may often and greatly come short of the holiness to which he aspires; but still he aims at it really, cordially, and steadily. Sincerity pervades the whole of his deportment. And whether he is seen by men or not, he lives as "an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile;" he "walks before God with a perfect heart;" and amidst his manifold failings and transgressions, studies at least to maintain purity in all his intentions, and integrity in all his ways.

2. Again he cultivates rightcousness and truth. He is just and honest in all his dealings with his fellow creatures; he respects all their rights and privileges; gives to every one of them his due; withholds nothing that they can equitably claim from him; and would feel unhappy if he had been instrumental in inflicting upon them the most inconsiderable wrong. The most tempting opportunities of fraud may occur; interest may prompt him to commit it; superior skill and ingenuity may insure success in the gainful attempt; detection may be difficult, and punishment impossible. But he finds his way through all these snares and allurements, and walks firmly and perseveringly on the plain onward path of justice; and shows that he would scorn dishonesty, though bribed to practise it by the wealth of a world. And the same regard to righteousness that he manifests in his actions, he also manifests in his words. He "speaketh the truth in his heart;" he thinks what he says; he believes what he affirms; he intends what he promises. He not only shrinks back with horror from the crime of perjury, but disdains to have recourse to falsehood and equivocation, even when not restrained by the awfulness of an oath. A lie may be the means of saving him from many a pang; or of concealing the certain cause of much worldly shame; or of procuring for him many desirable advantages. But he abhors the lie; and rather than be guilty of the meanness and the sin which it implies, he will endure any suffering, he will expose himself to every degree of obloquy, and will forego the richest earthly blessings, without one feeling of regret. The God whom he serves is "a just God," and the God of truth; and in preparing for the enjoyment of communion with him in heaven, he "worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart."

3. Another feature in the character of those who are to dwell in the holy hill of God is the tenderness with which they treat the reputation and well being of their neighbour. They may be powerfully tempted to do him injury in these respects. But these temptations they resist; and in the spirit of love they refrain from every thing that may unnecessarily subject him to loss or suffering. They "backbite him not with their tongue." They take no pleasure like malicious men, or like envious men, or like revengeful men, in imputing to him faults which he never committed, or in proclaiming and exaggerating the errors into which he has fallen, or in giving such representations of him as to mar his promotion in the world, to cool the affection of his friends, to embitter the resentment of his enemies, or to hurl him from the place which he occupied in the estimation of his brethren and of society. And as they will invent nothing, so they will do nothing to his prejudice; nothing wilfully or intentionally to work him mischief; nothing to thwart his laudable ambition; nothing to injure his person or his property; nothing to offend and harrass his feelings; nothing to prevent or mislead him, or in any way to hurt his spiritual interests. All these things they are careful to avoid, so that neither with design nor through heedlessness they may do harm to the least or the lowest of their kind. And they will not even help to propagate the slander which others have created. They might, according to the spirit and custom of the world, take up and circulate the "reproach against their neighbour," without feeling any remorse, or being accounted calumniators, merely because they had not originated it. But the people of God act not, in this any more than in other respects, according to the spirit and custom of the world. They are actuated by the charity which has this among its other excellent properties, that it "thinketh no evil, rejoiceth not in iniquity, and hopeth all things." And under the influence of this divine principle, they will not retail what is calculated to blast the good name of another, and shelter themselves under the plea that they were only giving currency to the fame which was already "running to and fro." They will rather suppress or contradict the reproach which has met their ear, and thus prevent it from accomplishing the wicked errand on which it has been sent abroad. They will recollect that "charity abideth" after faith is turned into vision, and hope into enjoyment; that its exercise will be one principal source of their happiness in the holy hill of God; and that they will be but ill prepared for practising and relishing it in heaven, if they meet there with those to whom they had denied it upon earth. And, therefore, in the hope of dwelling in that region of love, and mingling with its affectionate inhabitants, they will, in the course of their preparation for it, not only abound in good works, but be especially careful to do evil to no man, and not to "take up a reproach against their neighbour."

4. But farther, those who are to enter heaven are here distinguished by this—that "in their eyes a vile person is contemned, while they honour them that fear the Lord." Very different is the manner in which irreligious and worldly men bestow their regards. They look chiefly, if not solely, to external circumstances and adventitious distinctions, and are determined by these in the judgments which they form, and the sentiments which they cherish concerning their fellow-men. If, on the one hand, a man be humble in station; if he be poor in his outward estate; if he be meanly fed, and clothed, and lodged; if he be without learning and without influence,—he is the object of their contempt, whatever be the height of his religious and moral attainments. And, on the other hand, if a man be of high birth; if he be opulent; if he be invested with temporal grandeur; if he inhabit a palace, and be "clothed in purple and fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day;" or if he be remarkable for his science and his scholarship, and his literary fame,—they show him every mark of deference and respect, even though he is infidel in his principles, profligate in his morals, and living "without God in the world."

But it is the very reverse of this with such as have set their faces Zionward, and in their journey thither are enlightened and guided by the Spirit of truth. A man may have all the personal accomplishments, and all the exterior greatness that human wisdom can acquire, or that human ambition can point to, yet they esteem him not on these accounts. They know that these by themselves are of no value in the sight of God, and that they cannot accompany their possessor to the eternal state. They, therefore, look for the more substantial and acceptable and precious attainments of piety and holiness; and not finding these, but discovering in their place a moral vileness, alienation from the love of God, unbelief of the Saviour, attachment to sin, base affections, worldly dispositions, and licentious habits, they contemn the person to whom such unworthiness cleaves, and by whom it is cherished. They do not refuse him the civil honour and external respect to which his situation in society may entitle him; but they give him not the homage of the heart; and, surrounded as he is by all that is fitted to captivate and dazzle the worldly eye, they cannot lose sight of his corruption and wickedness; and thinking of that as determining his claim to their deference, they pity him, they look down upon him, they despise his character, they testify against his evil deeds, and will not allow their soul to "come into his secrets," or their honour to be "united to his assembly." But let a man be as destitute and abject in his outward circumstances as he may; let him be the victim at once of poverty, and disease, and neglect; let the world in their wisdom have settled it that he shall be passed by as undeserving of notice, and trampled on as one who has no right to complain; still they are not influenced by these seeming disadvantages to harbour any dislike to him, or to treat him with any contumely. They remember that Lazarus was a beggar, and "laid at the rich man's gate full of sores," and yet that when he died, he "was carried by the angels to Abraham's bosom." They remember that the apostles were deemed "the off-scouring of all things," and were "despised," and "persecuted," and "defamed;" and yet that they were "full of the Holy Ghost" and of spiritual power, and came at length to "the spirits of the just made perfect, to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to God the judge of all." They remember that a greater than the apostles was still more lightly esteemed than Lazarus, "despised and rejected of men, had not where to lay his head," and at last expired under the ignominy of a cross; and yet that all the while he was the Son of the most high God; that his very humiliation perfected his character; that amidst the indignities that were heaped upon him, he was triumphing over sin and hell; and that he now reigns on the throne of glory, the dispenser of salvation, and the joy of his redeemed people. And remembering these things they learn to penetrate through the guise of outward wretchedness, sad and revolting as it may be; and beholding in him whom it covers, one "who fears the Lord," whose heart is devoted to the saviour, who is living in faith, and purity, and patience, and heavenly mindedness, and who from his hut of poverty, and his bed of straw, lifts up the voice of praise to the God of his salvation, and darts the eye of hope forward to the unsuffering kingdom that awaits him;—beholding in him thus a child of God, and an heir of immortality, they honour him with the unfeigned tribute of their approbation and their love; they fix on him a kindly and delighted eye; they are not afraid to minister to him as "a fellow citizen with the saints;" and their souls glow with exalted affection towards him, as they anticipate the day when they shall see him arrayed in the robe, and wearing the crown of "life eternal." And by thus nourishing in their souls a hatred of sin and a love of holiness, whatever be the dress which hides the deformity of the one, and conceals the beauties of the other, they gradually and certainly fit themselves for "abiding in the tabernacle of the Lord, and dwelling in his holy hill."

5. Then comes the inviolable honour and unbending integrity of this character. "He sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not." He prefers a good conscience to every thing else. Relief from personal injury, and the advancement of his earthly interests are not prized by him when they come into competition with a faithful and scrupulous adherence to his word. If he has taken an oath, or what should be the same thing with a man of real principle, given his solemn promise, in any transaction which he may find it convenient or profitable to have annulled and cancelled,—whatever be the inconveniences or losses to which its fulfilment may subject him, and even though by breaking it he should "gain the whole world," and escape any penalty from the hand of mortals, yet he "holds fast his righteousness and will not let it go." He keeps his oath, he adheres to his promise, in the full extent of its import and design. He suffers for it; but he is contented to suffer, since he has the approving and pleasing testimony of his own mind; and he is willing to endure any consequences that may result from his engagement, provided he keeps his "conscience void of offence towards God and men." He is looking forward to heaven as the dwelling-place of the saints; and he cannot look forward with comfort or satisfaction to the company of those to whom he was bound by the most sacred ties, but whose expectations he had frustrated, and whose interests he had impaired, at the instigation of his own selfishness, and at the expense of his own pledged veracity; and still more, he is looking forward to heaven as the place where he hopes to derive ineffable enjoyment from the immediate and glorious presence of God, and that is altogether inconsistent with an act which involves in it the violation of what he had invoked God to witness as the God of omniscience and of truth, and the breach of that commandment which says, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain."

6. Finally, "He putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent:" That is, he will not increase his wealth by any unjust or oppressive means. He will prosecute his worldly employments with becoming care and diligence. He will not despise the maxim which says, that "the hand of the diligent maketh rich." And he will receive with gratitude, and enjoy with moderation, whatever his heavenly father is pleased to grant as the fruit of his lawful enterprise, or the reward of his honest industry. But then he has Christian principle, Christian love, and Christian hope, to elevate him above the world, to preserve him amidst the debasing and selfish influence of its peculiar occupations, and to give him the victory over its most powerful allurements. He may lend his money for gain, as he may endeavour to profit by any other species of property; but he will not employ it as an engine of ungenerous and aggrandising power. He will not take advantage of the misfortunes and distresses of others to exact from them what they are unable to afford, and to aggravate their hardships, already sufficiently severe, in order to add to his own treasures, already more than adequate to all his need. Believing and feeling that the substance which providence has conferred upon him is committed to his stewardship for the good of others, he will not act so inconsistently with that scriptural doctrine as to make his substance an instrument of evil to them. He will never regard the liberality of his gifts to some, as any atonement or any compensation for his griping cruelty to others; but considering all that he has a sacred trust, for which he must finally render an account, he will refrain from every attempt to increase it by usurious dealings, and will rather, according to the proverbial phraseology of the Bible, be ready to "lend to those who would borrow of him, hoping for nothing again." And as he detests and avoids usury, so his soul abhors a bribe, nor will he permit it to stain his hand. Whether he be an administrator of public justice, or whether he be a private individual who has it in his power to do injury to his fellow men, he will never encroach on their rights, nor deal out iniquity to the innocent. No reward that can be offered will succeed in prevailing upon him to touch a hair of their head. He will rather throw around them the shield of his protection; he will vindicate their character, and maintain their cause, and defend them from every assault; and this he will do, though detraction and malice should be all his recompense, and though an opposite conduct would have secured for him much of the gold that perisheth, the favour of the powerful, and the countenance of the great. He is proof against all such temptations to unjust and ungenerous conduct, for he looks to God as his father, to men as his brethren, and to heaven as his home.

Such, my friends, is a very short and imperfect view of the character of those who are to dwell in the holy hill of the Lord, so far as it is here unfolded. Let me exhort you to study it; to study it minutely and seriously, and with application to yourselves. You must necessarily be distinguished by it, otherwise you cannot see the kingdom of heaven. This you are assured of, and this you profess to believe. Be persuaded then to cultivate it with unceasing activity. Pray, and strive that you may be all which is required of those who would enter the celestial abodes; that you may have the principles, the temper, and the conduct that is prescribed to them by him who "sits upon the throne;" and that as every day brings you nearer the eternal world, every day may find you better prepared for entering into the "rest which remaineth for the people of God." "He that doth these things shall never be moved." He shall be like Mount Zion itself which abideth for ever. Only build upon the Rock of Ages; cling to the mighty Redeemer; live as the citizens of heaven,—and nothing shall then be able to remove you from your place, to hurt your interests, or to blast your hope. You are safe amidst the buffettings of adversity, and amidst the assaults of temptation, and amidst, the malice and persecution of your bitterest and your mightiest foes. "All things are yours, for ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." He "knoweth them that are his;" and having engraven on the tablets of your hearts, and on the features of your character, the marks of his true children, he will keep you as "the apple of his eye" during all the time of your sojourning in the wilderness, and then he will put you in possession of the riches, the honours, and the pleasures of the promised land.

LECTURE IV.

'Preserve me, O God: for in thee do I put my trust. O my soul, thou hast said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord: my goodness extendeth not to thee; But to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight.'—PSALM xvi. 1.—3.

The first thing that David does in this beautiful and interesting Psalm, is to commend himself to the protection of God, as the God in whom he had placed his confidence. And this is what all of us will do, who are living under the influence of vital and experimental religion. If we have been permitted to know God as he really is, and if we have been enabled to cherish towards him those sentiments which it becomes us to feel, an implicit and unwavering affiance in him must necessarily pervade and animate our breasts. He possesses all those perfections in an infinite degree, by which such affiance is created, and encouraged, and confirmed; he is full of kindness to his people; he is as able as he is willing to do them good; and every promise that he has made to promote their welfare, he is unchangeably faithful to perform. So that, if we be among the number of his people, we may confide in him with our whole heart, for every communication of his grace, and for every exercise of his power, which our varied circumstances may require.

This trust we will constantly repose in God, because he is constantly deserving of it, and because it is constantly demanded for our personal comfort and stability. But it will be especially active and vigorous when we are exposed to those peculiar difficulties and dangers by which every Christian is often beset in the course of his pilgrimage. In such seasons, and in such situations, we will think much of the divine character; we will contemplate it as it is exhibited to our view in the revelation of the Gospel; we will meditate on the great and glorious attributes by which it is distinguished; we will listen to all the assurances of mercy, and to all the promises of assistance with which it stands connected in the word of truth; we will remember how He to whom it belongs, has in the experience of them that he knew to be his, verified every declaration that he had made, and redeemed every pledge that he had given; and thus from what we have 'seen with our eyes,' and 'heard with our ears,' and 'believed with our hearts,' we will regard him as our only 'refuge in the time of trouble,' and cling to him as one who is 'mighty to save,' and worthy to be 'the confidence of all the ends of the earth.'

Nor will we rest satisfied with a mere consciousness of this unlimited reliance upon God; we will give it free expression in those cases, which are calculated to call it forth, by applying to him for the help or the deliverance that we need, in the language of devout and fervent supplication. We will beseech him to preserve us: to preserve us from the temporal adversities that would otherwise distress and overwhelm us; but above all to preserve us from the spiritual calamities by which our souls are put in peril of present discomfort, and 'everlasting destruction.' We will beseech him to preserve us from the workings of inward corruption, and from the wiles of the wicked one, and from the snares and temptations of an evil world. We will beseech him to preserve us from the sins that most easily beset us,—from avarice, or from sensuality, or from worldly mindedness, or from indifference, or from sloth. We will beseech him to preserve us from distrusting his providence, and from slighting his grace; from Judas's heartless treachery, and from Peter's cowardly denial; from the unbelief of the Sadducees, and from the hypocrisy, and self-righteousness, and bigotry of the Scribes and Pharisees; from the iniquity that injures men, and from the impiety that dishonours God, and from the intemperance that degrades ourselves; from the indulgences that impair our love to the Saviour, and the prejudices and pursuits that weaken our faith in his merits; from 'the fear of man, which bringeth a snare,' and from the 'fear of death,' which makes us 'subject to bondage; from the backsliding which fills us with present remorse, and from the apostacy which terminates in irretrievable ruin. We will beseech him to preserve us from such evil as these; and we will enforce our treaty by the argument here employed by the Psalmist; 'Preserve me, O God, for in thee do I put my trust.' We feel that in ourselves we have no resource, and that there is no help for us in man. But we have found in God an all-sufficient refuge. In the exhibition of his character which he has afforded us, and in the manifold declarations which he has addressed to us in his word, he exhorts, he encourages, he commands us to place our sole dependance upon Him, and to flee to him as our 'strong hold in the day of trouble.' And, therefore, when we cry to him for preservation and deliverance, it is right that we should appeal to all that he has said, and to all that he has promised; and plead the confidence which he himself has taught us to rest on his mercy which never faileth, on his wisdom whose depth is unfathomable, on his strength which is mighty and everlasting, and on his 'truth which he has magnified above all his name.'

'O my soul, thou hast said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord.' Here the Psalmist intimates that he had taken the Lord to be his Lord; and surely it is impossible for any of us who are at once acquainted with our duty, and our interest, to make a better or a different choice. He is entitled to the supremacy over us in every respect in which that supremacy can be either exercised by him, or acknowledged by us. And when we refuse him any measure of homage or submission; when we do not acquiesce in his disposal of every thing that concerns us; when we do not cheerfully commit ourselves to him to be governed and treated according to his sovereign pleasure, we forget what is due from the creature to the Creator, and are guilty of rebellion against the all-perfect ruler of the universe. But it is not only our duty; it is also our interest to take the Lord for our Lord. Surrendering ourselves to the dominion of any other being, or asserting our own independence, as if we were divinities, we provoke the holy displeasure of omnipotence, and must sink under its overwhelming weight. But yielding implicitly and unreservedly to God, who is not more the holder of all authority, than he is the fountain of all good, we must be safe, and we must be happy; because in that case there is nothing to interrupt the current of his favour, and his favour must secure for every one who enjoys it, guardianship from all evil, and the possession of every blessing.

It is necessary, however, that in this dedication of ourselves to God, the heart be really and chiefly concerned. It is the soul that must say to him, 'Thou art my Lord.' Mere language of this sort is easily employed; and in the estimation of those before whom it is used, it may have all the tone, not only of sincerity, but of fervour, and it may procure for us the reputation of personal and decided piety. But going 'out of feigned lips,' it can meet with no acceptance from the God of truth, and will be more displeasing to him than the absence of all acknowledgment of his excellence and supremacy. Whatever we say to him; whatever declarations we make of dependance upon his bounty, or of submission to his power; whatever pledges we utter of future devotedness to his service and glory;—it must all be the faithful expression of our convictions and our feelings. We must be conscious of the vow that we intimate in words having its origin, and its purpose, and its meaning within us. And He to whom it is offered must see it to be the effusion of a sentiment which goes forth with the full approbation of our understanding, and with the unreserved consent of our will, and with the cheerful tribute of our affections.

And, aware of our aptness to forget what we have resolved and promised in reference to God, we must frequently remind our souls, as it were, of the ties by which they are voluntarily and solemnly bound to him, and of the consequent obligations which they have to fulfil. It is of infinite importance for us, both as to comfort and improvement, never to lose sight of the fact that we are not our own but his. But there are many weaknesses and corruptions within us, and there are many temptations and delusions without us, which tend either to enfeeble the impression of that fact, or to efface it altogether. And, therefore, we cannot be too careful to prevent it from being impaired; we cannot be too vigilant against the approach or influence of any thing that would injure it in the least degree; we cannot be too anxious to add to its native vividness and strength; and with a jealousy of its fading away, and with a desire of increasing its practical effect, we should often and seriously put ourselves in remembrance of what we have done, saying, like the Psalmist, 'O my soul, thou hast said unto the Lord, thou art my Lord.'

Here, however, there is another evil to be guarded against. When we have consecrated ourselves to God, and when recollecting this, we are active in his service, the Pharisaical idea is apt to steal upon us, that we have something to boast of; that our labours may be beneficial to whom they are rendered; and that on account of these, we are entitled to his favour and protection. There cannot be a greater or more pernicious mistake. Nothing that we are capable of doing can be of advantage to God. It can neither increase the sum of his blessedness, nor the perfection of his character, nor the lustre of his glory. He is infinitely above us, and he stands in no need of us. Supreme in the happiness of his being; unbounded in the attributes of his nature; self-existent, eternal and unchangeable, he can derive no benefit from our services, even though we had been as sinless as the angels in heaven, and as distinguished by wisdom and by strength as they are. And how much more impressively should we feel the force of this statement, when we recollect the ignorance, and the weakness, and the pollution which adhere to us amidst our highest attainments in piety and virtue! The vilest thing on earth may, of itself, or in its combinations, be useful to the mightiest monarch that ever swayed a sceptre, because they stand in the relation of one creature to another creature. But as creatures we are removed at an immeasurable distance from the Creator, and on this account, we cannot be 'profitable to our Maker, as he that is wise and kind may be profitable to' his neighbour. Whatever we have, or whatever we do, that is entitled to the name of goodness, is the gift of his own bounty, bestowed upon us that we may have wherewithal to make a practical acknowledgment of our dependance upon him, and to render the homage which is due to so great and gracious a God. And whether we offer to him the tribute of our hearts or the praises of our lips, or the labours of our active life, we must still say to him, 'All things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee.'

But while our goodness extendeth not to God, so as that it can be useful to him or meritorious in his sight, 'it extendeth,' says the Psalmist, 'to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent in whom is all our delight.' There are saints in the earth. Alienated as men naturally are from God, and pervaded as their general character is by moral transgression, there are those of them to whom this appellation may be justly applied. They are saints; they are holy; they love what is holy in their hearts, and they practise what is holy in their lives. Their holiness indeed has much imperfection mixed with it, and comes far short of what the divine law requires of them. But still it exists in their principles, in their desires, in their endeavours, and in their actual acquirements; and, therefore, it confers upon them their leading and distinctive character. They are saints,—transformed and sanctified by divine grace; separated from a 'world that lieth in wickedness;' made to see and to feel the evil of sin; redeemed from its reigning power; animated to struggle against its temptations, and to deny themselves to its indulgences; taught to love the character of God, and to obey his will, and to take delight in his commandments; and guided by his Spirit into a decided, cordial, habitual, and persevering cultivation of those qualities of the mind and conduct which constitute true holiness.

Being thus saints, they are 'excellent.' They may be lightly esteemed among men; they may be made the subjects of ridicule and reproach; they may be accounted and treated as the basest of hypocrites. And indeed a more striking and lamentable proof that such is actually the case, cannot easily be conceived than this, that the very term which the Spirit of God employs to designate them in the Scripture, is the very term by which worldly men direct against them their malignity and their scorn, and by which they hold them up to general detestation and contempt. But 'it is a small matter to be thus judged of men's judgment; there is one that judgeth, even God.' And in his revealed word, while he denominates them 'saints,' he at the same time pronounces them to be 'excellent.' And how can they be otherwise than excellent in the true sense of that word? God is the standard of excellence, and they are like God. They are renewed after his image; they conform to his will; they imitate his character; they love what he loves, and hate what he hates; and though by reason of natural and moral infirmity they are frequently 'overtaken in a fault,' and sometimes fall into grievous sins, they yet sorrow for their unworthiness in his sight, and according to his appointment, they apply to the blood of atonement for the expiation of their guilt, and put themselves under the sanctifying and guiding influences of the Spirit of all grace, and labour with all their heart and with all their strength to be every thing which the God of truth and purity requires. Thus 'approving the things that are excellent,' and thus doing the things that are excellent, they are the objects of God's affection, and are honoured with his favourable testimony.

And while this is the most satisfactory mode of demonstrating their excellence, it may be also illustrated by contrasting them with their fellow men. It is neither their duty nor their habit to assert their own superiority by making such a comparison. But the comparison is stated in Scripture, when it is affirmed that 'the righteous is more excellent than his neighbour:' those who have not experienced the renewal which he has experienced, and do not maintain the character which he maintains, are plainly destitute of those properties which assimilate the creature to his God, and make him worthy of the esteem and admiration of every holy intelligence. Nay they are polluted and degraded by qualities whose intrinsic turpitude, whose contrariety to the supreme will, and whose mischievous and ruinous effects expose them to the divine condemnation, and alienate from them the regards of the wise and the good, both in heaven and on earth. That unregenerated world, of which they form a part, and which so often puts 'good for evil, and evil for good,' may admire and applaud them for the very actions in which their spiritual debasement is embodied; but this is only an additional proof of their degeneracy, and imparts not one tittle of worth to palliate or to redeem their essential demerit. And even the most specious and comely appearance which their deportment may be made to assume,—all the decencies, and honesties, and charities, that may find a place in it, and all the beneficial influence which may accidentally emanate from it,—cannot conceal from us its inherent depravity, and its total worthlessness, when we search into its spirit and principles, and apply to the determination of its merits that test which is furnished by the word and the law of God. But of how much purer and more elevated a cast than this,—how completely different from it, indeed, is the deportment of the saint! The latter has not only the aspect but the reality of excellence. It is excellent not merely in the estimation of fallible mortals, but in the judgment of a righteous, omniscient, and unerring God. It is excellent in the effects which it produces; in the deeds of which it consists; in the motives by which it is regulated; and in the source from which it springs. And while the deportment of the worldling has worthlessness for its general character, and while any portions of it which seem to be exceptions to that general character, are not so in truth, the deportment of the saint is pervaded by excellence, both in its spirit and in its actings, and the imperfections by which it is partially or occasionally tarnished, are merely indications that he whom it characterises, though raised from the death of sin, and made 'a new creature,' and consecrated to the service of his Maker, is still in a body of corruption, and still in a world of temptation and of trial.

The Psalmist not only asserts the excellence of the saints, but declares that in them was 'all his delight.' And such will be the case with us, if our minds are actuated and governed by right sentiments. In the first place, and in the highest measure, we will delight in God as the centre of all perfection, and as the fountain of all good. And in the next place, and in a proportionate degree, we will delight in such of his creatures as are entitled to our complacency from the resemblance which they bear to him, or from their being suitable to those affections which he permits us to cherish. Among these the saints will hold a distinguished place. They are adorned with all those features of moral beauty, which are fitted to secure our attachment, and to awaken in us emotions of satisfaction and pleasure. These indeed are possessed by the angels in a much higher style; but though we must be gratified with meditating on the existence, the attributes, the employments, and the bliss of such exalted and sinless beings, we cannot delight in them as we delight in those of our fellow-men, who wear the same holy likeness to God which they wear, and do his will upon earth as they do it in heaven; who, while they are thus clothed with those graces of piety, and purity, and benevolence, which place these celestial spirits so near the throne of love, are still 'bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh;' who are the subjects of that redeeming mercy and of that sanctifying grace, by which they and we are united to one common head, and in one common hope; and whose very failings and errors not only fill them with that penitential sorrow which only endears a fellow-creature the more to our regard, but serve to excite in us a deeper sympathy and a livelier interest in their behalf, and thus to enhance the joy that we feel when we see them keeping themselves pure from 'the corruption that is in the world,' cultivating the habits of godliness and virtue, and 'beautified with the salvation' of the Gospel.

But if we imitate the Psalmist, we will not simply delight in the saints—in them will be 'all our delight.' We will take no delight in the wicked,—in those who have rebelled against God, who have rejected the Saviour, who are continuing in the pollutions of sin. Even them, indeed, we will not regard with sentiments of hatred or dislike. So far as they are blind to their own welfare and in danger of perdition, we will view them with deep-felt compassion, and withhold from them no expression of kindness and humanity which their situation may demand from us. Nay, we will look with an indulgent eye on every thing that is amiable in their temper, and dispositions, and conduct; following the example of our Redeemer, who is said to have loved a young man that showed he had some good thing in him, though he preferred the riches of the world to the service of the Saviour, and thus evinced that he was not of the number of 'the saints.' But we cannot delight in them, because they have not those principles, those affections, those substantial marks of God's people, which we have learnt to prize as the only legitimate causes of devoted and complacent regard. This kind and this degree of regard we will confine to 'the saints' or 'the excellent ones of the earth:' the outgoings of our hearts will be to them, and to them alone. In the contemplation of their personal worth, we will feel a pleasure with which the most splendid endowments, and the most heroic exploits of the ungodly, can never inspire our breasts. And from those who are great, and wise, and happy in this world's vocabulary, but not in the word of God, we will turn away to feast our minds, and nourish our virtue, amidst the faith, and the patience, and the righteousness of the true Christian,—though, like his divine Master, whom he adores, and who has made him what he is, he be 'despised and rejected of men,' and 'have not where to lay his head.'

Now, it is to the saints, who are thus excellent, and in whom we take delight, that our goodness extends. If we have just views of the relation in which they stand to God, and of the character which they maintain; if we cherish towards them those sentiments of love and admiration to which their excellence entitles them; if we really rejoice in them as God's children and as our brethren in Christ Jesus, it follows as a matter of course that we will do them good, according to their need and according to our ability. Their circumstances are such as to admit of our services being beneficial to them; and these services, so far as they are required, we are under indispensable obligations to render to the full extent of our capacity. Feelings of attachment and words of sympathy are well enough in their own place; but they are of no avail, unless accompanied with the doings of a cordial and a practical benevolence; and by such doings our treatment of the saints must be habitually distinguished. It is incumbent on us, indeed, to 'do good to all men as we have opportunity;' and he is not a true and enlightened Christian that is a stranger to the exercise of this expanded and universal charity,—that does not imitate his heavenly Father who 'makes his sun to shine on the evil and the good, and his rain to descend on the just and on the unjust.' But it is peculiarly incumbent on us to do good 'to them who are of the household of faith.' Between them and us there is a spiritual and intimate relationship, which not only warrants, but calls for the exercise of a kindlier affection and the communications of a richer liberality, than what can be considered as due to those who are still 'far from righteousness,' and 'far from God.' And we will be especially careful to let our goodness extend to them, when they are suffering persecution on account of their marked separation from the world, and their faithful adherence to the cause of truth and duty. In such a contingency we will do what we can to invigorate their faith, to preserve their stedfastness, to animate their hopes, to comfort and encourage them in their way to Sion. We will remember them in our prayers; we will assist them by our counsels; we will stimulate them by our example. And while we thus attend to their spiritual necessities, we will not be unmindful of their temporal wants and circumstances. We will study to protect them from the violence, and to vindicate them from the slanders, of unbelieving men. And by countenancing their honest exertions, ministering of our abundance to them in their times of need, and consoling them when they suffer from injury or from neglect, we will endeavour to realise in their experience that maxim of the Bible which says that 'godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come.'

All this we will do, in obedience to the claims of that community of faith and hope which we hold with our brethren in Christ Jesus, and in a wise adaptation of our conduct to the exigencies in which their religious profession may occasionally place them; and we do it from a solemn view to the account which we have to render at the last day, and to the specified character which we must have if we would be welcomed by our Judge in these cheering words: 'Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.' This sentence will rest upon the fact that those on whom it is to be pronounced had been minutely careful to make their goodness extend to the saints, and to the excellent of the earth, whom Christ thus graciously condescends to identify with himself: 'For I was an hungered and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me drink; I was a stanger and ye took me in; naked and ye clothed me; I was sick and ye visited me; I was in prison and ye came unto me.' 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.' Let all true Christians bear this continually in mind, and be determined by it not only to cultivate that charity which goes out in deeds of beneficence among all the suffering children of Adam, but especially to cultivate that brotherly kindness which cares for the poor afflicted members of Christ's body, and which, as manifested towards them, he will consider and reward as manifested towards himself.

And let those who are in the habit of ridiculing and traducing the disciples of Christ, who persecute instead of protecting them, and who draw the weapons of their reproach out of the armoury of the divine word, attaching the nickname of saints to such as, if there be truth in the Gospel, God 'delighteth to honour;' let those who speak and act thus, if unsusceptible of generous feelings, and uninfluenced by any respect for that consistency which, as professing Christians, it becomes them to observe, be persuaded 'by the terrors of that Lord' whom they insult as often as they traduce his people, to desist from their cruel and unhallowed mockery, and to adopt the more honourable, the more rational, and the safer part, of throwing the shield of their protection over those who though subjected to suffering are now 'the sons of God,' and will soon enter into their heavenly inheritance. They may 'reject this counsel,' but if they do, it is 'against themselves,' and 'verily they shall have their reward:' for most assuredly a decree of condemnation will go forth against them from the judgment seat of Christ, since he can annex to the sentence which will seal their fate for ever, 'I was an hungered and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger and ye took me not in; naked and ye clothed me not; sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not: Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it not to me.'—'And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.'

LECTURE V.

'Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another God: their drink-offerings of blood will I not offer, nor take up their names into my lips. The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance and of my cup: thou maintainest my lot. The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage. I will bless the Lord, who hath given me counsel; my reins also instruct me in the night-season.'—PSALM xvi. 4—7.

The Psalmist had declared his trust in God, and upon that ground applied for the divine protection and support. He had reminded himself of his having taken the Lord for his portion, and of his having promised to be his faithful and devoted servant. But in the midst of those happy and elevated feelings which this was calculated to awaken, he did not forget the humility which it became him to cherish and to express. He acknowledged that all his doings, however excellent they might be in their own nature, and however beneficial in their effects, were utterly unprofitable to his Maker, and could merit no favour for him from that supreme and holy source. At the same time he acknowledged that his goodness extended to his brethren of mankind, and especially to the saints, or the excellent of the earth; that he was under obligations to promote their comfort and welfare by every means in his power; and that to a sense of duty there was added the more persuasive motive of the pleasure that he had in contemplating their worth, in holding intercourse with them, and in communicating to them whatever benefits he was able to confer.

At the beginning of the passage that we have now read, the Psalmist introduces the subject of idolatry, and forms respecting it a worthy and decided resolution. 'Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another God; their drink-offerings of blood will I not offer, nor take up their names into my lips.' He here speaks of the misery of such as attach themselves to the worship and service of false gods: 'Their sorrows shall be multiplied.' Not only shall they be subjected to calamity, but their calamities shall be manifold. One evil shall come upon them after another, till there be such an accumulation of suffering as utterly to overwhelm and destroy them. And this arises from two causes. In the first place, the gods in whom they have placed their confidence are mere imaginary beings, who, of course, can do nothing for them, and by their dependance upon them, they are led into many dangerous and fatal errors. And, in the second place, by forsaking the true God, they have forfeited all the advantages which trust in him, and obedience to him would have certainly produced; and by giving to another the glory which is due to him alone, they have provoked his holy indignation, and rendered it essential for the honour of his character and his government, to inflict upon them condign punishment. While they lose all the satisfaction and happiness which results from believing the doctrines, and performing the duties, and cherishing the hopes of true religion, they also incur all the wretchedness that is so plentifully engendered by the absurdities, the immoralities, and abominations of a false and idolatrous system of faith. And even though no visible judgments, and no penal consequence of any magnitude should befal them in this world, it is not possible that having forsaken the true God to hasten after another god—having contracted guilt so heinous and aggravated as this implies, they should escape the divine condemnation in the world to come.

On account of the sinfulness and misery of such conduct, the Psalmist determined that he should not be chargeable with it. He had too just a horror at its enormity, and too strong a sense of its enmity to his peace and safety, to allow himself to indulge in any of the forms or practices of idolatry. He was surrounded with its votaries, and many of his people had joined them; but the displeasure of heaven had been so severely manifested against them, and the threatenings of the law bore upon them so expressly and so awfully, that neither vicinity nor example could induce him to partake of its rites, or to give it any portion of his countenance. He would not unite with the heathen in offering their drink offerings of blood. Nor did he merely abstain from this most expressive proof of attachment to their false and degrading worship: he refused to do or say any thing that could be supposed indicative even of forbearance of indifference towards it. He would not so much as take the names of their gods into his lips. He would not utter their names in such a way as to intimate any thing like belief in their existence, or respect for their character; he would not speak of them in any other way than that which might distinctly declare that he denied their reality as much as he abhorred the services that were paid to them, and that, in his view, those who gave them homage were blinded in understanding, depraved in heart, and lost to all that was best, and purest, and happiest in the universe.

You may probably think, my friends, that all this is inapplicable to you; and that as you are not liable to the offence against which the Psalmist so scrupulously guarded, it can be of no use to inculcate upon you the sentiments which he entertained, and according to which he acted. But herein you are mistaken. It is very true you are in no great danger of becoming idolaters in the literal and original sense of the word. But the word has a more general sense, which is recognized in Scripture, and in which it is frequently exhibited in human character, and is the besetting sin of most men. To be guilty of idolatry, it is not necessary that you make gods to yourselves, as the heathens did—that you deify the heroes of your country—that you invest the objects of nature with the attributes of divinity—and that you build real temples, and give formal worship to these creatures of your vain imaginations. You may have knowledge and philosophy enough to preserve you from such gross absurdity; and yet you may be chargeable with the offence of which the Psalmist speaks with such just and decided abhorrence. The substance of the crime is contained in your feeling and showing a stronger attachment to some other being than to the Supreme Being; in giving to something else an influence over your mind and conduct, greater than what you allow to Him; in recognizing in the works of his hands an excellence and a claim to your deference and submission, which by your actions, if not by your words, you deny to exist in himself. This is idolatry, according to the nature of the case, and according to the declarations of Scripture.

It is of no consequence what it is to which you thus pay the homage and give the glory which are due to God alone. Still it is idolatry. That to which you are devoted, or to which you give the preference over him, may be quite innocent in itself, and a regulated and subordinate affection for it may even constitute a virtue and a duty; and yet your merely giving it the preference involves you in the guilt of idolatry. For that is to 'serve the creature more than the Creator.' It is to deprive God of his supremacy, and to put another in his place. It may be worldly honours; it may be power; it may be riches; it may be pleasure; it may be literature and science; it may be parents, or children, or friends; in all these cases, if you set your heart upon them in such a manner, or to such an extent as to exclude God from your regard, or to give him but a secondary station in it, you are characterized by idolatry, and are as liable to the divine displeasure as are the blinded heathen, who literally bow down to stocks and stones. It is said of the heathen, that though they originally 'knew God, they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, but changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things;' and that therefore he 'revealed his wrath from heaven' against those who thus 'held the truth in unrighteousness.' And think you that any better character belongs to you, or that any better fate can await you, if, knowing God, as he has made himself known in the Gospel, you do not like to retain him in your affections; if, instead of 'loving him with all your heart, and soul, and strength, and mind,' you love him less than many of your fellow-mortals; if you permit the gains, or the amusements, or the vanities of this passing world, to engross the time that should be occupied, and the efforts that should be made, in his worship and service; if, in the study and admiration of any of his works, you forget the tribute which you owe him as the all-perfect maker of the universe, and the bountiful giver of those very faculties which fit you for contemplating and for relishing its beauties; if, listening to the voice of temptation, you are seen 'going after your covetousness,' and your sinful indulgences, and your vain fancies, regardless of the commandment of him whom it is your highest honour to obey, and who by the Gospel of his Son has 'called you to glory and to virtue?' Think you, that in acting and living thus, you are not guilty of idolatry; and that your idolatry is not as heinous and aggravated as that of the heathen on whom God is said to have 'poured out his fury?'

You may not be accustomed to view the subject in this light, but if you think justly and seriously, if you take Scripture for your guide, and are to be determinded in your judgment by its principles and maxims, I do not see how you can view the subject in any other light. Your conduct is idolatrous and criminal in the eye of reason. When the benighted Gentile falls down and worships the sun in his meridian splendour, or the moon in her midnight brightness, this is not more offensive and revolting than the conduct of the professing Christian, who adores his gold in the character of a miser, or of the professing Christian, who kneels at the shrine of fashion in the character of a man of pleasure, each of them being devoted to a false divinity, and neither of them having the true 'God in all his thoughts.' And in the real spirit and import of the divine law, He who rules over all must be considered as speaking in reference to both classes of idolaters, when he says, 'Thou shall have no other gods before me.' 'Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them nor serve them; for I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God.'

Beware, then, of the guilt of idolatry, and of the vengeance which impends over those who indulge in it. See that you not only renounce it in general, but that you keep yourselves free from it, in all its particular forms; that you abstain from it, not merely in its grosser and more aggravated instances, but even in those instances in which it assumes the aspect of cordial friendship, of intellectual ambition, of universal philanthropy. Say with the Psalmist, 'Their drink offerings of blood will I not offer, nor take up their names into my lips.' Say with Ephraim, 'What have I to do any more with idols?' Say with the inhabitants of Judah, 'O Lord our God, other lords besides thee have had dominion over us; but by thee only will we make mention of thy name.' Say in the spirit and language of every real Christian, 'Lord, I am thine, for thou hast made me; thou hast preserved me; thou hast redeemed me. Occupy the throne of my heart, and reign there with unresisted and undivided sway. I confess that I have given too much of my regard to objects and pursuits, in which thou wert but little acknowledged, or not acknowledged at all. Pardon my homage to the creature; and help me by thy grace to serve it no more. Subdue me to thyself, as alone worthy of all my reverence, and all my love. Give me to feel the solemn and endearing obligations which I owe to thee, my chosen and redeeming God. And make me willing, and obedient, and devoted, in the day of thy power.'

It is in conformity to the import of the Psalmist's resolution, which we have been considering, that he goes on to say, as in the fifth verse, 'The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance and of my cup: thou maintainest my lot.' 'The Lord is the portion of our inheritance' in a future life. Having chosen him for our portion; accounting his favour the highest and richest blessing we can possibly enjoy; and having an interest in it through faith in the blood of atonement we can look forward to heaven as our best and everlasting abode. He has secured it for us; he has promised it to us; he has prepared it for our reception. And how comfortable, how encouraging, how delightful to reflect, that whatever be our condition in this world; however destitute and despised we may now be; though we should 'suffer the loss of all things' here below, there is reserved for us on high an 'inheritance which is incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away:' And that, as 'it is the Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom,' as the expression of his unmerited bounty, the gracious recompence of our labours, the appointed result of our sufferings in his service, so his immediate presence will constitute at once its happiness, its glory, and its stability, and that from such a bountiful and inexhaustible source of excellence we may confidently expect to derive every thing that can carry our nature to its highest pitch of perfection and felicity! O let us often anticipate heaven as the land towards which we are travelling; let our ambition perpetually point to it as the end 'of our high calling;' let our hopes fondly dwell on it as the final resting place from our toils and sorrows; and remembering that God, holy as well as good, is the fountain of all its blessedness, let us not only be comforted with the prospect of dwelling in it forever, but also be animated to prepare for it, by studying to conform in all things to his righteous will, by leading a life of faith on the merits of his Son, and 'by purifying ourselves even as he also is pure.'

But the Lord is not only the portion of our inheritance in a future life; he is also the portion of our cup in the 'life that now is.' If we are his true people, we have chosen him as to every thing that concerns our well-being, and he has assured us that he will be 'our guide even until death.' In all that happens to us we will recognize the operation of his combined mercy, and wisdom, and faithfulness. Whatever be our lot we will trace it to his appointment, and submit it to his management. Amidst all the vicissitudes of life, we will comfort our hearts with believing that he rules over us in the exercise of infinite perfection, that his manifold dealings with us are intended to promote our good, and that if we continue to put our trust in him, he 'will never leave nor forsake us,' till he has placed us beyond the reach of whatever can harass or distress us. He may put the cup of prosperity in our hands, and we will drink it with thanksgiving and joy; regarding it as a pledge of his rich beneficence; lifting up our souls in gratitude for his unmerited kindness; living to the praise of him who 'filleth our mouth with good things, so that our youth is renewed like the eagle's;' and feeling every past expression of his benevolence as an argument and a motive for our putting more confidence in him, and rendering more obedience to him, and holding more communion with him, in all the time of our sojourning that is yet to come. And when he presses to our lips the cup of adversity, we will drink that also, with patience and resignation; remembering that our afflictions are of his ordination or by his permission; satisfied that the heaviest of them will not be allowed to overwhelm us, but that all of them are intended or will be overruled for our permanent advantage; consoling ourselves with the belief that they are the discipline of our heavenly father, and with the hope that they will 'work out for us an exceeding weight of glory;' and praying and striving that they may purify and improve us here, and that they may issue in immortal joys hereafter. Our confidence and our rejoicing is this, that the Lord himself will maintain our lot. Whatever good we possess, whatever happiness we enjoy, it may be taken from us, if the preservation of it be left to ourselves. But, in the hands of him, to whom, as our chosen portion, we have committed our all, it is perfectly secure. Our enemies, in that case, have no power to deprive us of it, be they ever so numerous, and be they ever so strong. 'None can pluck us out of the hand of God' who is 'greater than all.' Nothing shall 'ever be able to separate us from his love which is in Christ.' He will maintain whatever he has wrought for us; and will keep us 'by his mighty power through faith unto salvation.' And if this be the consequence of having God for our portion, how blessed are we in having made such a choice, and in enjoying such a privilege! And how miserable must those be who, by making the world their portion, have no security in life, no peace at death, no hope beyond the grave! While we pity these infatuated mortals, and supplicate the God of all grace in their behalf, let us be careful to 'hold fast that which we have,' to cleave with still greater devotedness to God, to 'set him continually before us,' and to take him as our guide, our refuge, our consolation, and our 'exceeding great reward.'

'The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage.' This expresses the satisfaction which God's people have with their condition. They may not be able to say so of their temporal circumstances. They are not indifferent to the good and evil of which, as inhabitants of this world, they are called to partake. And when trouble and destitution assail them, they are not insensible to the affliction; they will not speak of it as if all were going well and prosperously with them, and as if they set no value on the bounties of Providence. They feel the ordinary calamities of life as well as others. They pray to be delivered from them. And when they obtain deliverance, and the 'candle of the Lord shines upon their head,' they acknowledge the boon with grateful and rejoicing hearts. But then here is the peculiarity of their character, and their situation; their principal concern is with their spiritual circumstances. And if these be right and prosperous, they care little about their bodily and external comfort. God being their portion, they have nothing left to fear on the one hand, or to desire on the other. Their souls being safe, and their eternal interests secure, every other care is absorbed in the delightful persuasion that no real injury can befal them, in the blessed experience of 'the peace which passeth understanding,' in the animating hope that is full of immortality. They envy not the man of the world his sensual gratifications and carnal mirth. They are abundantly satisfied with the communications of God's love to them, by which their every want is supplied, and by which they are filled with the 'joy that no man taketh from them.' When a temporal benefit comes to them, they receive it, and thank the bountiful giver for this additional token of that grace which has provided so richly for their eternal salvation. And when they are visited with hardships and sufferings, they endure the visitation with patience, well knowing that it comes to them on an errand of mercy; that it is no less a token of their father's love than the other, and that they have great cause to rejoice even in this their tribulation. Reconciled to God, 'walking in the light of his countenance,' enjoying the consolations of his Spirit, and cheered with the hope of his glory, surely they may say without reserve, in the very midst of deep and dark adversity, that 'the lines are fallen unto them in pleasant places, and that they have a goodly heritage.' In this view it may be justly said of believers, that 'all things are theirs, whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are theirs; and they are Christ's, and Christ is God's.'

Now, my friends, if such be our spiritual state, great cause have we 'to bless the Lord who hath given us counsel.' Not only has he brought us into 'the valley of vision,' but he has enabled us to see with a believing eye the redemption which it unfolds. Not only has he conferred upon us those external privileges which we enjoy by the Gospel dispensation, but he has taught us to improve them, and by his blessing has rendered them effectual for our good. Not only has he made the lines fall to us in pleasant places, and given us a goodly heritage, but he has counselled us to value them aright, to set up our everlasting rest in them, and to seek from them our best comforts and our brightest happiness. Had we been left to ourselves, his kindness would have been lavished on us in vain; and we should have been like many others who, though born in a land of saving light, prefer walking in the darkness of infidelity and sin. But, taught by his Spirit we have had our understandings enlightened to see the realities of the Gospel, and our hearts moved to seek after an interest in the Saviour, and 'our feet guided into the way of peace' and safety. And this being the case, surely we cannot fail to give thanks to him 'by whose grace it is that we are what we are;' to cherish towards him the warmest gratitude of which our souls are susceptible, and to 'praise him even while we have a being.'

And having been influenced and enabled by him to 'choose the good part which cannot be taken from us,' we must be careful to make a right use of the privilege. 'Our reins must instruct us in the night seasons.' We must meditate on what we have done; and in our times of retirement and solitude, 'commune with our own hearts' on the subject, that thus we may be more fully instructed in what we have received, and in what we owe to our merciful God; that we may be encouraged to persevere in the choice which we have so wisely and happily made; that we may be more thoroughly comforted by it amidst the trials and distresses to which we are subjected; that we may be furnished with more animating motives to thanksgiving and praise; that we may learn how needful we are of the continuance of that divine interposition which 'began the good work in us;' and that we may be stimulated to greater diligence in the duties of our holy vocation, and to greater earnestness in our applications for the wisdom and the strength which are necessary to our abiding in the love of God, and to our being finally conducted into his heavenly presence.

LECTURE VI.

'I have set the Lord always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved. Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth; my flesh also shall rest in hope: For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. Thou wilt show me the path of life: in thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.'—PSALM xvi. 8—END.

In the preceding part of this Psalm, we have considered David as speaking solely in his own person, in reference to his own feelings, his own comfort, and his own conduct. We are aware, indeed, that by many it is regarded as applicable to the Messiah; but of this we see no satisfactory proof, and we are always unwilling, when interpreting Scripture, to indulge unnecessarily in conjecture, or to give a construction to the language of the sacred writers which is merely suggested by a particular theory, and which is adopted not so much to express and illustrate the real meaning of the passage, as to render it more evangelical and more interesting than it would otherwise be. Some have treated the whole book of Psalms as in every the minutest part, more or less prophetical or descriptive of the Saviour; whereas it must be evident to every intelligent reader of them, that they often speak of circumstances, and experience, and character, which cannot be attached to the Saviour without violating the soundest and most important of those principles on which we are accustomed to ascertain the import of revelation, and introducing a mode of determining the mind of the Spirit, which would put every thing at the mercy of an ill regulated piety, or of a lively imagination. The question is not—may this, by a little exercise of fancy, and a little accommodation of fact, and a little straining of phraseology, be made to intimate something concerning Christ? The question is—does this truly speak of Christ, and are we justified in taking that view of it, by the context, or by strict analogy, or by express warrant, or by any other legitimate and safe mode of judging in such cases?

Now, my friends, it is in deference to the rules and maxims implied in this statement that, when expounding the previous portion of this Psalm, we considered it as spoken by David in reference to himself; and it is in deference to the same rules and maxims that we are to consider the remainder of the Psalm as spoken by him in reference to the Messiah, of whom he was both a prophet and a type. Not only may all the passage that we have just read be applied to Christ without constraint; and not only is there some of it which is applicable to him alone; but we have New Testament authority for making such an application. The Apostle Peter, in his first discourse after the effusion of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, expressly quoted these verses as uttered by David, in exclusive reference to the Redeemer; and, therefore, in explaining and illustrating them, we are not only entitled, but bound to keep the Redeemer in our eye as the person from whom they primarily proceed, and towards whom they direct our attention.

Peter, you know, quoted them when addressing the Jews on the subject of Christ's resurrection, asserting its reality, and showing them that it was predicted by the Psalmist. But though that be the main topic which he employed them for pressing on the notice and belief of his audience, they offer along with this some other topics to our consideration, from all which, as connected with him, we may derive many appropriate and salutary instructions. Let us meditate on them for a little; and may the Lord direct and bless our meditations!

I. In the first place, this passage reminds us of the sufferings of Christ.

It is clear that the types, the promises, and the predictions of Christ which we meet with in the Old Testament describe him as a suffering Saviour. We often read of him, indeed, as one who was to be great and triumphant; and the language in which his greatness and his triumphs are depicted, is so frequent, so energetic, and so splendid, that the Jews in general thought of him, and expected him in that and in no other character. But it is impossible to peruse the accounts and to look at the representations of him which are set before us in the records and the ceremonies of the ancient dispensation, without perceiving that the Saviour whom they pointed out was to appear in a state of abasement; to be 'bruised and put to grief,' and to have a 'sorrow like unto no other sorrow.' In the book of Psalms we have various affecting delineations of what he was to endure at the hands both of God and man. Of this the twenty-second Psalm furnishes a remarkable and striking instance. And even in the passage now before us, the same truth is to be found—not indeed in plain and direct statement—but in obvious and necessary inference. When Christ says here by the mouth of David that 'he would not be moved,' and that 'his soul would not be left in hell,' his assertions, of course, presuppose that he was to be exposed to such trials and distresses as might endanger his stability, and that he was to die and descend into the grave; and when he commits himself so emphatically to divine interposition for support under the former, and for deliverance from the latter of these evils, he distinctly intimates that they were of no ordinary magnitude and extent. And the view of him which is thus given through the medium of prophecy, is completely realised in his actual history. According to that history, he was from his cradle to his grave, 'a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.' He was harassed by the malignity of men; he was assailed by the malice of devils; he was bereft of the countenance of his heavenly Father. He was deserted by friends and persecuted by foes. He was so poor that he 'had not where to lay his head.' He was so despised that the mighty and the mean equally 'hid their faces from him.' He was so forlorn that when 'he came to his own, his own would not receive him.' His body was tortured; his soul was wrung with anguish; ignominy darkened his departing hour; and while he expired amidst the shame and the agony of a cross, he expired under the curse of holy and incensed omnipotence.

It is painful, my friends, to contemplate this; to see true greatness humiliated so low, and warmest charity so ungratefully requited, and immaculate innocence plunged into such a depth of affliction. Yet we are not permitted to withdraw or turn away our minds from the contemplation, sad and heart-rending as it is. As we travel through the word of truth, the sufferings of Christ are presented to our observation at every step; they are set before us in all their variety and in all their aggravations; they are mixed up with the most elevated and cheering views that are afforded of his exaltation and his glory. When, amidst our meditations on his essential dignity and blessedness, we might be apt to forget how low he stooped and how much he bore, a glimpse of them is let in upon us as exhibited in the stable in Bethlehem, the garden of Gethsemane, or the hill of Calvary. The Evangelists and the Apostles dwell upon them as the most striking features of their narrative, and as the most indispensable theme of their preaching. And it is to them that the attention of his people is specially called, and by them that their devotion is to be principally kindled, in that ordinance which is appointed to be a commemoration of him even to the end of the world. In this ordinance he does not require you to remember him as one whose birth was announced by a multitude of angels; in whom were 'hid all the treasures of knowledge and of wisdom;' whose word was implicitly obeyed by the elements of nature, and the spirits of darkness; who rescued the victims that death was spoiling in the tomb; who was acknowledged by 'a voice from the excellent glory;' and at last ascended on the clouds to heaven. He does not require you to remember him at his table as distinguished by these attributes of his character, and these glories of his condition. No; he requires you to remember him as one who suffered and died. 'Eat of this bread, which is a memorial of my broken body; drink of this wine, which is a memorial of my shed blood: do THIS in remembrance of me: thus show MY DEATH till I come.'

And well may such an emphasis be laid on the sufferings and death of Christ; for this was the instituted method of redemption. He suffered and died that he might 'take away our sins;' that he might 'make reconciliation for iniquities;' that he might 'bring in an everlasting righteousness.' Such was the appointment of God; and unless that appointment had taken effect, in Christ 'humbling himself and becoming subject to the suffering of death,' as an atoning sacrifice, vain and unavailing with respect to us would have been all the other achievements of his mediatorial enterprise. All his miracles, all his teaching, all his benevolence, all his example, all his manifestations of divine excellence and divine perfection, would have been utterly lost upon us. The justice of God being still unsatisfied, and our guilt being still unexpiated, we must have continued under the sentence of condemnation, and under the burden of that sentence we must have inevitably and everlastingly perished. But while the sufferings and death of Christ deserve that prominence which is given to them in the Gospel record, on account of their necessity to the Gospel scheme, their title to it is rendered complete by the efficacy which attends them for answering their destined purpose. He 'has seen of the travail of his soul and he is satisfied.' His obedience unto death has fulfilled all the demands of that infinitely holy law which we had transgressed. He has 'made peace by the blood of his cross.' The perfections of the divine character are vindicated, and the authority of the divine administration is maintained; and no barrier, therefore, now remains to hinder the divine mercy from pouring itself out on the chief of sinners. In consequence of what Christ endured when he gave himself as a 'propitiation for our sins,' God is at once 'just, and the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus.' And he now proclaims from his throne of grace, that 'whosoever thus believeth shall never perish, but shall have everlasting life.'

As then the sufferings and death of Christ are held out to us in Scripture as of such essential importance and such saving virtue, let them be the object of our devout and paramount regard. Let us recognize in them the means which God has instituted for our deliverance from sin and misery. Let us place our confidence in their merit for the attainment of salvation and all its blessings. And when we go to the Lord's Table, where they are brought to our recollection by solemn and significant emblems, let our faith be directed towards them with peculiar liveliness and power, and let them be rested on by us as the foundation of all our hope, and applied to as the source of all our joy.

II. In the second place, the passage under review, affirms the constancy and the cheerfulness with which Christ was to bear his sorrows and to become obedient to the death of the cross. 'I shall not be moved;' and 'my heart is glad, and my glory,' that is, my tongue, 'rejoiceth.'

So said David personating the Messiah; and all this was realised in the Messiah's actual deportment. In order to secure our belief and dependance on his mediatorial work, it is perhaps enough for us to know that he finished it; that he did not stop short in the midst of it, but that he brought it to a successful termination; that he was rewarded for its accomplishment; and that it is meritorious to procure for all who trust in it for forgiveness, and acceptance, and eternal life. But that we may cherish those sentiments towards Christ which it becomes us to entertain, we must take a nearer view of that temper with which he bore the heavy load of suffering which was laid on him for the purpose of working out our redemption. He foresaw every pang that it was requisite for him to endure in order to save sinners, and yet he scrupled not to undertake the arduous task, and engaged in it with alacrity and zeal. As he proceeded to execute its duties, he met with numerous difficulties, and dangers, and distresses: but he shrunk from none of them; he encountered them all with undaunted firmness; he rose superior to them in every aspect that they assumed, and in every combination in which they assailed him. He never retreated from one scene of trial on which he was called to enter. He never was heard to utter a complaint under the multiplied privations which continually harassed him. 'He stedfastly set his face to go up to Jerusalen,' where he knew that nothing awaited him but injustice, and cruelty, and death. He rebuked his disciples when they thought it foul scorn that he should submit to the wrongs which he calmly foretold. He exposed himself to the traitor's artifices, when he might have defeated them and escaped. He was in such agony that it extorted from him prayers for deliverance, yet with the same breath he declared his entire acquiescence in all the sorrows to which he was doomed by the decree of heaven. He allowed his enemies to carry him away to judgment, and to procure his condemnation, and to cover him with reproach, and to suspend him on the accursed tree, though with one frown he could have sunk them all in the gulf of perdition. He might have come down from the cross, as the multitude impiously challenged him to do, and erected on their ruin that cause which they were attempting to destroy, yet he patiently endured its anguish, magnanimously despised its shame, and struggled on through all its mysterious and unspeakable terrors, till he could say in the accents of victory, 'It is finished.' Nor was it mere constancy that he exercised in those dark and trying circumstances through which he passed. It was moreover with feelings of pleasure and exultation that he travelled along the path of sorrow, and 'trode the wine press' of the Father's wrath. He was not only contented, but he rejoiced to suffer as a surety for guilty men. His humiliation, and all the hardships and miseries which it implied, were the appointments of God's will. He was well aware that every arrow of affliction which pierced him, from the beginning to the conclusion of his mediatorial labours upon earth, got its direction, and its power, and its bitterness from the hand of his heavenly Father: and yet all along, even when they drunk deepest into his soul, he looked up and said, 'To do thy will, I take delight, O my God!'

Such was the constancy and such was the cheerfulness with which our blessed Saviour bore his sufferings. And surely we cannot but admire the character in which this excellence was so conspicuously displayed. And if our regards should be proportioned to the extent and energy of the virtues which excite them, what must be our admiration of the character of Christ, when we think of the number, and poignancy, and duration of his sorrows, and remember that he persevered under their pressure with a constancy which never wavered for a moment, and with a cheerfulness which found its happiest exercise in the season of his deepest adversity!

But to our admiration of his unequalled magnanimity, we must add the more valuable tribute of our gratitude: for it was in love to our souls that his engagement to suffer and to die had its origin; and it was by that love to our souls that he was animated to fulfil his generous engagement, with the unbending fortitude and the unaffected gladness which he exhibited throughout the whole course of his endurance. And if we ought to love him because he has so loved us, O how deep-seated should our affection be! How ardently should it burn towards him by whose compassion it has been kindled! And how resolutely and stedfastly should it be expressed in spite of all the sacrifices which it may cost us, and of all the troubles and trials in which it may involve us!

And while we admire the character of Christ, and cherish gratitude and love to him on account of the constancy and cheerfulness with which he 'bore our griefs and carried our sorrows,' let him be in this respect the object of our close and habitual imitation. As his disciples we have much evil to meet with before we 'enter into rest;' bodily pain, worldly disappointments, mental distress, spritual trials, a thousand things to harass and afflict us in our journey through this vale of tears. Now let us be like our divine Master, and let 'none of these things move us.' Let us 'bear our cross' with patience. Let us be more than patient: let our 'heart be glad and our tongue rejoice' in tribulation. Let us 'take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in persecutions, in distresses' with which we may be visited for our attachment to his Gospel, or our activity in the cause of Christian benevolence. And let us look well to 'Jesus the author and the finisher of our faith,' as he is held out to us in the Holy Scriptures, giving himself to a degree of suffering and to a kind of death, infinitely more awful than what we can ever be called to endure, that we may catch some portion of that lofty spirit which his severest woes were unable to subdue, and that we may go back into the world, better prepared to sustain the burdens of life, and to triumph over the fears and the agonies of death.

III. Let us now consider in the third and last place, what it was, according to the language of the Psalmist, that supported and cheered our Saviour in the midst of his sufferings.

And, first, he tells us that he 'set the Lord always before him.' He set the Lord always before him as the great object of his regard; to whom his utmost devotedness was due, and in whose dispensations it was at once his honour, his duty, and his happiness to acquiesce. To his will he in every thing submissively bowed. To his character he paid the unlimited homage which perfect and uncreated excellence deserved. To his glory he felt that every affection of the heart, and every action of the life should be uniformly subservient. And thus setting the Lord before him, he was prevented from yielding to those claims of self love which might otherwise have proved too powerful for him to resist. He could not have declined his sufferings at first, or prematurely ceased to bear them, without opposing the divine will, which he had with authority as well as in wisdom appointed them; without affronting the divine character whose brightest attributes they were intended to display; and without obstructing the divine glory, which was to be manifested equally in their fitness and their effects. And the boundless piety of Christ, being not only hostile to all such regardlessness of what was due to God, but ambitious of every thing by which he could be honoured or in which he could be obeyed, made him at once patient and delighted to bear the whole weight of affliction that was laid upon him, for accomplishing God's purposes of mercy to our fallen race.

Now let us also 'set the Lord always before us.' When we are visited with affliction of whatever kind, and in whatever degree, let us remember that it 'does not spring out of the ground,' and that it must not be considered and treated as an evil which has no connection with what is good in its origin or in its issue. We should recollect that it proceeds, either directly or indirectly, from the hand of that great Being who manages all our lot; that it indicates the wisdom, the mercy, and the faithfulness of his dealings with us, and that if it be allowed to 'have its perfect work,' it will in its final results reflect honour on his administration, and redound to the advantage and happiness of our souls. And recollecting these things, let us submit, without murmuring, to all the hardships of our condition, and even 'count it all joy when we fall into divers trials, and tribulations.

In the next place, our Saviour tells us that he was supported and cheered in the midst of his sufferings, by the assurance that God was 'at his right hand.' He was not in a forlorn and helpless state—unprotected against the assaults of his foes—unsustained under the weight of his calamities—abandoned to the feebleness of human wisdom and human strength, and left to resources as uncertain as they were inadequate in 'the time of his need.' Had this been the case, and had he known it, his heart would have sunk into despondency, the work of redemption would have failed in his hands, and we should have had no suffering obedience—no atoning death, on which to rely for acceptance. But far different was his situation.

Omnipotence befriended him. The arm of Jehovah was stretched out for his stay and his deliverance. His enemies might be numerous and strong, but there was one to help him mightier than them all. His perplexities might be great, but they were nothing to the scan of unerring wisdom. His anguish might be bitter and severe, but his bitterest and severest anguish must have given way to the consolations of divinity. His trials might be round about him, and within him, and press close and hard upon his inmost soul; but there was nearer to him still than these could be, that God who has the universe at his command, and is pledged to preserve his chosen from all that would injure and overwhelm them. All this the Saviour knew. He knew that Deity was thus present with him, and thus engaged in his behalf. He confided in the great truth as one which would be realized in every exigency of his case. And fully convinced that he had only to trust and pray, in order to experience, in richest abundance, the aid that would uphold him, and the comfort that would cheer him, and the interposition that would deliver him in all his times of danger and of need, he 'feared no evil' that could possibly befal him, at any stage of his perilous undertaking. His dangers might be imminent, and his prospects dark, and his sorrows multiplied and great, but he cast himself on the protection of the Almighty, whose servant he was, and whose work he was doing; and he rejoiced in the sense of present safety, and in the hope of ultimate triumph.

Such was our Saviour's 'strong hold in the day of trouble;' let it also be ours. If we be followers of him, God is at our right hand, as he was at his, and we may warrantably exercise the same reliance, and take to ourselves the same encouragement which sustained and animated him along the path of suffering. God is always beside us to observe our circumstances, to listen to our petitions, to guide us through our difficulties, to soothe us in our distresses, to rescue us out of the hand of our adversaries, and to keep us from falling away in the hour of temptation 'from our own stedfastness.' Is not he possessed of every attribute to which we would appeal for comfort and for preservation? Has he not promised to put forth these attributes in our behalf as often as our situation requires their exercise? Does not the infinite perfection of his nature insure the fulfilment of that gracious promise in all its extent? And does not the experience of our Redeemer, who showed what we might expect, as well as exemplified what we ought to do, afford us a practical and satisfactory demonstration of the faithfulness with which our heavenly Father will communicate to us all that he has taught us to pray and hope for in the course of our pilgrimage? Let us then confide in him without hesitation or reserve. Let us bear upon our minds continually the lively persuasion that wherever we are, and whatever we suffer, he is present with us in the character of our guide, our comforter, and our protector. Let us ask, according to our necessities, that we may receive what he is both able and willing to bestow for their relief. Let us lean upon him in the exercise of a faith which looks perpetually to his word, and doubts as little of its veracity as of its kindness. And when the multitude or the severity of our trials would lead us to despond, let us think of the conduct and the consolations of Christ, and remonstrate with ourselves for not cherishing the confidence by which he was held up, and say 'Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance and my God.'

Lastly, our Saviour informs us that he was supported and cheered by the hope of a resurrection to life and blessedness. 'My flesh also shall rest in hope. For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. Thou wilt show me the path of life: in thy presence is fulness of joy, at thy right hand are pleasures for evermore.'

This was to be the determination and issue of Christ's sufferings. They were, indeed, to 'bring him to death,' and that death was to be characterised by all that was frightful and distressing. But he 'had hope in his death.' He knew that the dominion of the king of terrors was to be destroyed, and that he was, by returning from the grave, to 'become the first fruits of them that sleep.' God would 'not leave his soul in hell,' that is, would not allow his human spirit to remain in the state of the dead, and would not permit his body, which was as free from moral pollution as his soul, and equally sanctified with it for the work of redemption, to undergo in any measure that process of dissolution which must pass upon all the sinful posterity of Adam. Instead of suffering him to continue in the grave, he would 'show him the path of life;' he would make the darksome valley a way along which he would conduct him to immortality; and, 'raising him from the dead, would give him glory,'—would receive him into his heavenly presence as a triumphant Redeemer, and exalt him to his right hand, that in the fulness of everlasting bliss he might reap the reward of his meritorious sufferings, and his victorious decease. Christ had this prospect continually in his view. He was well aware that he should speedily 'rest from his labours' and sorrows, and that 'his rest would be glorious.' It was 'for the joy set before him that he endured the cross and despised the shame.' And knowing that when he committed his spirit into the hands of his heavenly Father, who would keep what he had thus committed to him, and that his body would come forth from the tomb unhurt by the power of corruption, and that thus raised again and 'justified in the spirit' by his resurrection, he would be 'straightway glorified with the glory which he had with the Father before the world was;' anticipating such a splendid and felicitous result as this, he was resigned in suffering, and he was brave in death, beyond all that the generations of men have ever witnessed, or will ever be able to exhibit.

But though we can never equal the fortitude with which our Saviour suffered and died, we may humbly imitate him in this as in other departments of his exalted character. And, indeed, it is our duty to study this resemblance to him, and to strive after it, under the influence of the same motives by which he was actuated. These motives, it is true, we have not in that high style and commanding power in which they presented themselves to his mind. Still, however, they form a part of our Christian privileges, and it becomes us to fix our regards upon them, and to surrender ourselves freely to all the effects which they are calculated to produce on our sentiments and conduct. If we are united to Christ by faith, and if we are studying to 'be holy as he who hath called us is holy;' then we shall be partakers of Christ's resurrection, of Christ's joy, of Christ's glory. Our bodies, indeed, must moulder into their kindred earth, and a long period may elapse before they are recalled from their dreary abode. But the doctrine is true and stable, that as Christ has risen we shall rise also—that there is 'life and immortality' for us beyond the grave—that there awaits us, in celestial companionship with him who 'is the resurrection and the life,' a 'fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore.' And with this scene of restoration and of happiness before us, why should we grudge to suffer, and why should we be afraid to die? Our sufferings may be severe and protracted, but we suffer along with Christ, and suffering patiently along with him, we shall also reign with him in heaven; and as his sufferings merited the recompense which he received in his resurrection from the dead, and his exaltation to 'the right hand of the majesty on high,' so our sufferings shall be so sanctified as to qualify us for being 'children of the resurrection,' and 'heirs of the kingdom' which he has secured for all his faithful followers. Death may come upon us unexpectedly, and may come in his most forbidding form; and the terrors of his coming may be more awful and agonising than our fearful imaginations had ever conceived; but Christ also died, and 'by his death overcame death,' spoiled him of his destroying power, and is pledged to make every believer a sharer in his dear bought victory, and in his well-earned triumph. And 'living to the Lord, and dying in the Lord,' the grave, dark and noisome as it is, is consecrated as a resting place to our mortal bodies 'till the times of restitution,' when he who 'lives for evermore, and has the keys of hell and death,' shall awaken us from our refreshing slumbers, and clothe us in the robe of undecaying beauty, and conduct us into that region of unclouded light, and spotless purity, and unmingled bliss, where we shall dwell and be happy for ever. And, destined to such an award as this, let us not be cast down by any calamities that can happen to us, or be immoderately alarmed by any dangers that can threaten us, either during the time of our sojourning in this evil world, or at the period of our departure from it. Let us cherish habitually the hope of that eternal life which God hath promised to us, and which he will assuredly bestow upon us. Let us believe stedfastly, and act holily, as it becomes those who have such a 'high calling' and such a glorious destination. Let our faith and our hope derive new energy from the contemplation of Christ's death, by which he at once purchased our title to immortality, and ratified the charter in which it is made over to us. And then let us go on our Christian way rejoicing, trusting in the Lord Jehovah, and looking forward to 'the glory that is to be revealed.' Thus, we shall be 'filled with comfort and exceeding joyful in all our tribulation;' and when the hour of our departure comes, we shall take up the language of triumph and say, 'O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?' 'Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.'

LECTURE VII.

'Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile. When I kept silence, my bones waxed old, through my roaring all the day long: For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me; my moisture is turned into the drought of summer. I acknowledge my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee in a time when thou mayest be found: surely in the floods of great waters they shall not come nigh unto him. Thou art my hiding-place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance.—PSALM XXXIII. 1—7.

PART I.

The passage that we have now read presents to our notice, some important and interesting particulars. There is first, the uncomfortable state of a convinced but still impenitent sinner. Secondly, there is the pardon of sin. Thirdly, there is the connection between the pardon of sin and the grace of repentance. Fourthly, there is the happiness of such as have repented and obtained pardon. Fifthly, there is the disposition of those who are penitent and pardoned, to engage in the exercise of prayer. And, lastly, there is the security of God's people in the midst of danger and distress.

I. First, we have here represented to us the uncomfortable state of those who are convinced of sin but still impenitent. 'When I kept silence, my bones waxed old; through my roaring all the day long. For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me: my moisture is turned into the drought of summer.

This was the sad experience of the Psalmist himself. He had transgressed God's law. This he both knew and felt; and it brought along with it the pangs of remorse. His mind was conscious of having offended the divine majesty—of having incurred the divine displeasure—of having done what rendered him liable to the punishment threatened in the divine law. But he did not seek for deliverance from the burden of guilt by the confession of a contrite heart, and by application to the mercy of heaven. In both these respects he 'kept silence.' And the consequence was, that his convictions of the commission, and of the evil, and of the danger of sin, continued to harass him as before. He could find no peace. Wherever he was, and with whatever he was occupied, 'the hand of God was heavy upon him.' And this compunction of soul, haunting him continually, disturbing his midnight repose, accompanying him through the active employments of the day, and incessantly troubling him with anxiety and alarm, so affected him, that the vigour and freshness of youth were exchanged for the debility and exhaustion of age, and his 'moisture was turned into the drought of summer.'

Thus was it with the Psalmist; and thus in some measure will it be with all who attempt to stifle and overpower the convictions of sin. They may not be sensible of their guilt as he was; they may not feel it so acutely; they may not be so much alive to its impression; and they may not suffer from it the same degree of annoyance and misery. But still, if they be really convinced that sin attaches to them, and if they see in it a forfeiture of God's favour, and if they read in it the sentence of God's wrath, how can it be that they should escape from the anguish of a 'wounded spirit,' and not be 'filled with the terrors of the Lord!'

When I say this, I doubt not that I speak in accordance with what has been actually experienced by some of you now hearing me; and, perhaps you are still in the situation which the Psalmist has so pathetically described as his own. The iniquity that you have done presses hard upon your conscience. In that iniquity you recognise what has exposed you to the indignation of the Almighty; and the apprehension of his wrath, justly deserved and awfully threatened, is a perpetual source of inquietude and sorrow. You try to forget it in the cares of business, or to charm it away by pleasurable indulgence, or to drive it off by an effort of the will, or to reason it down by the sophistries of a carnal mind. But the endeavour is fruitless. The arrow sticks fast within you; the wound festers in your very vitals; and your attempts to heal it, only serve to render it deeper, and severer, and more painful than ever. It is a mercy that conscience is still awake—that it does not cease to remind you of your wickedness—that it is not yet seared into torpid and fatal insensibility. You have reason to bless God that his voice thus speaks to you—that his spirit thus strives with you—that he does not permit you to enjoy any inward peace, or to find rest to the sole of your foot, so long as there is within you an impenitent heart, and an unforgiven soul—that he unwearyedly pursues you with his admonitions and his warnings, all destructive as they are of your present comfort, till you have abandoned the unhappy struggle which you are maintaining with your convictions, and sought for relief to your troubled mind, where alone that relief can ever be found. And the more effectually to persuade you to make no hesitation, and to lose no time in betaking yourselves to this refuge, consider, we beseech you, that the wretchedness which haunts you as transgressors, in society and in solitude, amidst care and amidst amusement, while it intimates God's willingness that you should flee from sin, both as to its power and its punishment, is but the presage of that unmingled and everlasting wretchedness which awaits you in another world, if you will not listen to him in this the time of your merciful visitation; and that to persist in keeping silence, while conscience is constraining you every hour and every moment to cry for forgiveness, and to pour forth your penitential acknowledgments at the throne of grace, and to apply to the divine compassion for that rest from your sins which the divine compassion is so ready to bestow, is to aggravate a thousand fold all the perils and miseries of your condition, and by lulling into apathy that internal monitor, which now pleads with you so urgently to flee equally from your present anguish, and from the 'wrath to come,' is to secure for yourselves an undisturbed continuance in the path of guilt, and an uninterrupted passage to the habitations of darkness and despair.

And why should you so perversely remain in the state of suffering to which conscious unworthiness has reduced you? You know that deliverance from the evils by which you are distressed is not to be obtained by the means to which you have hitherto had recourse. You know that nothing can remove them but the assurance of a full and free forgiveness from him whom you have disobeyed, and whose anger you have incurred. And you know, not only that he is willing to grant this forgiveness, but that he has devised and executed a plan, the whole purpose of which is to accomplish the salvation of sinners, and to speak 'peace to them that are afar off.' Look at this blessing as it is represented to you in the Scriptures, that you may be satisfied of its sufficiency to constitute your safety, and to quiet all your alarms.

II. The Psalmist speaks of it in three ways, 'Transgression is forgiven,' 'sin is covered,' 'the Lord imputeth not iniquity.'

The sinner has his transgression forgiven. Having broken God's law, he has become liable to the punishment which the law has denounced, and unless some adequate interposition takes place, this awful punishment must be borne by him beyond the possibility of escape. But when he to whom the prerogative of forgiving the sinner belongs is pleased to exercise that prerogative in his favour, and to pronounce the decree of forgiveness, the punishment is wholly remitted, his obligation to suffer it is cancelled, and no power can again bring him into the condemnation out of which he has thus been authoritatively and judicially released.

More than this, his sin is said to be covered. The substantial meaning of this expression is the same as that of the preceding one. It conveys the idea of forgiveness. But along with that it associates another idea which tends to give it additional force as to its effect on the feelings and comfort of the sinner. His sin is not, and cannot be concealed from the eye, nor obliterated from the remembrance of Him who is as omniscient as he is holy. But having been forgiven, its consequences are as effectually and completely done away with, and his condition as free from obnoxiousness to these, as if it had been literally hidden from the observation of the Almighty, or beyond the reach of his knowledge. Could we suppose him not to have seen it or not to have been acquainted with it, no anger could of course have been kindled in him, and no penalty inflicted by him on account of it. And not in one degree more thoroughly secure would the sinner have been in that case from 'the curse of the law,' than he is, now that, though a transgressor in the sight of God, and condemned by him for his transgression, the sentence is recalled, and he who passed it says to him, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee.'

And there is still another statement of more liberal import, and more emphatic phrase. It is affirmed, that the Lord imputeth not iniquity. When God justifies the sinner, he does not impute his iniquity to him—does not place it to his account, and punish it in his person,—but regards his as if he had not transgressed,—treats him as one of unblameable righteousness,—bestows upon him those blessings which can only be bestowed in consideration of the divine law being satisfied, both in its penal demands and in its active requirements. And why? Because God has laid upon Christ all the demerit of the sinner,—because that demerit has been expiated by the sufferings of the surety,—and because, in its place, and by the same surety, there has been substituted an obedience, not only perfect in itself, but equally authorized and accepted by him whose indignation the sinner had incurred. The guilt of the sinner is imputed to Christ, who accordingly was 'made a curse for him,' and 'suffered the just for the unjust:' and the righteousness of Christ is imputed to the sinner, who accordingly obtains that deliverance from punishment, and that restoration to favour, which God, in the exercise at once of his holiness and his mercy, confers as the reward of righteousness so perfect and so meritorious. This is the Gospel method of salvation as unfolded throughout the sacred writings, and as referred to by the Psalmist in the passage before us,—of which the Apostle Paul has given an explanation in the fourth chapter of his Epistle to the Romans, where he quotes the very language of David, in order to illustrate his doctrine of justification by grace, through faith in the imputed righteousness of Christ.

III. Now the blessing of pardon as thus secured and thus understood, is said to confer happiness upon those who receive it. 'Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity.'

Those only who have experienced this blessedness, can rightly comprehend its nature, and appreciate its extent. But even for such as have not had that actual experience, it cannot be difficult to conceive that it is indisputably real and incalculably great. Supposing, in the first place, that the sinner, when he is pardoned, were wholly ignorant of the change that has been effected in his spiritual condition, still he must, beyond all controversy, and beyond all calculation, be pronounced happy: for though not aware of it, he is in fact freed from the condemnation, which, had he remained under it, would have insured his endurance of everlasting misery, and he is in fact brought into a state of reconciliation, which must ultimately insure his enjoyment of everlasting felicity. And whatever be the period of his continuance upon earth, and whatever be the anguish which the consciousness of guilt, and the dread of God's vengeance may inflict upon him, the time cannot be far distant when this season of distressing ignorance shall come to an end, and when, in the awards of the judgment day, he shall know, and see, and feel, that 'the anger of God had been turned away' from him, and that he had been invested with a new title to the kingdom of his father.

Such, however, is the constitution of divine grace that the blessedness of the pardoned sinner is not merely in reversion and in prospect: it is in a certain measure granted to him even now. It not only exists as an attribute of his condition; but it is present with him as a benefit which he is conscious of possessing, and which affords him heartfelt consolation. Whenever the Redeemer's righteousness is imputed to him for his justification, there is simultaneously wrought in him that faith by which he receives and appropriates the imputed righteousness of the Redeemer, and which imparts to him an immediate sense of safety similar to what he would have had if, in the midst of some temporal danger, he had taken a firm and decided grasp of one who was both able and willing to accomplish his deliverance. He also believes the testimony of the word of truth, which says, that whosoever has such a faith is justified in the sight of God; and the conclusion which he is inevitably led to draw from this, must more or less satisfy him, that to him 'there is no condemnation,' and that his escape from it is as certain as the Divine promise is unequivocal and true. And the grace which justifies him, and the faith through which the justification becomes his, operate such a change on his views, and principles, and temper, that there is borne in upon him the humble hope, or the assured confidence of his being the object of God's pardoning mercy. And, with such an impression as this prevailing or reigning in his mind, can it be doubted or denied that he is blessed? Is it a blessed thing for the rebellious subject to obtain the forgiveness of his sovereign, and to be restored to all the immunities and privileges which he had forfeited by his criminal revolt? Is it a blessed thing for the undutiful child to have his ingratitude and disobedience pardoned, to be re-instated in the affection of his offended parent, and re-invested with a title to the inheritance of which paternal displeasure had deprived him? Is it a blessed thing for us to be thus treated by those who are creatures like ourselves, and limited in their power of conferring good and of inflicting evil, and whose favour and whose frown shall shortly terminate in the grave, where they and we must lie down together? And can it be any thing but blessedness—must it not be blessedness inexpressibly and beyond comparison great, to be rescued from the vengeance, and to be recalled to the friendship, of that mighty Sovereign, that everlasting Father, whose vengeance and whose friendship can not only blast or nourish our every earthly comfort, but, what is of infinitely more importance, affect our eternal destinies, and either exalt us to the highest heaven, or sink us down to the lowest hell?

O how sadly do you who are the votaries of a sinful world mistake your interest and your happiness! You give yourselves up to sensual indulgence, or you accumulate sordid wealth, or you run from one amusement and one gaiety to another, or you engage in the busy and useful occupations of life, or your pursuits are directed to the objects of a nobler ambition, and all your activities are employed in the field of intellectual research: You do all this, and in the midst of it all, you think yourselves happy; you say that you are happy; you cannot see that any thing more is necessary to make you happy; you wonder that we can ever doubt of your being happy. And yet we must affirm that you labour under a grievous delusion, and that in truth you are not happy. We are aware that happiness is in one sense a matter of feeling; and that we should in vain attempt to persuade you that you are destitute of pleasurable emotions while you are conscious of having them. But still we must say, that you are not happy.

You are not happy in comparison. Giving to your peculiar enjoyments all the value, and variety, and sweetness that you can justly claim for them, still you would not think of putting them upon a level with the enjoyments of those who believe and feel that he who is the great fountain of life and happiness has ceased to be angry with them, and that while he has taken away all their iniquities and all the displeasure that was due on account of them, he loves them at the same time so freely and so fully as to make them heirs of his 'heavenly kingdom.' Even in speculation you must allow this to be the case; otherwise you must allege that there are no degrees of happiness, and that the animal which is merely sentient is as happy as the angels that dwell on high and 'excel in strength.' And if from speculation you come to experience, the argument is all against you: for though you may still adhere to your position that you are happy because you think so, it must be remembered that you are practically acquainted with nothing more than those gratifications, which are connected with present and visible and created things, that you are ignorant of the delight arising from the exercises of a mind that is at peace with God, and that therefore your testimony and your opinion are not to be credited like the testimony and the opinion of those whose experience has embraced both kinds of enjoyment; and has there been any one instance in which they have not assured us that they never knew what happiness was till they had become partakers of the grace which pardons and saves the guilty soul, and does not their united voice declare what David declared, when, from his own personal feeling, he uttered and recorded the language before us, 'Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered, and to whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity!'

But again we say, that if you persist in alleging you are happy, you are happy without reason. Supposing your pleasures were less criminal than we fear they often are; supposing that they were all of the most exquisite and refined description; and supposing that they were never interrupted by one pang or one disappointment, to remind you of their insufficiency;—we should nevertheless assert that to be satisfied with them, and to count yourselves happy by means of them, is irrational and absurd. For know ye not that all this while 'the wrath of God is abiding upon you' on account of your sins? Deny this, and then your conduct becomes consistent, though your condition remains as full of peril as before. But if you admit that God governs the world; that you are responsible to him for your actions; that you have disobeyed his law; and that consequently you are involved in the forfeiture of his favour and in obnoxiousness to punishment; if you admit this, as most of you profess to do—then, in these circumstances, can you or should you be happy? Though all the sources of indulgence which this world affords were laid open to you, and though you had not an earthly want unsupplied, nor an earthly desire unfulfilled, could all this compensate for the evil of being subject to the curse of Almighty God, any more than it could be effectual in removing it? Or would not your perseverance in devoting your affections to the gratifications of sense and time rather tend, by aggravating your guilt in the eye of offended heaven, to render your misery more certain and your folly more conspicuous? We can conceive nothing more preposterous in the whole range of human error, no deception more gross and melancholy, than for a man to imagine and to insist that he is happy, because the world, and its perishing objects, and its unthinking inhabitants, are smiling upon him, while yet the terrors of incensed omnipotence and of a coming judgment are frowning on his fate. Compared with this, the maniac is wise, who, in his dreary cell, and with his crown of straw, fancies himself to be the monarch of the universe; the slave is right and noble who boasts of liberty, while he dances in his chains; and the sleeping outcast is an object of complacency, when he dreams that he is 'rich and increased in goods, and stands in need of nothing,' though at that very moment he is in rags, and poverty, and wretchedness, and stands in need of every thing. Yes, my friends, yours is a sad and delusive dream, when you imagine and call yourselves happy; while, whatever may be your temporal circumstances, and whatever may be your temporal enjoyments, the sentence of condemnation, pronounced upon you by the righteous Judge, is yet unrecalled; while no voice from heaven has whispered that your 'sins are forgiven;' while Divine justice still asserts and urges its claim against your guilty souls; and while, from the very scene in which you are setting up your rest, and boasting that your wine and your oil and your mirth abound, there is 'a certain fearful looking for of wrath and fiery indignation to consume you.' O that you could be awaked from this wild and fatal dream, and that your eyes were open to see the infatuation which besets you!

From your own case of fancied bliss, look to the case of those into whose number, for your own sake, we would fondly introduce you. They are blessed indeed. They not only have that inward feeling of happiness which you pretend to have; and it is not only from its very nature profounder and more satisfying than yours,—but it can endure the test of reflection and examination; it has the approbation of their own minds impartially sought for, and deliberately conferred; and it must commend itself to the approval of every understanding that is capable of comparing one thing with another, and of forming a sound and unbiassed judgment on the operations of the human heart. It does not reject any enjoyment which God is pleased to bestow; it is not at variance with one innocent pleasure of life; and it has no natural alliance with a single evil for the suffering of which it does not contain an ample recompence. But it is principally and permanently derived from being delivered out of the greatest calamity, and from being put in possession of the richest inheritance, that can enter into the lot of an immortal being. The more it is considered, the more is its excellence demonstrated, and the more is its value felt. And it has this unspeakable advantage, that its worth and its continuance have no dependance on the fluctuations which belong to all other enjoyments, but remain untouched and undiminished, and are even enhanced and secured by the crosses, and troubles, and disappointments, which denude the sinner and the worlding of all their blessedness, and overwhelm them in misery and despair. O then, if feeling deceive you, let the deception yield to the dictates of reason, and act upon the conviction, that if you are happy, you ought not to be happy, lying as you are, under the curse of God: and let it be the earnest desire of your heart that you may be happy, like those whose situation the Psalmist describes when he says, 'Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity.'

And should you still be obstinate, and content yourselves with the enjoyments that are consistent with an unpardoned state, and go on to live as if you both were, and had reason to be, happy, let me just conclude with hinting to you, that if, on any principle of reason, or propriety, or experience, you can be called happy, you are happy only for a moment. I allude not to the uncertainty which attaches to every one of your earthly pleasures—though even that consideration should not be without its influence—but I refer to the short period during which on any supposition they can be yours. Multitudes among the generations that are passed, lived and thought and felt as you are doing; they paid no regard to the blessedness of which the Psalmist speaks with so much emphasis; they wrapped themselves up in the fond persuasion that all was well with them, and refused to seek for any other, or any higher happiness than what they found in the gratifications of a carnal mind. And where is their happiness now? Did not death 'bring it to a perpetual end?' Could the remembrance of it have any other effect than that of increasing the agony of that punishment to which their unforgiven spirits were doomed when they appeared before the tribunal of their God? And in like manner, will not a few short years put a final period to your boasted felicity? And will not every indulgence to which you now so eagerly devote yourselves become as if it had never been? And will not you then be left to sink into utter perdition, under the burden of that guilt which now lies so heavy on your souls, and notwithstanding which you have the folly and the presumption to rejoice, as if you, and you alone, were happy? O be persuaded but to look forward a little way, that you may see how short your course of worldly enjoyment is, and how darkly and wretchedly it must terminate. And then cast your eyes upon the path along which the justified sinner is pursuing his way. It looks to you as if it were through a dreary wilderness; and so it is. But amidst all the sorrows and difficulties of that wilderness, he has the favour of a forgiving and reconciled God to uphold and to cheer him; to be his 'pillar of cloud by day, and his pillar of fire by night;' to fill him with a peace which the world that you serve can neither give nor take away. And his journey is as short as yours; but O how diffierently does it terminate! It terminates in a land of rest, and bliss, and glory, where the joy that he now feels from the sense of God's pardoning mercy, shall be freed from all that impairs it here, and where it shall be such as to afford the most delightful and the only satisfying illustration of that great truth which we partially experienced upon earth,—that 'blessed is he whose trangression is forgiven, whose sin is covered, and to whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity.'

Let me beseech you then to seek after this happiness with your whole heart. 'Give no sleep to your eyes, nor slumber to your eye-lids,' till you have asked and obtained the forgiveness of your sins. Apply for that blesssing through faith in the atonement and righteousness of the great Redeemer. Pray that it may be communicated to you in 'demonstration of the Spirit,' so that you may feel in your experience that you have 'obtained mercy,' and be glad in the possession and enjoyment of such a privilege. And He who sent his own Son to be a propitiation for your sins, and is now 'in him reconciling the world to himself,' will lend a gracious ear to your petition, and blot out your iniquities, and give you to partake of all the blessings of the everlasting covenant.

PART II.

We have considered, in the first place, the uncomfortable state of a convinced, but still impenitent and unpardoned sinner; in the second place, the blessing of pardon itself; and, in the third place, the happiness of those who have been so privileged as to obtain that blessing.

IV. We come now, in the fourth place, to consider repentance as connected with the forgiveness of sin. 'I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid; I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin.'

Confession of sin has no reference to the idea of making God acquainted with our unworthiness. In confessing our fault to a fellow-creature, one principal part of the act frequently consists in revealing to him what he did not know before, and what he would never have known but for our communication. With God, however, the case is entirely and necessarily different. He is already intimately and perfectly aware of our guilt, of all its extent, of all its particulars, and of all its aggravations. Confessing to him, therefore, must mean something else than merely telling him of our unworthiness. It plainly stands opposed to that state of mind in which the transgressor is when he is awakened in some measure to see his sinfulness, but not yet sufficiently affected with the sight to act according to its influence and tendency. In that state he is sensible that he has committed many iniquities, and he is so far convinced of his demerit and his danger as to feel uneasiness from it. But still he labours to persuade himself that things are not so bad with him as his fears would suggest; he tries to believe that such and such actions, for which his conscience had been upbraiding him, have, in truth, no moral evil in them; he is ingenious in devising, and eager in discovering excuses, by which he may palliate conduct, the ungodly or immoral nature of which he cannot wholly deny; he will not recognize such depravity in his heart and life, as should make him tremble for his safety, and anxious to secure it; he struggles to keep down every rising of remorse—to check every feeling of anxiety and alarm; and he strives to satisfy his mind that he has not been so disobedient to the law of God, as to subject him to condemnation and punishment. When, however, his convictions of sin become powerful, his sense of its evil clear and acute, and his consciousness of its burden too oppressive for him to bear, he ceases to take a partial or a flattering view of his spiritual character. He feels that when he maintains his comparative innocence he is but deceiving himself with a vain and false imagination. Bitter experience teaches him that 'there is no peace to the wicked,' even when he is most resolute in speaking peace to his soul. All his sophistries, and all his stout-heartedness, and all his fond delusions are overborne by the aspect which his guilt now assumes. And instead of having recourse to what might be supposed to extenuate his offences or to justify his conduct, he chooses rather to admit that such an attempt is utterly hopeless; he does homage to the truth, mortifying and humiliating as it is, that he is nothing but a great and miserable sinner; and he seeks for relief to his agitated or dejected spirit by a free, ingenuous, and unreserved acknowledgment that he is chargeable with rebellion against God which exposes him to divine indignation, and which it is beyond his power to expiate. He not only sees the folly of imposing upon himself, by endeavouring, as it were, to impose upon omniscience; he is not only alive to the double guiltiness of first sinning, and then trying to think that he has not sinned, or has not sinned so as to provoke God; he is not only struck with the danger of thus putting a veil upon his iniquities, and steeling himself against the impression of that unalterable turpitude which belongs to them, and of that coming ruin in which they must in this case involve him;—not only do these things affect him deeply, and determine him, instead of struggling any longer with his convictions, to yield altogether to their impulse, and to allow them their full play on his feelings and his fears; he is also encouraged to cherish them by the views which he begins to take of the grace and mercy of Him against whom he has sinned, and by the assurances which are held out to him, that 'the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin,' and that the divine compassion extends to the chief of sinners. And, therefore, he pours out his heart in unqualified and undisguised confession, pleading guilty to every offence which the holy eye of God has marked in his deportment, anxious that in no one instance, and in no one degree, he should indulge in a mitigated opinion of his delinquencies, and studying to take the completest survey, and to have the deepest sense, and to make the frankest and the fullest avowal, of that demerit which adheres to him as a hater and a transgressor of the divine law.

It is quite evident that confession of sin forms but a part of repentance. It is only one of the steps which the penitent takes in the course of that transition which he makes, or of that change which he undergoes, when he turns from sin unto God. And yet it obviously stands here for the whole of repentance, having the blessing of forgiveness and salvation annexed to it, and intimating the Psalmist's return from that state of guilt into which he had plunged, to the holy principles and holy practice which he had criminally abandoned. This is not uncommon in Scripture.* We read in another passage besides this, that 'if we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' Such a substitution of a part for the whole of repentance, seems to proceed on the same general principle, according to which we often find a single Christian virtue put for the Christian character at large; as when our Saviour says, 'Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.' Here mercy stands for every thing which a good man is required to possess. And, when properly considered, such a representation is perfectly correct: For the mercy here spoken of is genuine mercy,—mercy wrought by the spirit of God, and governed by right and worthy motives; but this being the case, we may be quite sure that this grace will not stand alone, but will be accompanied and connected with every other grace that characterises a genuine disciple of Christ. The spirit of God cannot be supposed to implant the sentiment of mercy, and to leave the mind unfurnished with those other excellencies which are equally becoming, and equally necessary, and without which the persons whom it distinguishes would not be men of God, 'furnished unto all good works.' And the motives which lead to the cultivation of this moral quality, must, of course, operate to the cultivation of justice, temperance, faith, humility, and every remanent virtue which goes to constitute that character to the possession of which the promise of salvation is annexed. Now, in like manner, and for a similar reason, confession of sin is taken to signify the whole of repentance. This confession is not supposed to be a mere verbal or formal acknowledgment of iniquity, which is perfectly consistent with perseverance in the iniquity which is confessed. It is understood to be sincere and worthy; and that being the case, it proceeds from just and Scriptural views of sin; it implies a sacred homage to the character and the law of God; it is associated with godly sorrow and self-abasement; it is quickened by a believing regard to the mediation of Jesus; and it is succeeded by practical reformation and holy obedience. And, viewed in that light, and in these relations, it may, with the greatest propriety, be spoken of as we speak of repentance itself, and set down as bringing along with it the rich recompense which divine benignity has been pleased to attach to the exercise of that comprehensive grace. And we may remark also a peculiar propriety in its being so employed in the passage before us. For the Psalmist had been speaking of the misery that he experienced in consequence of his 'keeping silence,' or refusing utterance and effect to his convictions of sin; and now that his mind is relieved by adopting an opposite course, and giving vent to his feelings in an acknowledgment dictated by those full and affecting views of his guilt which would terminate in a thorough change, he very naturally ascribes to it the substantial character and beneficial results connected with repentance. 'I acknowledge my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid: I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin.'

Repentance, as expressed by confession of sin, is here united with the blessing of forgiveness. And this is a union recognized and stated throughout the whole of Scripture. The doctrine of God's word is plainly and unequivocally this,—that while the impenitent must perish in their sins, the truly penitent shall obtain the pardon of their sins, and final admission into the kingdom of heaven.

We must be very careful, however, to entertain accurate notions of the relation which these two things bear to each other. It is not the relation of cause and effect. You do not obtain forgiveness on account of your repentance. It might easily be shown, from the nature of repentance itself, that it could not procure such a benefit by any worth or virtue or efficacy of its own. But I would just remind you of one essential truth in the gospel scheme, and in the gospel record; namely, that it is 'through the blood of Christ that ye have redemption, even the forgiveness of your sins.' It is for the sake of what Christ did and suffered, as an atoning sacrifice, that God in his undeserved mercy blots out your iniquities. And any weight given to your own doings in the attainment of this mighty boon, is just to detract so much from the riches of divine grace, and from the merit of the only Saviour, and to evince a spirit which is at once opposed to the gospel method of deliverance, and most inconsistent with the primary and essential elements of repentance itself. Forgiveness is annexed to the exercise of faith, but neither is faith the cause of your forgiveness, nor the foundation on which you can rest either your application for that blessing, or your hope of receiving it. It is nothing else than an acceptance of Him who expiates your guilt by the oblation of himself, and procures for you by his exclusive merit the pardon that you need. In its proper exercise, it withdraws your regards entirely from yourselves, and fixes them solely on the atoning death and finished work of the Redeemer. And as this faith is a leading principle in the true penitent, every true penitent will lose sight of all that is in himself, and place his confidence entirely in that one sacrifice by which Jesus Christ has taken away the sins of the world.

But still it must not be forgotten that repentance is necessary—absolutely and indispensably necessary for you. It is necessary for maintaining consistency in God's administration towards you—for nothing could be more contradictory to his moral perfection than to make provision for the pardon of your sin, and to allow you to continue in the love and practice of it. It is necessary to fit you for enjoying his favour and friendship upon earth, it being impossible for him to hold communion with you, or for you to have any relish for his loving kindness, while you continued 'enemies to him in your minds, and by wicked works.' It is necessary to qualify you for the employments and the blessedness of the heavenly world, because these are so holy and immaculate, that an unconverted man could neither willingly engage in the one, nor have any satisfaction or complacency in the other. It is necessary in all these important respects; and we cannot imagine a wilder or more fatal delusion, than for such as have not repented to appropriate to themselves the blessedness of those 'whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered, and to whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity.' We cannot here enter particularly into the nature and process of that repentance which you must exercise; but we would earnestly press upon you the necessity of having this evidence of your spiritual safety; and would beseech you to try and examine yourselves in order to ascertain whether you indeed possess it; and never to rest satisfied till in this respect 'there is no guile in your heart,' and till you can say with the Psalmist, in the full import of his language, 'I acknowledge my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgres sions unto the Lord; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin.'

* See Lecture III. Part II.

V. We now come to consider the disposition of those who are penitent and pardoned to engage in prayer. 'For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee, in a time when thou mayest be found.'

The true penitent may be denominated godly during every period of his progress; from the first moment that he gets decided views of the evil of sin, till he comes to abound in every good word and work. And at every period of his progress, he feels an inclination to pray. Nothing is more natural to him—nothing more requisite for him—nothing more beneficial to him. Whenever he is thoroughly convinced of sin, his heart instinctively ascends in supplication to the throne of God. He is impressed with an overwhelming sense of the evil of sin, in its contrariety to the divine law, and in its obnoxiousness to the divine wrath. His conscience tells him that it cleaves to him, and that it has involved him in dishonour and perdition. He is aware that there is no deliverance, and no safety for him but what must come from that great Being whose authority he has disobeyed, and whose anger he has incurred. He knows, also, that his offended Maker is as compassionate as he is holy, and is ready to forgive all that come to him by 'the new and living way' that he has appointed. And thus, not merely urged by his spiritual necessities, but encouraged by the divine willingness to supply them, he looks up and says, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.' He beseeches God to 'save him from going down to the pit'—to pardon his manifold iniquities, and thus to speak peace to his guilty and troubled soul.

Nor is he contented with once offering up this supplication. He is too strongly impressed with the magnitude of his guilt and the imminence of his danger; he thirsts too vehemently for the blessing that he has implored; he is too anxious and fearful about falling short of that which he so greatly needs and so devoutly wishes for, to be satisfied with such a rare and short-lived application to the fountain of mercy. He continues to ask for the divine forgiveness and favour with a fervour and an importunity, such as might be expected in the case of one who knew that, if he succeeded, eternal felicity would be his, and that if he failed, he must die, and that for ever. And while he perseveres in petitioning for mercy to pardon him, he also supplicates 'grace to help him in his time of need.' He knows that he is polluted as well as guilty; that he must be sanctified as well as justified; that of his own strength he can no more do the former than he can do the latter; that both achievements must be performed by 'the great power of God;' and therefore, he prays, that while he is rescued from the curse of the law, he may be also emancipated from 'the bondage of corruption,' and 'created again in Christ Jesus unto good works.'

He is aware, that though God may have accorded to him the forgiveness he has asked, yet that he has continued need of the pardoning mercy he has experienced; that he is every day sinning against his Maker and Redeemer, and consequently is in daily want of that blessing, which can henceforth come only from him who at first bestowed it; and therefore he ceases not to intreat it from his merciful father in heaven; and amidst all the prayers that he offers up, he never forgets to ask the repeated forgiveness of his repeated transgressions. He is also sensible that the change which has been commenced in his soul, can no more be carried on and completed, than it was originated, by his own independent energies; that he must have the divine help to keep him from falling back into that state of blindness, and insensibility, and degradation from which he has been delivered; that without it, he would cease even to feel any desire for the thorough renewal and final purification of his character; that every view of the evil of sin which he had obtained, would quickly be obscured and lost; that all his good resolutions would be feeble and unavailing; that sin would regain its mastery over his affections and his conduct; that he would assuredly fall back into that state of impenitence, and unbelief, and wickedness, from which he was happily emerging. And therefore he prays, that 'He who had begun the good work in him, would perfect it until the day of Christ;' would save him from the corruption of his own heart; strengthen in him all the holy dispositions which he had implanted; fortify him against the assaults of temptation, and the inroads of his spiritual enemies; carry forward the process of his sanctification, and continue to administer to him that direction and that assistance, that sufficient grace and perfect strength, which would keep him from falling away, and 'preserve him blameless unto the coming of his Lord.'

He prays for these things. He prays for them with an ardour and an earnestness, proportioned to the lively conviction that he has of their infinite importance and indispensable necessity. He prays for them in the name of that great High Priest to whom every true penitent in every age has looked as the only foundation of hope. He prays under the influence of that encouragement which he draws from the goodness of God already vouchsafed to him in opening his eyes to the danger and misery of his condition, and revealing himself to him as ready to forgive, and imparting to him some portion of the relief and blessedness which accompany the communications of his pardoning love. And he prays 'in a time when God may be found.' He considers that any delay in applying at the throne of grace would be both idle and dangerous—that no season can be more proper than that in which the hearer of prayer is himself prompting him, as it were, to the holy exercise—that it is when God, by giving him an affecting sense of his guilty and helpless condition, hedges him in to the attitude of devotion, he can with most propriety and with fondest hope beseech him for deliverance from it—that as his need of pardon, and sanctification, and all other spiritual blessings, is both urgent and certain, he would be acting foolishly if he did not supplicate these as often as God's providence calls him, and as often as God's Spirit stirs him up to seek them—that life is short in reference to the great work of preparation for eternity, and that he may be suddenly and unexpectedly withdrawn from the means and opportunities of carrying it on. And, therefore, he prays to God now, which is 'the accepted time'—now, which is 'the day of salvation;' and has it as one of his most ardent petitions, that the spirit of prayer may be kept alive in his soul, and that he may be made as desirous to obtain, as God is willing and able to bestow, 'mercy to pardon, and grace to help him in his times of need.'

Are any of you, my friends, living in neglect of prayer? Then be assured that you are neither penitent nor pardoned. You must be sensible, if you know any thing at all of the subject, that of the real penitent, it cannot be more truly affirmed that he has repented than it may be said, 'Behold he prayeth.' The one necessarily leads to, and implies the other. All the discoveries that are made, all the feelings that are brought into operation, and all the grace that is experienced throughout the process of the sinner's repentance, and throughout the life by which that change is succeeded, do plainly and irresistibly dictate the necessity of supplication. And, indeed, one of the very sins of which he has to repent, and one consequently which he must be understood to forsake, is the neglect of this great duty. So that it is quite impossible that the repentance which is 'unto salvation' can have taken place, if it has not been accompanied with prayer. And yet you do not pray! You never went to the throne of grace; or if you did, you grew weary of the exercise, and have ceased in a great measure, or altogether to engage in it! And with all this you flatter yourselves that you have repented, and that you may appropriate to yourselves the blessedness of those whose transgression is forgiven! What inconsistency! What presumption! What self-deception is there here! No, my friends, repentance and neglect of prayer are quite incompatible. Repentance is not more evidenced to the world around him by the sanctified life of the penitent, than it is evidenced to his own mind by that recourse to prayer which it necessarily prompts, and which in its turn is requisite for the full accomplishment of his return to God and to the way of salvation. He only is the true penitent—he only is the pardoned penitent—he only is the godly penitent—whose moral change is attended with, and helped onward by supplication and prayer; who sees in God alone his refuge and his help; and who, according to God's appointment, and in the way of his appointment, applies to him for every thing that he needs. This is characteristic of the people of God; and it is on this account that we can speak of them as blessed beyond all that careless and indevout and unconverted sinners can either experience or conceive.

VI. This leads us to say a few things on the last particular which we proposed to consider, namely, the security of God's people in the midst of danger and distress. 'Surely, in the floods of great waters, they shall not come nigh him. Thou art my hiding place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance.'

This language does not intimate that God's people are to be exempted from trials and sufferings. On the contrary, it supposes them to be actually involved in these, as well as at all times liable to them. And, indeed, the history both of the Old and the New Testament church, not to speak of our own observation and experience, may satisfy us that though they have a happiness which others know nothing of, and cannot appreciate till they feel it, they are exposed to all the ordinary calamities which afflict the lot of man—that they are often visited with bereavements and sorrows from which the men of the world escape—and that they have spiritual troubles which are peculiar to themselves, and which are frequently far severer and more difficult to endure than the worst of outward distresses. But herein is their grand distinction, that they are supported, and guarded, and saved by Him who has all things under his sovereign control, and who says of his people, 'He that touches them, touches the apple of mine eye.'

They must pass through a wilderness, indeed, where difficulties beset them, where dangers threaten them, where privations visit them, where malevolence pursues them. And in many respects it is more a wilderness to them than it is to those who are yet 'far from God, and far from righteousness.' There is one consideration, however, which takes away from it, in their case, all that can render it gloomy or formidable to such as have to traverse its rugged paths. They are the objects of God's love, and from his love, which must constitute the safety and the happiness of every creature that is privileged to enjoy it, nothing that can possibly happen, whether of good or evil, is able for one moment to separate them. They enter the wilderness, blessed with the enjoyment and the assurance of his pardoning mercy, and warranted to look to him as their reconciled friend. They travel on under his unerring guidance and almighty protection. And beyond it lies the land of promise, into which he will ere long introduce them, and for the felicity of which the toils and troubles of their pilgrimage will be overruled to prepare them. 'The floods of great waters' may surround the Christian, and to the eye of unthinking men, and in the apprehensions of his own timid mind, they may be about to overwhelm him. But his God says to them 'Hitherto shall ye come, but no farther;' and he reposes on that love which 'many waters cannot quench, and which the floods cannot drown.' God is his 'hiding place' which he may flee to, when perils menace him, into which his most powerful enemies cannot follow him, and where he is as secure from harm as omnipotence can make him. God 'preserves him from trouble;' saves him from every disappointment, and from every pain that would injure his essential interests; blunts the edge of such afflictions as are allowed to befal him, by imparting help and consolation along with them; and converts them into blessings, by making them subservient to his present improvement, and his everlasting happiness. And even when he seems ready to fall a prey to the adversities which come upon him, when all things wear the aspect of hostility, and conspire to accomplish his ruin, and when escape appears to be hopeless and impossible, even then God magnifies his grace and his might by 'compassing him about with songs of deliverance,'—not only delivering him, but making the deliverance so manifest to him as to impress him with the sense of his divine interposition, and to fill his heart with gratitude, and his mouth with praise.

But though even here—in this world of sin and sorrow—which looks as if it were no resting place for the Zionward traveller, as if it had nothing for him but trials and temptations and distresses, and as if it would destroy him before he reached the place of his ultimate destination; though even here he is so much the object of God's providential care and upholding grace, that he is always safe, and can employ the triumphant strains of David on another occasion, 'The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?'—yet it is in heaven that he expects, and it is to heaven that he looks forward, for that complete deliverance from his troubles which is necessary to his perfect blessedness, and which he has been taught to regard as the sure and final portion of every one that is pardoned and reconciled to God. And what are all the blessings that he can be called on to endure in this scene of trial—what all the violence of all his enemies—what all the hardships, and privations, and anguish that can be attached to his mortal fate—when compared with the great and glorious 'redemption that draweth nigh'—by which he shall be rescued at once from all sin, and from all misery—by which he shall be introduced into a world where no enemy can reach him, and where no tempter can harass him, and where no evil can befal him, and where, in a sense in which he could never use it, and with a joy which could never animate him here, he will take up the song of deliverance, and say in the company of the redeemed on high, 'Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his father, to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever!'

I trust my friends, that such is the experience felt, and that such are the anticipations cherished by many of those now hearing me. The passage that we have been considering expresses the sense of safety and the hope of deliverance with which the Psalmist was favoured. Then he was in the midst of troubles from which he could not extricate himself, and by which, but for divine help, he must have been utterly destroyed. It expresses what was felt by all the ancient worthies both of the Old and New Testament church, when in the Providence of God, they were placed in similar circumstances of danger and distress. I trust it is no mean recommendation of it when I tell you that it was a chosen portion of Scripture with our forefathers, who, when persecuted for conscience sake, and hunted like partridges on the mountains, because they would not bend their necks to the yoke of bondage, often made the sequestered glen and the barren rock echo to their voice as they lifted it up to God in this appropriate and pathetic psalm, and in the notes of their favourite and heart-touching melodies, conveyed to his listening ear, the sorrows which oppressed, the consolations which supported, and the hopes which cheered them. And well will it be for you, if in every season of calamity you can cherish that confidence in the mercy of God, and count upon that saving power of his which have been the distinction, and the comfort, and the rejoicing of his saints in every period of his church—which will continue to distinguish and uphold them in all future generations—and which will have their issue in the purity, and bliss, and glory of his unsuffering kingdom.

LECTURE VIII.

Judge me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation: O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man. For thou art the God of my strength: why dost thou cast me off? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy? O send out thy light and thy truth: let them lead me, let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles. Then will I go unto the altar of God, unto God my exceeding joy: yea, upon the harp will I praise thee, O God, my God. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope in God; for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.—PSALM xliii.

It is evident, from the tenor of this Psalm, that David was in great difficulty and distress when he wrote it. He speaks of 'an ungodly nation' against whom he required help—of 'the deceitful and unjust man,' from whom he needed to be delivered—of 'the oppression of the enemy' that caused him to go mourning. We should find it difficult, and perhaps might find it impossible to ascertain, with any degree of certainty, the precise circumstance to which he alludes; but that is no bar to our understanding the general import of the passage, and to our deriving from it those salutary lessons which it is doubtless intended to teach us. We are liable to afflictions similar to those with which the Psalmist was visited, and when thus afflicted, we cannot do better than look to the manner in which he expressed and conducted himself on such trying occasions, that we may learn how to suffer, and how to apply for consolation and deliverance.

You will observe, my friends, that at the very outset, and all along, his views are directed to heaven. He had set his heart upon God: in him he had placed his trust, and from him he expected all necessary aid. This was the habitual feeling and exercise of his mind. And whenever any peculiar exigency occurred, he had immediate recourse to that Great Being in whom he had been taught and accustomed to hope. It was not to himself—it was not to his friends—it was not to any mere created refuge that he applied; it was to God in whom there is all that is good, and mighty, and faithful, and wise; who has every object and every event under his supreme control; and who has promised that he will be with his people in all their times of trouble and of danger.

Thus it was with the Psalmist; and thus will it be with all of us who are truly devout. We will cherish a constant dependance upon God. It is to his providence and grace that we will look amidst all the vicissitudes of life. And, as in our seasons of prosperity we will ascribe to him the blessings that we enjoy, so in our seasons of perplexity and distress it is upon him that we will cast ourselves for guidance and comfort. The ordinary means of obtaining these we will carefully employ, whether they are to be found in our own personal efforts, or in the assistance of our fellow-men, or in the circumstances by which we are surrounded. We will carefully employ these means, because they are divinely appointed, and because we cannot succeed in procuring what we wish for without them. But still we will confide in the blessing of God for rendering them effectual. We will seek for our solace, and our encouragement, and our support in his promised grace and almighty power. We will lift up our souls to Him in prayer and faith. And from our knowledge of his character, our belief in his word, and our experience of his mercy, we will lean upon him as our stay, and rejoice in him as our salvation.

One reason why we are so much borne down by our adversities, is our thinking too little of the divine administration,—giving too much attention to secondary causes,—regarding the arrangements of our lot too much in a state of separation from the unseen hand which regulates them,—and viewing every thing that befals us rather in the effects which it produces upon our present feelings than in the purposes in which it originates, and in its final and permanent results on our most important interests. O, if we could only bring ourselves to see the finger of God in all that happens to us,—to believe, that whoever persecutes us, and whatever annoys us, He is our never-failing friend,—to remember that he calls upon us to place unlimited confidence in his government of the world, and in his dealings with his people,—and to build our hopes of his unceasing protection and care upon that strong foundation which he has laid for them in the gospel of his Son—if we could but bring ourselves to do this, we should less frequently repine and despond under the pressure of calamity; we should assume a loftier tone, and experience a more undisturbed serenity amidst the disappointments and vexations of life; and all the hardships to which the malice of our bitterest foes could subject us, would only make us cling closer to that arm which is 'mighty to save,' and drink deeper into those streams of life and consolation which flow from the throne of a reconciled God.

We may not, my friends, have to sustain the assaults of such enemies as those with whom the Psalmist had to struggle. But still we cannot expect to be exempted altogether from tribulation; and sometimes it may come upon us in its most aggravated form. There are ungodly men who, being destitute of religious principle, will not scruple to injure us, when they can thereby gratify their passions or advance their worldly interests. There are deceitful men, who will put on the garb of friendship, and acquire our confidence and esteem, and then treacherously cheat us out of our property, or our reputation, or our peace. There are unjust men, who, by fraud or by violence would rob us of our dearest rights and most valuable possessions, and not only reduce our powers and opportunities of doing good, but even diminish our means of comfortable subsistence. And there are oppressors who, taking advantage of our weakness or dependence, and trampling alike on the maxims of equity and humanity, may exact from us unreasonable services, impose upon us heavy burdens and cruel restraints, and ply us with insults, and harassments, and deprivations, from which we can make no escape, and for which we can find no redress.

And what does it become us to do when thus situated? Shall we indulge in those resentful feelings which the infliction of such wrongs is calculated to awaken in our breasts? No: that were to cherish an unbecoming spirit, and to add the demerit of sin to the evil of suffering. Shall we then give way to emotions of sorrow, and act as if our case were that of inevitable and hopeless misery? No: while God reigns, our condition never can be such as to justify despair. Or shall we be contented with using every exertion to vindicate our character and maintain our privileges, and repel the aggressions that are made upon us? No: that would both prove insufficient to its purpose, and be unsuitable to what we know and believe concerning the operations of a superintending Providence, and the necessity of divine interposition. We know and believe that there is one who 'rules over the inhabitants of the earth, as well as the armies of heaven,'—that his sway is universal, perpetual, and incontrollable; that infinite perfection adheres to every part of the dominion which he exercises—that all those who love and serve him, are the objects of his favour, and that his eye is ever upon them for good—that, far from beholding with indifference the severities which are practised upon them by wicked men, he then takes a more special and affectionate interest in their well-being—and that he speaks in these terms to them, when they are in circumstances of destitution and suffering, 'Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.' And knowing and believing these things, we cannot but go to the throne of grace when our foes rise up against us, and while, in the spirit of love and of a sound mind, we employ every weapon of defence, and every means of safety with which God has entrusted us, it is at once our duty and our privilege to commit our ways to his guidance, and our fortunes to his management, and to say to him with the voice of earnest supplication, 'Judge me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation. O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man: for thou art the God of my strength.'

We apply to God as our Judge—not that he may decide upon our personal merits, and give us the award that is justly due to us; for this were to court and to secure the punishment which our sins deserve. As guilty creatures we cast ourselves upon his mercy, and though we must look to him as 'setting his throne for judgment,' yet we look to him as appointing to that throne the Lord Jesus Christ in whom we have believed as our Saviour. But when we apply to him as our Judge in the sense in which the Psalmist uses that language, it is that he may judge between us and those who are inflicting upon us unmerited wrongs. And, therefore, in order that we may make such an application with propriety, with confidence, and with success, we must be previously satisfied that we are the injured party—that our adversaries, in vilifying or in maltreating us, are not merely resenting the mischief which we have done to them,—but that their cruelty is unprovoked, and their hatred without a cause. Were not this the case, were we chargeable with the same offences on account of which we complain of others, did their enmity to us proceed from our enmity to them, and had we indulged in the spirit or in the practice of a vindictive retaliation, our appeal to God in the character of Judge could only have the effect of involving ourselves as well as our enemies in a sentence of condemnation, and of increasing our guilt by exhibiting our presumption. But if we suffer from the wanton malice or unprincipled selfishness of our fellow-men; if we are innocent of what they allege against us as the ground of their hostility; and still more, if that hostility has been created by our firm adherence to truth and duty, or if it appears in the form of an ungrateful return for kindness that has been felt, and benefits that have been bestowed—then is it both safe and becoming in us to make our reference to God's judicial character; and in doing so, we may rest assured, that having committed our cause to Him who is the Judge of all the earth, and who 'judges righteous judgment,' its determination will be such as to vindicate our rights and secure our final welfare.

We apply to God as our Advocate. 'Plead my cause,' says the Psalmist, 'against an ungodly nation.' Those who have not the fear of God before their eyes, may reproach us, and wound us, and despoil us; and all our arguments and remonstrances may be unavailing to the removal or the abatement of their malevolence; and every effort that we make to ward off the injuries with which they menace us, may only add to the bitterness of their malignity and to the activity of their evil speaking and their evil doing. But God condescends to take up our plea, and to urge it home upon them with an energy which we could not employ, and which they cannot resist. And we render a just homage to those high and gracious attributes in which he has been pleased to reveal himself to us, as well as consult our own personal advantage, when we beseech him so to manage and defend our suit, as that our enemies shall not be permitted to succeed in their endeavours, or to triumph in their injustice. Thus praying to God, from the firm conviction that he can, we may also pray to him with the animating persuasion that he will, effectually take our part against them that trouble us—that by the secret influences of his Spirit or the open demonstrations of his providence, he will convert their hearts, or stop their mouths, or arrest them in their career of mischief—that in his own way, and at his own time, but certainly and completely, he will bring the controversy to such an issue as to show that the foes of his people, though they may harass for a season cannot and shall not ultimately prosper.

We apply to God as our Deliverer. 'O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man.' Those wicked men into whose hands we have fallen, and who are attempting to make a prey of us, may overmatch us in cunning or in force; and if abandoned to our own resources, we may become the victims of their malicious designs, or their violent assaults. But God is made known to us as a Being on whom, in such perilous and helpless circumstances, we may place unsuspecting and cheerful reliance, for he is our strength; he is strong in wisdom, strong in power, strong in all the perfections which can operate to rescue us from the grasp and machinations of our foes; and these perfections he is pledged by his promises to put forth in our behalf. Whatever be the number, and the artifice, and the might of them that set themselves against us, this is our comfort, and this is our refuge, that 'the Lord God omnipotent reigneth;' that his everlasting arm is underneath and round about us continually; that we have free access to that throne on which he sits as the hearer of prayer; and that if, from the midst of those perils into which unjust and deceitful men have plunged us, we implore his merciful interposition, our supplications will prevail upon him to 'take to him his great power,' to scatter all our enemies, and to emancipate us from all our fears.

And truly, my friends, what need we more than that we should thus be privileged to confide in God as our Judge, our Advocate, and our Deliverer? Yet the Psalmist who seems to have habitually looked up to God and trusted in him as sustaining these important characters, ventures, in a moment of forgetfulness and despondency, to utter this complaint, 'Why dost thou cast me off? Why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?' And alas! it is to be feared that the same discontent is felt, and the same impatience expressed, by not a few believers, in the season of severe and protracted calamity. All this is quite natural. If God is almighty to destroy or to subdue our enemies, it is difficult to perceive why they should be allowed to disturb our peace, or to injure our welfare, as if they were stronger than He who is for us; and if, in spite of all our importunate intreaties for deliverance, we are still exposed to their fiery assaults, our argument being strengthened by feeling, it is not wonderful that in our haste we should be betrayed into that querulous language which fell from the lips of David, when under the pressure of evils which he had long endured, and to which he saw no symptons of a speedy termination. But though all this be quite natural, it is both erroneous and sinful. It is erroneous because it implies that the present is a state of unqualified retribution; that, because God is possessed of infinite justice and power, he must, therefore, exercise them immediately, and to their full extent; that when we are in danger or distress he cannot allow us to continue in it, consistently with his own revealed character or with our real welfare. And it is sinful, inasmuch as it is setting up our imperfect wisdom in opposition to the unerring wisdom of God, accusing him of violating his promises and abandoning his people, and dictating to him the time and the manner of bestowing upon us those blessings of which we stand in need, and for which he has instructed us to pray. Being thus erroneous and sinful, let us avoid such conduct; and if, on any occasion, we are like the Psalmist, betrayed into it, let us also like him, humbly impute it to a want of knowledge in our minds, and a want of grace in our hearts, and still let us apply to God in prayer as he did, that these wants may be supplied, and that we may be taught to see more clearly the rectitude of all his dealings with us, and enabled more submissively to acquiesce in all his dispensations, and more unreservedly to trust in his faithfulness and mercy.

No sooner had David vented his unreasonable and unjustifiable complaint than he poured out his soul in this appropriate supplication, 'O send out thy light and thy truth, let them lead me.' Let such be the supplication of our souls when similarly situated. Let us ask God to lead us into correct views and correct feelings, respecting his moral administration. We are naturally ignorant of that subject; and even though we have been made acquainted with it by means of the written word, yet much imperfection still cleaves to all the information we have acquired, and the trials with which we are frequently visited, are apt to darken and perplex our understandings, when endeavouring to scan the divine procedure, and to reconcile what we experience of disappointment and of suffering with what we believe of the greatness and the goodness of that Being, under whose government these evils befal us. But though our knowledge were as extensive and accurate on this point as we could desire it to be, still that attainment would not be sufficient; for amidst it all, there is a natural aversion to every thing which afflicts us with pain, or which frustrates our hopes, or which subjects us to the scorn and the enmity of our fellow-mortals; and this aversion is so strong and so inveterate as to make us mutiny under such calamities, notwithstanding their constituting, in our system of belief, a part of God's ordinances concerning our lot. And, therefore, we need a two-fold communication from heaven to meet our necessities, and to 'guide our feet into the way of peace;' and for these we must be careful to pray. We must pray that God would 'send forth his light;'—that he would give us such bright and realising conceptions of those attributes of his, which make him worthy to be 'the confidence of all the ends of the earth,' as that we shall see them operating in our seasons of adversity as well as in our seasons of prosperity, and shall recognise wisdom and mercy in those dispensations which to the carnal and unenlightened eye, wear the aspect of nothing but capricious chance, or cruel and relentless fate. And we must pray that he would 'send forth his truth;'—that he would hold out to us such a strong and impressive manifestation of that feature of his character which tells us that he is unchangeably true to all the promises that he has ever made, that he would so carry home this peculiar display of himself to our conviction and our experience, as that we should deem it at once irrational and undutiful to distrust him in any thing, and that in the gloomiest and most disheartening of his providences towards us, we may cling to his faithfulness 'as the anchor of our soul, both sure and stedfast,' and cherish the unwavering, cheering, delightful conviction that the most formidable of our adversaries shall never prevail against us—that he will 'make their wrath to praise him' by making it subservient to the good of his people, while 'the remainder of that wrath he will restrain;'—that he will finally and wholly rescue us from whatever they have inflicted, and from whatever they may threaten—and that all that we are doomed to suffer from their malice will be overruled by him for promoting our spiritual improvement and our future happiness.

But while we beseech God so to illuminate our minds with a knowledge of his character, and so to impress them with a sense of his faithfulness, as that we may be led to a right mode of judging, and a right tone of feeling, respecting his care of us when we endure the buffetings and persecutions of ungodly men, we should also pray for these divine influences in reference to our engaging in the ordinances of religion. 'Let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles.' At all times, and in all circumstances, it is both a bounden duty, and a valuable privilege to wait upon God in the exercises of his house. But from the nature of these exercises—from their tendency to instruct, and console, and encourage—it is more especially incumbent upon those to engage in them, who are in perplexity and distress by reason of the harsh and slanderous and injurious usuage which they receive from a world lying in wickedness. All who in such trying conditions have betaken themselves to the house of God, and devoutly mingled in its sacred occupations, can bear testimony to the comfort and the advantage which these are calculated to impart to the afflicted, but humble and sincere worshipper. He finds in them a support infinitely stronger, and a solacement infinitely sweeter than any that the mere worldling has ever found, when, visited by some sorrowful dispensation, he seeks for an assuagement to his grief, or a stay to his dejected mind, in the secularities of a busy life, or in the amusements of a gay one. The prayers that he offers up in faith—the sympathies of his Christian brethren—his researches into the oracles of truth—his meditations on divine things—and the various topics to which his attention is directed—all are fitted to give him a more thorough apprehension of the divine character and government, to reconcile him more effectually to the painfulness of that discipline to which he is subjected, to awaken in him a spirit of more patient endurance and more heartfelt submission, to procure for him more abundant supplies of that grace which is necessary to help him in his times of need, and to send him back to his scene of suffering, better prepared to encounter it with fortitude, and to bear it with resignation.

But, that we may thus profit by the services of the sanctuary, we must preface them with prayer and supplication. We require, and therefore we must ask the light and truth of God to 'bring us unto his holy hill and to his tabernacles'—to dispose us to make that solemn approach to him—to fit us for a right discharge of the duties which it implies—and to make it 'a good thing for us to draw near' to the object of our reverence and our love. And while we pray for such a blessing to accompany us, and to rest upon us, and to sanctify all our service, we must take care that our service be a spiritual as well as an external service—that we do not merely 'go unto the altar of God,' but 'unto God' himself—that besides passing through all the 'forms of godliness,' we study to feel and to cherish its animating power; that while we give a visible demonstration of our respect for every outward observance in which we are called to participate, it be our main concern to hold communion with the father of our spirits; that we appear before him, and think of him, and address ourselves to him, as the fountain of our happiness; that we recognise in him the giver of an 'exceeding joy,' a joy that far exceeds in its nature, its degree, and its duration, the joy that we can derive from any created source; that while enjoying the honour and the privilege of engaging in his worship, and experiencing the benefits with which his mercy has thereby provided us, we lift up our souls to him in grateful adoration; that, in conformity to the character of our New Testament economy, we praise him with our voices, as David praised him with his harp; that whatever be the channel through which our thanksgivings are conveyed, or whatever be the mode in which they are expressed, they be the outgoings of devout and deep-felt affection; and that they be offered with all the earnestness and ardour which should accompany the sacrifices that we present to God as our God, with whom we have reconciliation by the blood of sprinkling, who will be 'our guide even unto death,' and our 'portion for evermore.' And surely, if we thus pray, and if we thus go to the sanctuary of the Lord, and if we thus engage in its pious and holy offices, we may well employ the language of self remonstrance and self encouragement with which David concludes the Psalm, 'Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope in God, for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance and my God.'

The Psalmist had formerly, in the spirit of despondency, complained that God had cast him off, and allowed him to 'go mourning because of the oppression of the enemy.' But his mind now resumes a better tone; his views become enlightened; his soul 'returns to its rest,' and he blames himself for being immoderately agitated and dejected by what he had to suffer, and summons up all his energies to place an unlimited and rejoicing confidence in God, whom he had been guilty of 'charging foolishly' with having abandoned him to the malice of his foes. To such of you, my believing friends, as have much to harass and distress you, and who in your sad and solitary musings on the hardships of your lot, are ready to murmur or to despair; even though your path hitherto has been only ruffled and thorny, and you have at this moment a cup of bitter sorrow pressed to your lips, and in the picture of your coming life there be nothing but snares, and difficulties, and cruel mockings, and multiplied sufferings in the foreground, and nothing but darkness and desolation in the distance; even then I would say to you in the words of expostulation, why are your souls 'cast down, and why are they disquieted within you?' Do not you 'believe in God?' Are not you convinced that all things are at his disposal, and under his control? Is not his character adorned with all the excellencies which can assure you of present safety and eternal felicity? Has not he promised, and is not he faithful to perform his promise, that he 'will never leave you nor forsake you?' Cannot you trust that, armed as he is with irresistible power, and clothed as he is with unsearchable wisdom, and full as he is of the richest and tenderest mercy, he will bring light to you out of the darkness by which you are surrounded, and good to you out of the manifold evils which beset your path? Is it not the distinct prediction of Christ that 'in the world ye shall have tribulation?' but has he not told you that he has 'overcome the world,' and that he will give you the victory over all its terrors? Does not the history of the church furnish you with many illustrious examples of the divine interposition in behalf of persecuted and afflicted believers? And is the arm of your heavenly king now 'shortened that it cannot save, or his ear now heavy that it cannot hear?' Was Daniel safe amidst the fierce lions? Did the three children walk unhurt through the burning furnace? Did David escape from his troubles, though 'all the waves and billows of adversity had gone over him?' Was not God himself the angel of their deliverance? And is he not your God? And will he not also deliver you, 'O ye of little faith?' Did he give up his own dear Son to crucifixion and to death, that he might pluck you out of the spoiler's hand? And after this costly ransoming of your souls, and this marvellous exhibition of his grace and strength, think you that he either cannot or will not disenthral you from the power of unjust, deceitful, ungodly, and oppressive men? Away all such unworthy suspicions; such groundless fears! 'Hope in God.' Rest upon his promises, which are all 'yea and amen' in Christ Jesus. Take shelter in the declarations and assurances of that covenant which he has established with his church, and which in all things is well ordered, sure, and everlasting. Do this and you 'shall yet praise him.' His goodness will yet be for a 'song in the house of your pilgrimage.' And that 'sadness of the countenance' which has been generated by your trials and sorrows, will be found to conceal the tokens of his fatherly love, and by 'making your heart better,' will attune it for magnifying in higher and holier strains, the faithfulness and the salvation of him in whom you have put your trust.

And even though no such gladness should ever fill your bosom or pour from your lips, while you travel through the wilderness—though you should go 'mourning all your days' because of present and pressing hardships; though, when we ask you to sing us one of the songs of Zion, you should reply, with the captive Israelite of old, 'How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land;' yet we still bid you 'hope in God, for you shall yet praise him.' There is a world beyond this, where all your sorrows shall be hushed into oblivious silence—where the voice of the oppressor shall no more be heard; where you shall set up that everlasting 'rest which remaineth for the people of God;' where uninterrupted peace, and holiest love, and unmingled joy, shall pervade and animate the countless multitude that 'have come through much tribulation,' and have 'entered into their glory;' and where one theme of your unceasing gratitude shall be those very afflictions which, in this dark and distant dwelling, had almost overturned your faith, and almost plunged you into despair.

LECTURE IX.

O Lord God of hosts, hear my prayer: give ear, O God of Jacob. Behold, O God our shield, and look upon the face of thine anointed. For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. For the Lord God is a sun and shield; the Lord will give grace and glory: no good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly. O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee—PSALM lxxxiv. 8—END.

It has been the characteristic of good men in every age that they have not 'restrained prayer before God'—that they have, on principle and from feeling, been given to this exercise—that in all their varied circumstances they have engaged in it as at once a duty and a privilege, an expression of piety, a means of improvement, and a source of consolation. And if we be among the number of those who have received 'the spirit of grace and of supplications,' we will not only, under the influence of that spirit, 'make our request known unto God,' but we will be anxious that they should be heard with acceptance, and answered in peace and mercy. We are guilty of mockery when we ask that which we do not need, or when we are unconcerned about the success of the application that we make. It becomes us to take a lively interest in every thing that is requisite for promoting our real welfare; to depend for the communication of it upon Him 'from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift'—to make it the subject of sincere and devout petition at the foot-stool of his throne—and to address him with all that earnestness, and with all that solicitude, which correspond with the importance of the blessings that we implore, and with the character of the Being who is intreated to bestow them.

And as we pray for the particular benefits which are suited to our particular situations, so we will appeal to those particular attributes, by the exercise of which we may expect to find an appropriate supply to our wants, and an appropriate refuge from our distresses. If we are involved in difficulties which we have no skill to unravel or to remove, we will of course apply to God for deliverance; but we will apply to him more peculiarly as a God of wisdom,—a God whose wisdom can extricate us out of all our perplexities, and render our path plain, and our prospects clear. If we are in danger from the assault of enemies, whose hostility we have no strength to resist or subdue, we will of course apply to God for protection and safety; but we will apply to him more peculiarly as a God to whom 'belongeth power,' power to rescue us from every peril, and to defend us against every foe, and to place us in perfect security. If we are conscious of guilt, and fearful of condemnation, we will of course apply to God for forgiveness; but we will apply to him more peculiarly as a God of mercy, as a God whose mercy may be exercised in perfect consistency with his other attributes,—whose mercy will be exercised towards all who apply for it in the appointed way,—whose merey can pardon the deepest and most aggravated guilt of the sincere penitent. And if we are in distress, whether it be of a temporal or of a spiritual kind, we will of course apply to God for support and relief; but we will apply to him more peculiarly as the God of consolation,—as a God in whom compassions flow,—who is 'afflicted in all our afflictions,'—and who is both able and willing to comfort us amidst the various tribulations in which we may be involved.

And while we pray to God for the blessings that we need, and while we offer up our supplications with sincerity and earnestness, and while we address God in special reference to those attributes, which correspond with the nature of our necessities, we will never forget, if we have drawn our notions from the Gospel, and if we have been taught by the Spirit to pray, that our petitions must depend for their success, not upon any merit of our own, for, alas! we have nothing of that kind to plead before the holy majesty of heaven,—but upon the merit of him whom God has appointed to be our Mediator, and for whose sake alone, therefore, we can expect to find acceptance when we approach the divine presence, and to get an answer in peace when we implore the divine bounty.

Of all this we have an example and a practical illustration in the case of the Psalmist. He was a man of God, and, therefore, he was a man of piety and prayer. And whether he was in joy or in sorrow, he delighted to pour out his heart to that great being to whom he was indebted for the one, and from whom he expected support amidst the other. It was particularly in seasons of difficulty and distress that he had recourse to 'the throne of grace.' Nor was it merely or chiefly in the time of temporal calamities—it was also and chiefly in the time of spiritual deprivations, that he took refuge in devotional exercises. Of this we have a remarkable instance in the passage before us. The Psalmist had, by the rebellion of his son, and the united power and malice of his enemies, been necessitated to abandon the holy city. In this way he was prevented from engaging in the public ordinances of religion on which he had, from principle and from experience, been accustomed to set the highest value. And considering it as one of the heaviest dispensations with which it was possible for him to be visited, he is naturally most anxious to be delivered from it, and restored to privileges in the enjoyment of which he had formerly been so happy, and through the loss of which he had become so miserable and forlorn. In his extremity, he calls upon God. He fervently intreats him to hear his prayer. He reiterates the intreaty that he would lend an attentive ear to the aspirations of his soul. And he pleads with all the urgency and importunateness of one who deeply feels his wretchedness, and eagerly desires to have it mitigated or removed.

He appeals to those characters by which God commends himself to his people when they are in circumstances of destitution and affliction, and when they are crying to him for help and for comfort. He prays to him as the 'Lord God of Hosts,' who is the supreme ruler of the universe,—who has every thing in it at his uncontrolled command and sovereign disposal,—who 'does according to his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth,'—and whose arm, therefore, is mighty to guard from evil or to deliver out of it all who are interested in his favour, and need his aid. He prays to him as 'the God of Jacob,' who had graciously condescended to make a covenant with Jacob and his seed,—who is faithful to fulfil all the promises of that covenant,—and one of whose richest promises is that which the Psalmist records in another place, 'Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.' And he prays to him as 'God his shield;' who was not only powerful to accomplish his relief, but whose power was in continual activity for that purpose; who said to Abraham of old, 'Fear not, Abraham, I am thy shield;' who was to be considered as holding the same language to all the spiritual descendents of the Patriarch; and who, in the time of their trouble, would 'hide them in his pavilion, and in the secret of his tabernacle,' and even when they were at a distance from that tabernacle, as the Psalmist now was, would still stand between them and all their foes, and secure them against every deadly assault, and every fatal catastrophe. And then, though he addresses God as the Lord God of Hosts, as the God of Jacob, and as God his shield, and though he addresses him in these characters with the utmost degree of importunity, he does not feel that he has done enough to effectuate the object at which he aims. He directs his believing regards to the Messiah, to him whom God had 'anointed' to be the Saviour of sinners, and on account of whose obedience unto death, typified by the unspotted sacrifices under the law, God became propitious to those who drew near to him; and he beseeches God to hear him, and answer him, in consideration of the appointed Mediator in whom he believed, and by whom he had confidence and boldness to pray.

Now, my friends, let us imitate the example of the Psalmist. Let us be especially afflicted by the deprivation of spiritual benefits, and especially solicitous to have spiritual benefits restored to us when they happen to be taken away. And for this end, let us address God in prayer; convinced that all our fortunes are in his hands, that he alone can comfort and assist, and rescue us when we are so situated as to require interposition, and that devout and fervent applications to him at his throne of mercy, are the means which he himself has ordained and sanctioned for our obtaining from him the blessings that we stand in need of. Let us in all such approaches contemplate him, and recognise him, and appeal to him, as possessing the peculiar excellencies which render him infinitely worthy of our dependance, and which invite and encourage us to ask, and to seek, and to knock for the communications of his grace. And while we apply to him as clothed with majesty and power, and as unchangeably true to the promises of his covenant, and as continually holding forth the protection of his providence, let us apply to him as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom alone it is that we can hope to find acceptance, and through whom alone it is that we can hope to receive what we supplicate; whose merits are at once absolutely essential, and altogether sufficient to procure for us 'mercy to pardon, and grace to help in every time of need.'

The Psalmist explains the reason that he had for being so urgent in praying to be restored to the privilege from which he had been unjustly and cruelly separated: it was the ardent love that he bore to the house, and the public ordinances of God. 'For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand; I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.' In the beginning of the Psalm, he had proclaimed the amiableness of God's tabernacles considered in themselves. Here he looks at the subject in the way of comparison; and he states his preference in terms the most explicit and emphatic. So much enjoyment had he in the services of the sanctuary, and such important advantages did he derive from them, and so closely was his engaging in them connected with a principle of obedience to the divine authority, and of regard for the divine honour, that if he could be permitted to devote ever so short a time to them, that short time would be far more precious to him than the longest period spent in places where God was not acknowledged, and in exercises with which the fear and the love of God were not permitted to intermingle. Sin, he saw and knew, had its honours, and its pleasures, and its profits; but though he could be allowed to inhabit its most costly and luxurious palaces, though he could command for himself every desirable thing which it had to bestow, and though he had the power of communicating these to all around him, he would not think for a moment of putting his situation there in competition with the meanest place that ever a saint occupied, and with the scantiest fare that ever a saint received, in the temple of his God. This was David's deliberate and determined choice; a choice which he often expressed in the most glowing language; a choice, the decisiveness and sincerity of which he uniformly demonstrated in his conduct.

O how unlike to the Psalmist, in this respect, are many professing Christians! We speak not of those who do not acknowledge the truth and authority of revelation. Living visibly, if not avowedly, 'without God in the world,' we cannot wonder that the institutions of the Gospel should be viewed by them with dislike, and treated by them with contempt. But we speak of those who profess to have faith in the Bible, and to hope for salvation by Christ, and who pay a certain degree of respect to religious ordinances; and we say of many of them, that in their mouths the language of the Psalmist would be mere pretence, because it is habitually contradicted by their conduct. They have evidently no liking to the house of God, and to its services. Many and trivial are their excuses for absence. When prevented from attending, they feel no regret; and when they do come, it is with an ill-concealed reluctance. And then how cold and unconcerned in their devotions! How inattentive are they to the preaching of the Gospel! How much more interested in their outward appearance, and outward comfort, than in the state of their affections, and in the improvement of their understandings and their hearts! And how fretful and discontented when the service exceeds by ever so little, the very limited period during which they are disposed to engage in it, or to be present at it, without losing their patience. But follow them into the world, and observe the contrast which they exhibit. To the gay pleasures, and to the grave pursuits of that world, they have no aversion. For these they so eagerly long, that the sacredness of the Sabbath scarcely escapes violation. Into these they plunge with a devotedness of feeling which all the prayers, and the praises, and the instructions of the sanctuary, could never command. While indulging in them, how quickly does their time pass away! How do they murmur when any thing occurs to interrupt or to shorten them! How vehemently do they strive to prolong their duration, and to heighten their relish, and to secure their permanency! And rather than forego them, how ready are they to renounce all that is good in principle, and great in character, if they render such a sacrifice indispensable, and to sit down contented with the paltriest advantages they can afford, and with the meanest gratifications they can give, to the most worthless of their slaves! In every thing worldly they engage with all their heart; but for the spiritual services of God's house, they have little or no heart at all. And it would be a just expression of their character, were they to invert the language of the Psalmist, and say, 'A day spent in the occupation and indulgences of a worldly life, is better than a thousand in the courts of the Lord: I had rather be the humblest partaker of those joys which are to be found in the tents of wickedness, than fill the most honourable station, and feast upon the richest blessings, to which I could be invited in the house of my God.'

O if there be any now hearing me to whom this description justly applies, think how completely it strips you of all your pretensions to genuine Christianity. Neglecting or disliking the ordinances of religion, what becomes of your respect for the authority of God, who has appointed these ordinances, and commanded you to observe them? Taking no serious interest in the pious and instructive exercises of the sanctuary, how is it possible to help concluding that the truths of the gospel have no value in your estimation, and that they are the objects neither of your faith, nor of your love? Taking no pleasure in holding communion with your God and Saviour in his house below, where is your preparation for maintaining that more intimate intercourse with him in his temple above, which is to form one of the highest honours, and most delightful employments of those who are to be introduced into that blessed place? And preferring the service of the world to the service of him who made you and has redeemed you, upon what ground can you expect that he will bestow upon you any reward at last, or that he will not leave you to be recompensed by that master to whom you have cleaved, and whose 'wages is death?' If you know any thing of what true religion is, and reflect but for a moment on what you are doing, you must be sensible that so long as the ordinances of God's house are treated by you either with indifference or dislike, you have no lot or part in the salvation of the gospel; you are not only destitute of one thing which has invariably distinguished the people of God, but you are destitute of that which indicates the want of all their essential principles, and all their peculiar affections. Let me therefore beseech you to examine yourselves by this test; and not to think yourselves safe till you have been brought to feel somewhat of that warm affection for the worship and service of God, which animated the breast, and actuated the conduct of the Psalmist. Nor rest satisfied with low attainments in this important grace. The more ardently you love the house of prayer and praise, the stronger will be the proof of your progress in sanctification; and then that devout attendance on the ordinances of the gospel, which will necessarily accompany your love for them, must have a powerful effect on the improvement of all your Christian virtues, and lead you to verify the statement in Scripture, which declares, that 'they who wait upon the Lord shall mount up on wings as eagles: they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint.'

And you my Christian friends, who have cherished that profound and affectionate attachment to the house and ordinances of God, which was so deeply felt and so rapturously expressed by the Psalmist, will be ready to bear your testimony along with his, to the strong encouragement which his people have to draw near to him in his sanctuary. Such is his character, and such are the manifestations he condescends to make of it, that it is impossible to know him, and believe in him, and love him, without ardently desiring to dwell in his courts, and faithfully and piously engaging in the institutions which are there observed, 'The Lord God is a sun and shield; the Lord will give grace and glory; no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly.' How comprehensive and how satisfying is this representation of him whom you are called to worship and to serve! And if you give credit to the statement, how anxious must you be to tread his courts, and with what fervour and delight will you mingle in those ordinances in which he thus reveals himself, and through which he thus becomes to you all that you need, and all that you can desire!

He is a Sun to enlighten your understandings with saving knowledge, and 'to guide your feet in the way of peace;' to cheer your hearts amidst the perplexities and discouragements of your earthly pilgrimage; and to give warmth and life and activity to all your powers, which, but for his vivifying influences, would become cold and torpid. And he is a Shield to defend you from 'the fiery darts of the wicked one;' to ward off the arrows of malice and of scorn with which ungodly men assail you; to protect you not only from the evils which would otherwise overwhelm you, but also from the petty injuries by which you might be harassed and depressed; and to interpose between you and your spiritual enemies with such vigilance and constancy, that they cannot overcome you, or prevent you from being finally triumphant in that arduous warfare which you are doomed to wage with them.

The Lord will give Grace; grace to pardon your offences, and deliver your conscience from the burden of guilt; grace to purify your souls more and more from that moral defilement which naturally cleaves to them; grace to help you in all your seasons of trial and of weakness; grace to comfort you in every disconsolate hour, and to strengthen you for every Christian duty; grace to keep you stedfast in the faith of Jesus, and in the obedience of his law, and in the hope of his gospel; grace to insure your perseverance in the path of spiritual life, and to obtain the victory over the terrors and the power of death. And having thus given you Grace here, he will also give you Glory hereafter. He will receive you into that heavenly kingdom for which he was preparing you upon earth; a state from which all that is sinful, all that is degrading, and all that is unhappy, shall be for ever excluded, and in which you shall be privileged with whatever is great in intellectual attainment, and perfect in moral excellence,—with whatever is splendid in honour, and exquisite in enjoyment,—with all the fulness of God, and all the blessedness of immortality.

And is there any thing else of which you feel your need, and which you do not conceive to enter into these views of the divine beneficence? Then here it is in the assurance that he 'will withhold no good thing from you.' There is nothing which is either necessary or conducive to your welfare, which his loving kindness will not bestow upon you in its proper measure, and in its proper season. Even the comforts of a present world will be given, so far as the wisdom of your heavenly Father sees them for your real benefit, and farther than that you could not safely or dutifully wish to receive them. No temporal evil will be permitted to befal you, which is not requisite for 'the trial of your faith' and patience, and which he will not overrule for promoting your highest advantage. No temporal blessing will be refused to you, or taken from you, except where its bestowal or its continuance is inconsistent with what you should value infinitely more than all that the world can furnish,—your advancement in the work of preparation for judgment and eternity. It is the general fact, announced in Scripture, and confirmed by experience, that as the people of God you have not only the promise of 'the life that now is,' but the actual and liberal fulfilment of that promise. And all the exceptions to it that you may meet with in your journeyings through the wilderness, all that you suffer in these from poverty, from sickness, from the loss of friends, from disappointments in business, from unmerited neglect, from base ingratitude, or from any other of the privations and sorrows to which humanity is liable,—all these things are but varied expressions of the same paternal love which cared for the salvation of your souls; many of them, even while they last and operate in all there bitterness. will be recognised by you as tokens of kindness; and there is not one of them which, when looked back upon from the land of promised rest, and contemplated in the light of celestial truth, will not furnish a theme of gratitude and praise, as having fomed a part of that plan of grace by which you were fitted and matured for glory.

Such, my friends, is that God whom ye are called to worship in his holy temple—such is the generous treatment which you may expect from him—such is his willingness, his ability, his sufficiency, his promise, to be unto every one of you all that is needful to make you perfectly and for ever happy. And will not you give yourselves in the full tide of admiration and affection, to the service of such a wise, and merciful, and mighty being? Will not you feel regret when you lose an opportunity of approaching him in the sanctuary? Will not you lament the imperfection and the sinfulness which mix with all your best endeavours to honour him in his 'house of prayer?' Will not you labour more and more that you may be disposed to engage in his ordinances with heartfelt devotion, and enabled to engage in them with a keener relish for the comforts which they inspire, and a more resolute ambition for the advantages which they impart? And will not you pray and strive that you may attain that height of pious regard for them which dictated the strong and impassioned language of the Psalmist, 'How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! My soul longeth, yea even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God?'

Remember, however, my friends, that the blessings promised to them who love and observe the ordinances of God, are connected with a certain prescribed character. They will be given to those only who 'walk uprightly;' who have their conduct both in the sanctuary and out of it agreeable to the divine will; who 'worship God who is a spirit, in spirit and in truth;' who 'have their conversation in the world in simplicity and godly sincerity;' who are habitually and strenuously aiming at the possession of a good conscience, and at the cultivation of a holy life. You cannot otherwise be qualified for the services of the sanctuary, or the reception of spiritual benefits. As, therefore, you value these, be careful to 'walk uprightly,' and remember for your encouragement that it is one manifest and appointed end of the services of God's house, to improve your principles and dispositions, and to send you back to the world better prepared for discharging its ordinary duties, and 'keeping yourselves unspotted' from its pollutions. And remember also that your knowledge of the charactor in which God has represented himself to you as your sun and your shield, and as giving grace and glory, and withholding no good thing from you, is calculated to produce the same effect in your heart and your deportment; and that especially the divine influences are promised to comfort, and purify, and strengthen you, and to make you 'fruitful in every good word and work.' Study then to live and act as the people of God, that you may be fit worshippers in the temple of God, and worthy receivers of the bounty of God: and let God's bounty be often and affectionately thought upon, and let God's temple be regularly and devoutly attended, that you may feel their reciprocal advantage in having your faith invigorated, your piety exalted, your hatred of sin increased, your love of holiness strengthened, and your whole character brought to a nearer and a nearer resemblance to the character of him to whom you owe all your comforts and all your hopes.

And finally, 'put your trust in the Lord;' for it is in this case only, that you can be truly blessed. Trust in him that he will perform all that he has promised; place unlimited confidence in every assurance he has given you; and act as it becomes those in whose minds this affiance is lively and unwavering. Then shall ye be happy indeed; happy now as having the communications of his love and the hopes that stretch into eternity; and happy hereafter in the full and everlasting enjoyment of all that can constitute the felicity of a rational and immortal being.

LECTURE X.

I love the Lord, because he hath heard my voice and my supplications. Because he hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon him as long as I live. The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell got hold upon me: I found trouble and sorrow. Then called I upon the name of the Lord; O Lord, I beseech thee, deliver my soul. Gracious is the Lord, and righteous; yea, our God is merciful. The Lord preserveth the simple: I was brought low, and he helped me. Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee. For thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling. I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living.—PSALM cxvi. 1—9.

There are two motives which should constrain us to love God. In the first place, God has, in his nature and character, all those qualities which are naturally fitted to awaken this sentiment in our hearts. And, in the second place, these amiable qualities have been exhibited in promoting our welfare; and from a principle of our moral constitution, 'we love him, because he first loved us.' It is to the latter motive that the Psalmist here refers. 'I love the Lord because he hath heard my voice and my supplications.' David had asked the interposition of God's mercy in his behalf. It had been granted to him according to the desire and petition of his heart. And in the benefits which he received, he not only saw goodness manifested as an attribute of Deity, but he felt it in his own personal experience, as goodness of which he was the object, and as constituting an urgent and irresistible claim on his reciprocal affection. There arose, therefore, in his breast, and there was cherished there, the gratitude and love which he owed to his heavenly father; and in simple language he acknowledges and records at once the feelings of which he was conscious, and the consideration by which they had been excited.

The experience of the Psalmist, on this point, must be more or less the experience of every true Christian. Every true Christian habitually lifts up to God the voice of supplication; praying for the various blessings, temporal and spiritual, which his circumstances require. Every true Christian, praying 'with all prayer and supplication in the spirit,' has the promise of divine faithfulness that he shall receive according to his need. And every true Christian labouring to fulfil the first and great commandment, will meditate on the manifold tokens of kindness which God has shown him in answer to his applications at a throne of grace, and yield to the native influence of that kindness, by cherishing a still more cordial, and still more devoted attachment to the giver of all his mercies.

My friends, if you are real Christians, it is one of your leading characteristics, that you continually look to God as the fountain of all good, and that while you regularly ask from him in his own appointed way, what is necessary for your well-being, in the ordinary course of life, you ask from him with particular emphasis and importunateness, those benefits which are of the highest general importance, and those which are most suited to your special and unexpected exigencies. And I am sure that, having done so, you can bear your personal testimony to the truth of that declaration which God has addressed to every member of his church, 'Call upon me, and I will answer you.' It has been your privilege and your happiness to find, that he provides for the temporal wants of his people with wisdom and liberality; that he communicates in still richer abundance the blessings after which their souls are hungering and thirsting; that he gives them grace and glory, and withholds from them no good thing which is essential to their comfort, their improvement, their salvation. You may have had your seasons of mental dejection and distress; and you may have been sometimes ready to cry out, 'hath the Lord forgotten to be gracious, and will he be favourable no more?' but say, my believing brethren, if, when the Spirit carried you to the mercy seat, and with the faith which rests on the merits of your heavenly intercessor, you there poured forth the petitions of your hearts, these petitions were not answered by God's appearing in mercy as a sun to enlighten you in the midst of your darkness, and as a shield to protect you from all the dangers by which you were afraid of being overwhelmed? And when you have been weighed down with worldly cares and afflictions, and the whole scene of human life perhaps put on the garb of melancholy and of woe, and you have still had recourse to prayer, have not you felt your sorrowful spirits visited with consolation; and though it may be that the bitter cup is still pressed to your lips, have not you been taught that it is the hand of your heavenly father which gives you this cup to drink, and have you not learned that it is in faithfulness and in compassion that he has mingled it for you, and have not you been enabled even to 'rejoice in the midst of your tribulation?' Has not this been in one degree or another your comfortable experience? Has not such experience constrained you more and more to love God who thus hears you when you cry to him, and delivers you out of your distresses, and makes it 'good for you that you have been afflicted,' and causes you to be 'glad in the light of his countenance?' And is not this the language by which you at once express your gratitude, and encourage it, 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits, who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies; who satisfieth thy mouth with good things, so that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's.'

But the Psalmist not only declares his love to God on account of God's goodness and mercy to him in answer to his prayers, he adds, 'Because he hath declined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon him as long as I live,' And this is precisely what all the people of God will do in similar circumstances. If God has graciously condescended to grant us deliverance and the other blessings that we implored from him, there is, in the first place, laid upon us an obligation to be thankful which we shall never be able to exhaust; and, in the next place, there is suggested to us a powerful encouragement to persevere in our supplications, to which a regard to our own welfare will determine us to yield. When we think of our personal unworthiness of any of the least token of God's mercy; when we think of our just obnoxiousness to his displeasure on account of our manifold and aggravated provocations; and when we recollect, that notwithstanding all this we have been invited to the throne of his grace, and have been allowed to make our requests known to him, and have received what was necessary to support, and comfort, and bless us, can we ever cease to 'sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and to declare his works with rejoicing?' Supposing that we were left to go mourning all the remainder of our earthly pilgrimage, still the remembrance of what we have already experienced of 'the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living,' and the hope which that experienced goodness has taught us to repose in his continued favour, will not only cheer us as we travel through the wilderness, but will call forth all our powers and affections to bless and to magnify his holy name. And the last breath that we draw will whisper the beginning of that song of praise which we are to sing to our redeeming God, when we enter upon the unmingled and eternal joys of the promised land.

But we will not only celebrate the praises of God so long as we live, on account of his merciful answer to our prayers; —having received such an answer, we shall feel encouraged to pray to him in every succeeding emergency of our spiritual career. There is no period when we can expect to be exempt from those necessities which require the interposition of divine aid and the communication of divine bounty; and we may lay our account with being sometimes placed in those circumstances of peculiar trial, danger or distress, which demand the peculiar supplies of Almighty grace to uphold and to save us; and our only resource in such cases is to be found in earnest, believing, unwearied prayer. And how much must we be animated to engage in thet exercise, not only by the promises held out to us in the word of God, but by the fulfilment of these promises which have actually taken place in the history of our own lives! He who heard and answered us from his holy hill when we formerly petitioned him, will not fail to hear and answer us on every future occasion that we cast ourselves upon his compassion and his power. He has emphatically taught us by his past kindness, to apply to him and to trust in him, amid all the coming difficulties and hardships of our Christian journey. And we will but ill understand and ill improve the lesson, if it does not serve to keep alive in us an active spirit of prayer and supplication, and if it does not make us 'go boldly to the throne of grace,' and ask with confidence, that we may receive with freeness, mercy and grace, and every needful blessing.

Having stated, in general, God's mercy to him, and the general effect which it produced upon his sentiments and conduct, the Psalmist proceeds to take a more particular view of God's gracious dealings with him, and of the impressions which these made upon him, both as to his present feelings and his resolutions for the future. 'The sorrows of death compassed me,' says he, 'the pains of hell got hold upon me; I found trouble and sorrow.' He was menaced with death. It was not some bodily distemper which might be easily and speedily removed. It was not some ordinary calamity which ordinary fortitude would enable him to endure. It was a distemper which seemed to be mortal—it was a calamity which threatened to prove fatal. The prospect of dissolution was before him; and there was something more alarming still—something after death which made him shrink back from it as his worst enemy, and which filled him with trouble and sorrow.

It is truly a fearful thing to die; to go from the place of hope to the place of unalterable retribution; to leave this world, in which, amidst all its sinfulness, we are still permitted to hear the voice of divine mercy, and to pass into that untried scene where we must encounter all the perils of a righteous judgment, and have our doom irrevocably and everlastingly fixed. It is the prerogative of faith, indeed, to convert the king of terrors into a messenger of peace—to shed a cheering light along the dark valley—and to realize in the most holy judge a most compassionate Saviour. But even in those whose belief has been heretofore strong, and lively, and influential, and who have often said, under the impressions of its elevating power—'O death where is thy sting, O grave where is thy victory? To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain;'—even in them, there may be misgivings at the last hour, and terrible apprehensions of a coming tribunal, and a coming eternity. They may be visited with the compunctions of guilt; and thinking of all their transgressions and all their aggravations, they may be agitated with the terrors of the Lord, and feel as it were the punishment of hell beginning in their souls. Melancholy and distressing is their situation. It is not indeed to be compared with the situation of those who are not only thus afraid to die, but who have reason to be thus afraid; who have sinned, and never repented; who have been offered a Saviour, but have not believed in him; who are called to give in their account, but have made no prepraration for such a dread reckoning; and who either are not aware of their danger, or try to banish it from their thoughts, or, roused to a sense of it, breathe nothing but the language of despair. The situation of the believer whose heart is fearful of dying, is not indeed for a moment to be compared with that of the careless and hardened, or the awakened and hopeless sinner. Still, however, it is one of severe suffering; and he is frequently heard to express the mental anguish which afflicts him. But then there is a refuge for him. To that refuge he flees. He looks to God as a God rich in mercy. He relies upon the mediator of the new covenant. He calls upon him whose 'ear is open to his cry;' and finds relief by committing himself to him in the earnestness and the confidence of prayer; 'then called I upon the name of the Lord; O Lord, I beseech thee deliver my soul.'

This prayer is short and simple, but it is the prayer of the heart and the prayer of faith, and cannot fail to succeed. He who prefers it, asks the deliverance of the soul; its deliverance from the guilt of sin, which would leave it under the sentence of condemnation; and its deliverance from the pollution of sin, which would disqualify it for the kingdom of heaven. And he does not merely ask it as if it were a matter of indifference whether he obtained it or not. He asks it as a blessing of the highest; of infinite importance; as a blessing without which he must be undone; as a blessing with which his happiness is secure and complete. 'O Lord, I beseech thee, deliver my soul.' Then again he appeals to God as a God of mercy and of grace. 'Gracious is the Lord, yea our God is merciful.' He knows and feels, that were God to deal justly with him, instead of obtaining deliverance, he should receive condemnation; and therefore he relies upon his mercy. He refers to that as the source of all his expectations; and laying aside as presumptuous and vain every claim on the ground of personal deserving, he looks and applies to the free and unmerited grace of him whose memorial it is, that he possesses this endearing attribute, and that he delights in the exercise of it.

But the believer does not rest satisfied with the conviction of God's mercy, and with resting his hopes upon that as if it were the only perfection in God's character. He entertains more worthy and consistent notions on the subject. He regards God, not as his own corrupt nature would perversely wish him to be; but as he really is, and as he has been pleased to reveal himself to sinners. He regards him as no less holy than he is merciful. 'Gracious is the Lord, and righteous.' And this leads him not merely to glorify and do homage to the character of God, by ascribing to it all its native excellence, but to attend to that provision which the high and holy One has made for the consistent and effectual manifestation of his love to guilty men. He contemplates the gospel scheme; he sees there the arrangement which supreme wisdom has contrived for reconciling the bestowal of mercy with the demands of justice; and he seeks for the deliverance of his soul in the way which has been divinely appointed; through faith in the atonement and mediation of Jesus Christ, which is God's instituted method for a sinner's justification.

Nor does the believer rest even here. He knows that while he must depend entirely upon the merit of Christ as the procuring cause, and upon the mercy of God as the originating cause, of his deliverance, still it is not in any spirit that he feels himself entitled to ask for that boon. He does not conceive it to be enough that he makes use of the mere words and phrases of a petition, or that he makes a verbal reference, however decided and orthodox, in that petition, to the work of the Redeemer. He knows that in all this, in order to its being of any weight, there must be 'simplicity and godly sincerity;' for it is only 'the simple' that the Lord 'preserves.' And therefore he studies to be 'without guile' before God, to have a single eye to what God requires of him, as well as to what he is asking from God; and conscious of being without wisdom and without strength himself, he casts himself entirely and unreservedly on the divine protection.

Now, the consequence of such an application to God, is the attainment of that support and deliverance which were implored. 'I was brought low, and the Lord helped me.' I was brought so low; I was so beset with danger and so overwhelmed with fear; I was in such a miserable and hopeless state, that not only was there no help for me in man, but I was almost despairing of help from God. And yet he has disappointed all my fears, he has scattered all mine enemies, he has 'taken me out of the fearful pit and out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock and established my goings.' As a poor, destitute, and wretched man, 'I cried unto the Lord, and he heard me, and delivered me out of all my distresses.' I was cast down, but he raised me up: the waves and billows of adversity were threatening to swallow me up; but he made 'the overflowing of the proud waters to pass by,' and brought me to the shore of safety and of peace. His everlasting arm has rescued me from the jaws of destruction, and now 'I fear no evil.' 'Return unto thy rest O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee.'

If our souls are properly affected they will be perpetually seeking rest; a rest in which they can delight themselves, and on whose permanence they can count with certainty. And this rest is no where to be found but in the bounty and favour of the Lord. 'The depth saith, it is not in me, and the sea, it is not in me. It cannot be gotten for gold.' All the wealth of the world cannot purchase it. The soul has wants which no human beneficence can supply. It has diseases which no human skill can heal. It has desires which no human power can satisfy. It has sorrows which no human sympathies can charm away. And if left to the resources of created being, it is indeed 'weary and heavy laden,' and can repose neither in what it has, nor in what it expects to attain. This is the case in some measure with every worldling; who, though not aware, perhaps, of the cause, or not inclined to have it removed, yet feels that in all his most eager pursuits, and in all his choicest pleasures, there is little else than 'vanity and vexation of spirit.' But it is more especially the case with the believer, who views things in the light of reason, and in the light of Scripture, and in the light of eternity; who sees in the very best and highest of earthly enjoyments nothing that is worthy of an immortal mind—nothing that accommodates itself to the necessities of a guilty conscience or of a depraved heart; nothing that can make affliction light, death comfortable, and futurity blessed; and who would, therefore, regard a sentence dooming him to seek and to find his happiness in these, as a sentence dooming him to an utter exclusion from the rest which he is so anxious to obtain, and to the continued endurance of that misery out of which he is so anxious to escape. But, blessed be God, while he feels that 'this is not his rest,' he knows where to find it. He 'arises and departs out of the land which is polluted,' and he goes into the land in which the dominion of sin is destroyed, and in which he can lie down on 'the green pastures,' and walk beside 'the still waters' of divine grace. He sees the ocean of a worldly and unsanctified life to be without an island on which he may dwell securely, and without a twig even on which for one moment he may plant his foot; and, therefore, he returns to the ark of safety and of peace. He takes the good and ever-living God for his portion; and in the riches of his bounty he finds all that can give 'rest to his soul,' amidst his most numerous troubles and his most aggravated sorrows. There is no evil in his existing condition, and no evil that he can anticipate, from which he is not emancipated, or under which he is not upheld and comforted, by that merciful and mighty being to whom he has surrendered himself in faith and in well-doing.

The Psalmist here gives an enumeration of the blessings which he experienced from the bountiful dealing of the Lord. There is first, the deliverance of the 'soul from death.' 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die.' And having sinned, we are justly and necessarily condemned to die. But as it is impossible to describe, or even to conceive, all the horrors of that punishment which we have incurred by our transgression of God's law, so proportionally awful must be the convictions of the awakened sinner who has in any measure realized these in his imagination, and is conscious of deserving them, and is impressed with the apprehension of suffering them. But if, in the midst of all these dangers, and all this anguish, we have 'fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us,' and have put our trust in God's mercy as exhibited in the mediation of Jesus, it is the assurance of him 'who cannot lie,' that our guilt is remitted, that we obtain reconciliation, that we become partakers of an 'eternal redemption.' And what can be wanting to give us rest from the agitations of guilt, when we hear that great and gracious being whose wrath we had incurred, saying to us, son, 'daughter, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee!' Surely this declaration, so full of mercy, and so full of meaning, must impart to us that 'peace of mind which passeth understanding,' and fill us with 'a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory.'

But, besides delivering our souls from death, the Lord also in his bounty delivers our 'eyes from tears.' In this sinful world, there is no complete exemption from evil that is either promised to us, or that can be experienced by us. It abounds in causes of mourning, to the operation of which we must be subjected in common with all the children of mortality, and there are some by which we are peculiarly affected as the disciples of a holy and crucified Redeemer. But though we are exposed to these, and must often endure them in all their variety, and in all their weight, still being reconciled to God through Christ, and consequently interested in all the promises of the well ordered covenant, we have wherewithal to comfort our hearts in the darkest and most distressful hour. No affliction befals us which is not accompanied with its appropriate consolation. Even our heaviest calamities are represented and brought home to us as expressions of God's paternal love. And in the gloomiest vale of sorrow, we are permitted to lift up the eye of hope to that region of unclouded sky and undisturbed repose which is reserved for the faithful; and to consider what we suffer now as a preparation for that blessed period longed for, though not distant, by all the afflicted followers of Christ, when God shall translate them into his unsuffering kingdom, and shall 'wipe away all tears from their eyes.' With this prospect before us, secured to us by the word of promise, and brought near by that 'faith which is the evidence of things not seen,' we may not only 'possess our souls in patience,' but even 'rejoice in our tribulations.'

And while God delivers our souls from death, and our eyes from tears, he also delivers our 'feet from falling.' If we are true believers, sensible of our obligations to God, and desirous of final admission into heaven, we must be perpetually concerned to maintain 'a conscience void of offence,' and to be 'holy in all manner of conversation." And, aware of the numberless temptations that surround us, and of our own weakness and inability to resist and overcome them, the fear of falling a prey to them must frequently harass and distress us. But here also a bountiful God has provided rest for us. We are assured by him that his 'grace will be sufficient for us, and that his strength will be perfected in our weakness;'

that the divine Spirit is to be given us for our guidance and sanctification; that Christ has vanquished our spiritual foes, and that believing in him, his victory becomes ours. And having such an assurance, what reason have we not merely to exclude all despondency as to our perseverance, but even to go on our Christian way rejoicing, humble indeed under a sense of our manifold dangers and deficiencies, but yet animated by the encouraging truth, that we are 'strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might,' that even in the wilderness we shall have 'rest from our enemies,' and that by a course of cheerful and universal obedience, we shall be maturing our meetness for enjoying that sinless, and perfect, and eternal 'rest which remains' above 'for the people of God!'

Now, what is the practical result of this experience? What was it with the Psalmist? And what should it be with us? 'I will walk before the Lord,' says David, 'in the land of the living.' This was his resolution, this was his endeavour; and it must be ours. We must act with a spirit of confidence in his wisdom and goodness; with unfeigned submission to his authority, with 'a single eye to his glory,' with the blessed hope of seeing him in heaven. And especially we must act as it becomes those who have experienced so much of his loving kindness, recognising in this a powerful motive for being more active and zealous in his service, more anxious in promoting his honour among our fellow-men; and more careful to embrace every opportunity that is offered, of showing to the souls and bodies of others that mercy which we have received from him.

And there must be no delay, no remissness, no indolence in the great duty of walking before the Lord. 'I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living.' O my friends, life is short. We are now in the land of living men: We shall ere long be immured in the darkness and the silence of the tomb. Let us 'work the works of God, therefore, while it is day; the night cometh' soon, and it may come unexpectedly, 'when no man can work.' 'Whatever our hand findeth to do;' whether it be an exercise of faith in the Redeemer, or whether it be an act of repentance towards our offended Maker, or whether it be an application by prayer at the foot-stool of mercy, or whether it be a deed of justice and reparation to some one that we have wronged, or whether it be a work of piety and beneficence, in behalf of the victims of disease and poverty, 'whatever our hand findeth to do, let us do it with our might, for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither we are going.'

LECTURE XI.

I believed, therefore have I spoken: I was greatly afflicted. I said in my haste, All men are liars. What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me? I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. O Lord, truly I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid: thou hast loosed my bonds. I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the Lord. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people, in the courts of the Lord's house, in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem. Praise ye the Lord.—PSALM CXVI. 10—END.

'I believed,' says David, 'therefore have I spoken.' The Apostle Paul, in his second epistle to the Corinthians, quotes this language, and applies it to himself and to his fellow labourers, as enduring affliction, and yet preaching, and openly declaring their attachment to, the truths on account of which that affliction was suffered. And hence, we may learn, according to the judgment of the Apostle, that the Psalmist intimates, in this concise phraseology, that he was bold to confess his reliance on the divine promises, even in the midst of all his persecutions and distress, and that he was enabled to manifest this boldness by the strength and the vividness of his religious faith.

The conduct of David and of Paul was rational as well as pious, and it must be our conduct if we would be wise, and consistent, and holy. Trusting in the providence, and 'glorying in the cross of Christ,' we may, like many that have gone before us, be exposed to ridicule and reproach. Our understanding may be impeached; our sincerity may be denied; our good name may be traduced, and our worldly interest impaired; and we may be beset with evils as many and as severe as those which harassed the King of Israel and the Apostle of the Gentiles. But, amidst them all, we will never, if we are true Christians, be deterred nor discouraged from confessing the Redeemer of our souls, and the God of our salvation. We will make this confession, when called upon to do so, even though it should increase the hatred of our enemies, and the severity of our hardships a thousand fold. And we will be the more resolute to do this, not only because it is right in itself, but because by the noble testimony which we thus give, of a good conscience, and to a righteous cause, we may be instrumental in awakening, and finally converting the hearts of those who so unjustly vilify and oppress us.

Nor my friends can we possibly act otherwise, if we truly and firmly believe. Let us only be convinced that 'the Lord reigns,' and that his word concerning his people is as true as his purpose is merciful, and as his arm is mighty; let our minds be influenced by realizing views of the necessity and the greatness of that deliverance which he has provided for us, by the meritorious righteousness and atoning death of his own Son; let our belief extend to all that he has spoken of the compassion and the kindness, with which he will regard us as we journey along the pilgrimage of life, and travel through 'the dark valley of death;' let our hope 'enter into that within the vail,' and contemplate whatever is great and good and happy in the sinless and unsuffering kingdom which is prepared for us in heaven; and what is there in the hostility of mortal man; what is there in the privation of earthy comfort; what is there in the last and deepest agonies of bodily suffering, that should prevent us from proclaiming in the loudest strains our unshaken trust in the Lord Jehovah, in the grace and power of Jesus, in the virtue and the faithfulness of the everlasting covenant? The afflictions to which we are subjected, cannot alter the objects towards which our faith is turned: they cannot alter the grounds upon which it is established; they cannot alter the reasonableness of that connexion which subsists between the principle itself, and the arguments, whether speculative or experimental, which have produced it; they cannot alter these things, and, therefore, why should our faith in such circumstances, be either enfeebled or destroyed? Nay, if that faith be genuine and enlightened, it will not merely brave the storms of persecution, but will gather strength and vigour from them. For while he in whom we believe gives us no reason to expect any exemption from the ills and calamities of life, he has even told us that our lot in consequence of our Christian profession, and Christian practice, may be more troubled than that of other men, and that it may happen that every proof we give, either in word or deed, of our devotedness to the doctrine of a particular providence, or of a crucified Saviour, may be the signal for opposition, and contumely, and scorn. And, consequently, when such things befal us, they give us additional evidence of the truth of the Gospel, and of the veracity of him to whom we have committed our interests. This evidence becomes the more interesting and powerful, when we recollect the promise with which the prediction of suffering is accompanied, namely, that it will be all overruled for our ultimate happiness; and, indeed, that it is to operate as a wise and intended means of sanctifying us for the presence of the blessed God. And, in this view of the subject, it surely becomes us to be 'strong in the faith;' to 'sing at once of mercy and of judgment;' to lift up a witnessing voice to the unceasing and unchangeable love of him under whose permission, or by whose appointment, we are put into the furnace of affliction; and to tell the church and the world, in the language of settled and animated belief, that we rejoice in him who suffered on Calvary, and that in spite of all the obloquy that can be heaped upon us by infidel and ungodly men, we still cling to his cross as 'all our salvation and all our desire.' 'Thus believing, we will thus speak.'

But, my friends, though this be the language of true and genuine faith, we know enough of the frailty of men, and of believing men, not to be aware that believing men do not uniformly hold this language; that they sometimes allow their convictions to be weakened, or to fall into a temporary slumber; that when assailed by bitter provocations, or by unexpected miseries, they occasionally become uncharitable, fretful, and disconsolate. In the intensity of their feelings towards those who are but the instruments of what they endure, they forget the perfection and the character of him by whom these instruments are guided or restrained. And irritated by the pains that they suffer, or perplexed by the difficulties in which they are involved, they lose their hold of that stay on which their souls, in less trying circumstances, had securely rested; they speak and act as if the divine protection were withdrawn, or, as if their enemies were now stronger than God; and look with an evil eye and pronounce an indiscriminating sentence of condemnation, on all their brethren of mankind.

Of this we have an example in the Psalmist. 'I was greatly afflicted. I said in my haste, all men are liars.' He had been deserted by those on whom he relied as his friends; he had been deceived, as well as thwarted and persecuted by such as might have been expected to stand by him, and support him in his time of need. But, not contented with expressing his indignation at the treachery and misconduct of these individuals, he concludes that every other person is actuated by the same spirit of falsehood and deception, and involves the good and the bad, friends and foes, in one sweeping censure. And he does it in such a way as to show that he was thinking with more concern, about the guilt and the malice of his adversaries, than about the power and the providence of his God.

But then he acknowledges that he did this rashly and unadvisedly. He did not sufficiently consider the nature and grounds of the sentiment which he uttered. He yielded to a sudden ebullition of temper, instead of having recourse to the great truths in which he believed, and which would have served in this, as in former cases, to fortify his courage, to comfort his heart, and to guide his steps. And this sinful conduct originated in the greatness of his affliction. His affliction was so great as to overwhelm his better principles and feelings, to bring into action the angry passions of his nature, and to make him speak as if he had been faithless, as well as resentful.

This, however, is not to be viewed so much in the light of an excuse for him, as of a warning to us. We may suffer greatly and grievously from the malice of men. There may be found among our foes, those whom we had befriended, who had 'eaten of our bread,' who had shared of our bounty, who had taught us to confide in their affection: And they may employ the very tokens of our confidence as the weapons of their malignity. But what is there in all this to justify us in anathematising the whole of our species, and in branding with duplicity such as have never done us wrong? We know not how many hearts may be sympathising with us in our distresses; how many voices are lifted up in prayer for our deliverance; how many hands are actively engaged in our defence. And why should a sense of injuries, however unmerited, and however great, crush in our souls that charity which would make us believe to be good in our brethren, what we do not know to be evil? Or why should the persecution of a few, or of many, sour us against the rest, and alienate our affections from all? Granting, however, that there were a countless multitude against us, why should we give way to the feelings, or why should we utter the language of disappointment and of querulousness, when we know who is for us? We 'believe in God; we believe also in Christ: Let not, therefore, our hearts be troubled; neither let them be afraid.' Instead of the discontented and unbecoming effusion which David poured forth in his haste and his forgetfulness, let us adopt the tone of triumphant confidence which animated him on another occasion, when he said, 'The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?' When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes came upon me, to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell. Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise up against me, in this will I be confident.' But, sensible how weak we are, how apt we are to be thrown off our guard, and overwhelmed by unlooked for calamities; warned of this, if not by our own experience, at least by the experience of the Psalmist, and by the teaching of the Bible, let us be vigilant against the influence of such circumstances; let us study to live in the habitual exercise of faith; let us be especially careful to call forth its energies in such trials as that which made David unmindful of his trust in the Almighty; let us be continually employed in nourishing and invigorating it, by meditations on the divine character, and the divine promises; and let us pray earnestly that, in every season of peril and of perplexity, it may be made strong by the might of heaven to overcome every foe, and to banish every fear.

Notwithstanding the sinful and uncharitable despondency into which the Psalmist had fallen, the Lord had been merciful to him, and delivered him out of all his troubles: 'set his feet in a large place, and established his goings.' And, strongly impressed by a sense of his manifold obligations, he cries out, 'what shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?' Such is the feeling which it becomes every Christian to cherish, and such is the language which it becomes every Christian to employ. Numerous are the blessings which God has conferred upon us. From the earliest moment of our existence until now, he has watched over us to do us good. How often has he rescued us from pain and danger! How often has he guided us in our difficulties, and comforted us in our sorrows! How liberally has he provided for our ever returning wants! How abundantly has he favoured our lot both with temporal mercies, and with spiritual privileges! And how undeserving have we been even of the very least of those benefits which we were daily and hourly receiving from his bountiful hand! Surely then, if gratitude be due to a benefactor, it becomes us to be grateful to the Lord our God; and if our gratitude to a benefactor should be enhanced by the generosity of the giver, and the unworthiness of the receiver, what a debt of gratitude do we owe to him whose loving-kindness to us has been equally unbounded and unmerited! Let us often think of the preserving and redeeming goodness of our Maker: let us call up every thankful emotion of which our hearts are susceptible; let every year, and let every hour, as it increases the weight of our obligations, find us more disposed to acknowledge and to fulfil them; and let it be our serious and perpetual inquiry, how we shall give the most unequivocal and most suitable expression to that gratitude, which such a rich experience of the divine beneficence should awaken in our breasts. 'What shall we render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards us?'

'I will take the cup of salvation,' says the Psalmist, 'and call upon the name of the Lord.' The Psalmist, it is probable, by 'the cup of salvation,' means the drink offerings appointed by the law in token of thankfulness for any deliverance that had been experienced; or he may refer to a custom that prevailed among the pious Jews, of the master of the house having at his private meal a cup of blessing of which he drank first, and in which his guests and family pledged him,—all uniting in the act of thanksgiving to God with which the ceremony was accompanied. Whichsoever of these interpretations be the just one, the instruction which it imparts to us is, that we should adopt every appointed and every proper method of signifying how much we owe to our heavenly father; that in the exercises of public worship and of domestic piety, as well as of private devotion, we should not fail to make mention of our debt of gratitude; that we should 'call upon the name of the Lord,' praising him for his works of mercy and of kindness, and praying to him for a mind more willing to make those returns to which he is entitled, and for ability more ample to act according to what we feel in our hearts and utter with our lips.

And especially should we be faithful to the vows that we have made in the season of distress. It too often happens that these vows are broken and forgotten. Under the pressure of affliction, and more particularly in the prospect of its terminating fatally, we are apt to form resolutions and to make promises of amendment, and to say, that if it pleases God to spare us and to deliver us, we will henceforth render him a new and a better obedience; that we will be careful to avoid the sins of our past lives, which we now see to have been sinful far beyond what we had ever conceived them in the season of health and safety; and that all who shall hereafter witness our conduct, shall behold it adorned with the fruits of sincere penitence, and holy purposes, and sanctified distresses. All this is well: but alas, how often does it all vanish like the goodness of Ephraim, which was as 'the morning cloud and the early dew that passeth away!' How often have we risen from the bed of sickness, or escaped from the jaws of death, and thought little more, or thought no more, of the contrition that we had felt, of the confessions that we had made, of the determinations that we had formed to be more watchful against temptation, and more vigorous in duty, and more abundant in faith than we had ever been before! How often have we exhibited the spectacle of employing our renovated health, our restored life, our returning prosperity, far more for the gratification of our own perverse dispositions, than for the honour and the praise of him by whom these blessings were bestowed, and to whom we solemnly covenanted them all the rest of our days! Brethren, these things ought not so to be; and let them not be so with any of us. But as we have vowed unto the Lord, let us be faithful to pay our vows. Instead of coming short of what might have been expected from all that we had felt and said in the time of trouble, let us labour if possible to go beyond it; and show in the confirmed stedfastness of our faith and in the growing purity of our deportment, not only that it was 'good for us to have been afflicted,' but that we were sincere and decided in the surrender which we then made of our future selves, and of our whole selves, to the glory of that God whose mercy we invoked, and whose mercy we experienced.

And let us do this 'now.' Delay in such a case is sinful. It is a violation of the very vow that was made; it is persevering in what we know to be wrong, and have promised to forsake. And it is foolish as well as sinful; for if we do not begin to fulfil our engagements when the circumstances which induced them are still fresh in our recollection and our feelings, how is it to be supposed that we shall afterwards be prevailed upon to begin the work, when the pains of sickness, the ills of adversity, the apprehensions of death, shall have been swallowed up in the cares, and the amusements, and the fascinations of a world which we have so deliberately allowed to regain its ascendancy? Nor is it less dangerous than it is foolish and sinful, to defer to any future day the fulfilment of our vows. The retrospect of every past year, and all which the events of that year have taught us, inculcate the momentous lesson which is recorded in our Bible, that 'now is the accepted time—that now is the day of salvation.' We know not, and we cannot know, whether our period of probation shall be lengthened; whether our present opportunities shall be repeated; whether space shall be granted us, not for carrying our purposes into full effect, but even for giving one decisive proof that they were cordial and sincere. And, therefore, our only safety lies in beginning immediately to embody our resolutions and our vows into our actual character, and to become all that we intend to be, and all that we must be, as the monuments of God's saving mercy, and as the expectants of his heavenly presence. We must 'pay our vows now in the presence of all God's people;' telling them what great things he has done for our souls and our bodies; calling upon them to join us in magnifying his holy name; and giving them to see our renewed anxiety and our improved exertions to conform to all his holy will. We must do it, 'in the courts of the Lord's house,' by a more punctual attendance on the public ordinances of his grace, and by a more devout, more fervent, more consistent engagement in all the exercises and services of the sanctuary. And we must do it, as it were, 'in the midst of Jerusalem.' We must do it before the world as well as before the church; in the presence of God's enemies as well as in the presence of all his people. We are not to make an ostentatious display of God's merciful dealings with us; nor of the gratitude which we feel to him on account of these; nor of the practical proofs by which that gratitude is evinced and perfected. But as little are we to be ashamed of these things or to conceal them from the knowledge and observation of 'them that are without.' This would neither be honourable to God, nor would it be just to our own personal feelings and consistency; nor would it be any thing towards ungodly men, but a withholding from them what, if plainly and prudently exhibited, might have the effect of subduing their opposition, and calling them to serious thought. Under the influence of all these considerations, we must pay our vows to the Lord with unaffected simplicity and undaunted boldness: believing it to be at once right and useful that none should be ignorant of the divine goodness to 'them that love him' and put their trust in him, and of that tribute of piety and righteousness, which, as he requires it, so they are ready to yield, in token of their gratitude to him who preserves 'their souls from death, their eyes from tears, and their feet from falling.'

It is a comfortable and an animating thought, that, 'precious in the sight of the Lord, is the death of his saints.' He has often permitted his people to be persecuted unto the death; and there is a host of blessed martyrs around his throne. But he gave them up to the will of their enemies that they might bear a more impressive witness to the truth, than the longest and most prosperous life could have effected; he stood by them when they were suffering for his sake, and spread a glory over their last scene, brighter and more permanent by far than what has ever accompanied the departure of the proudest and most splendid of this world's heroes; and from the scaffold or the flames, where they perished, he has wafted their spirits to the peculiar blessedness of those who 'have come through much tribulation.' And as in these cases he has loved and honoured his saints even in the midst of apparent desertion, so in all circumstances he watches over them for good. He does not needlessly allow them to be the victims of human enmity. He does not set so little value on their continuance in the world as to eye their treatment in it, or their exit from it, with indifference. While they are here, he 'keeps them as the apple of his eye,' and when they go hence, his Spirit goes with them to place them in their sainted rest, and to give them entrance into 'the joy of their Lord.' How anxious, then, should we be to consecrate to him the life which he is so careful to preserve, and the death which he is so gracious to embalm! 'Whether we live, let us live to the Lord; and whether we die, let us die to the Lord; that living or dying we may be the Lord's.'

If we are real Christians, then are we truly the 'servants' of God—his servants by our being the children 'of his handmaid,' or born and settled within the pale of his church, and inheriting its outward privileges: and his servants by his having 'loosed our bonds,' and rescued us from 'the sorrows of death and the pains of hell, which had compassed and taken hold upon us.' Let us then remember the obligations, and perform the duties of that service into which he has called us by his grace, and to which he has bound us with the chords of love. Let us walk worthy of the spiritual advantages and of the temporal benefits by which he has distinguished us. Remembering that we 'are not our own, but bought with a price,' even the precious blood of his incarnate son, let us 'glorify God in our bodies and in our spirits which are his.' And let us be animated to fidelity, and diligence, and constancy, by the assurance he has given us, that he will support us under our labours, and crown us at last with a great recompense of reward.

LECTURE XII.

'Lord, how are they increased that trouble me? many are they that rise up against me. Many there be which say of my soul, There is no help for him in God. But thou, O Lord, art a shield for me; my glory, and the lifter up of mine head. I cried unto the Lord with my voice, and he heard me out of his holy hill. I laid me down and slept; I awaked: for the Lord sustained me. I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people that have set themselves against me round about. Arise, O Lord; save me, O my God: for thou hast smitten all mine enemies upon the cheek-bone; thou hast broken the teeth of the ungodly. Salvation belongeth unto the Lord: thy blessing is upon thy people.'—PSALM iii.

David's conduct in the case of Uriah had justly provoked the divine displeasure, and God threatened to 'raise up evil against him out of his own house.' This threatening was soon executed. His son Absalom became his foe; contrived a scheme for depriving him of his crown, and of his life; prevailed upon his subjects to join him in the unnatural rebellion; and speedily reduced him to a state of extreme danger, and of deep distress. There was every thing in his situation to agitate him with alarm, or to sink him into dejection and despair. His enemies were inveterate in their hostility, and formidable by their numbers. They consisted of his own people whom he had ruled with equity, and treated with kindness and indulgence. They were headed and led on by a child on whom he doated even to weakness, and in whom he trusted as he would have trusted in himself. The object at which they aimed with determined purpose was his dethronement and his death. And so unable did he seem to defend himself from their assaults, and so inevitably devoted to destruction, that they could not refrain from saying in the language of mockery and exultation, 'There is no help for him in God.'

In these circumstances, however, David was not cast down. He could not fail indeed to experience much cutting disappointment, many painful apprehensions, numerous hardships and privations. But still he did not give way to despondency; he placed his confidence, and found his refuge in the protection of Almighty God. On that great and good Being he had hitherto relied; and he had known experimentally too much of his willingness and his ability to save, and partaken too richly of his precious promises, to suspect that he would desert him now, in the season and under the pressure of his utmost need. From all that he had been taught to believe, and from all that he had been privileged to feel respecting the ways of his Providence, he was fully persuaded that light would rise out of darkness, and order out of confusion, and safety out of peril. And in the very midst of his trials, severe and complicated as they were, and menacing as was the aspect which they assumed, he steadily addressed himself to God as his God, and stayed himself on the assurance that he would be 'a shield' to guard him from all the attacks of his adversaries; that he would be his 'glory,' his honour and his boast, amid the reproaches they were heaping upon him, and the degradation in which they were attempting to involve him; and that he would be the 'lifter up of his head,' his deliverer from those troubles by which, for a time, he was to be harassed, and his restorer to that dignity and authority of which, for a time, he was to be deprived.

Thus was it with David; and thus must it be, and thus will it be, with all who have that deep and enlightened piety by which he was distinguished. The time of affliction is the time for trying your faith and your patience, for ascertaining your possession of these virtues, for giving them a salutary exercise, for manifesting the energy and perfection which belong to them, and for enjoying the consolation which they are so well fitted to impart. And as ye all have need of them, so you have reason to be thankful that they are warranted by every view that Scripture gives you of the character and government of God, and by every one of his dealings with those who have made him their 'stronghold in the day of trouble.' Such are his attributes, such are his promises, such has been the whole course of his administration, that there is no degree of trust which you may not safely repose in him, and no degree of resignation which you may not cheerfully yield to him. It matters not what your trials and your sorrows be; your support and your solacement remain unchangeably the same. His assurances of protection and deliverance make no distinction between the greatest and the smallest evils that can enter into your lot; the infinitude of his perfections enables him to perform all that he has said respecting their mitigation, or their removal; and if there be one case, rather than another, in which he demonstrates the facility wherewith he can accomplish these ends, it is that in which the tribulations of his servants have been multiplied even to utter hopelessness. You may not be called to suffer what the Psalmist suffered; but though you were; though like him you had your hearts pierced by the disobedience and undutifulness of beloved children; though those who had been indebted to your guardianship and your beneficence had requited you with base ingratitude; though you had met with enmity where you expected nothing but friendship; though your foes, being of your own household, and of your own kindred, were increasing every day in numbers, in malignity and in power; though they had robbed you of your just dominion and your dearest rights; though they had not only laid your honour in the dust, but were seeking to deprive you of life itself, and to load your memory and your name with unmerited obloquy as the last effort of their hostility, and the last gratification of their malice; and though to these were added, every other calamity with which your mortal existence can be afflicted, what then? These are as much within the reach of God's sovereign and absolute control, as is the most inconsiderable evil that can possibly befal you; and in proportion to the burden which they lay upon you, and the anguish which they occasion you, and the dangers to which they expose you, will be his care that you be not overwhelmed and ruined by them. If he is for you, this is your comfort, that he is greater than all that can be against you. Is it requisite for you that he have goodness? His goodness prompts him to compassionate you in all your distresses, to send you the help and the relief that you need, and to visit you with 'a joy that is unspeakable.' Is it requisite for you that he have wisdom? His wisdom is such as to fathom and to defeat the most artful devices of them that seek to hurt you; to extricate you from the most perplexing difficulties in which you can be involved, and to make the most untoward circumstances and events conducive to your highest advantage. Is it requisite for you that he have power? His power is irresistible: he has only to say to the storm of persecution that rages around you, 'peace, be still,' and all its elements are hushed into silence; he has only to will it, and calumny departs from your reputation, and disease from your body, and grief from your spirit; he has only to put his everlasting arm around you, and you are beyond the reach of woe. Is it requisite for you that he give the promise of gracious and mighty interposition in your behalf? This promise is given by him explicitly and emphatically; it is repeated in every various form; it has respect to all the circumstances of your pilgrimage, to all the vicissitudes of your warfare; and it partakes of the truth and unchangeableness of the source from which it has proceeded. Is it requisite that you have a practical proof of its fulfilment? This proof is to be found in the life of every afflicted saint, from the beginning of the world to the present moment; they have had recourse to it in every hour of trial, and it has never failed them, nor disappointed them; and the Psalmist speaks the sentiment of them all, when he says as the result of his own experience, 'I will extol thee, O Lord, for thou hast lifted me up, and hast not made my foes to rejoice over me. O Lord, my God, I cried unto thee, and thou hast healed me. O Lord, thou hast brought up my soul from the grave; thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit.'

But we shall suppose your case to be still more discouraging than it has been just now represented. We shall suppose your distresses to be the result of your transgression; not merely the effect of sin, as all suffering may be justly considered, but an immediate and visible consequence of some particular demerit; a punishment inflicted upon you for certain specified iniquities, as was the case with David when he composed this Psalm; still I would exhort you not to despond or to allow you confidence in God as your God to be impaired. Just cause, indeed, would you have for despair, if having disobeyed God, and enduring a penalty for that disobedience, you yet hardened yourselves against him, and continued in a state of rebellion. In that case every evil to which you were subjected would be a token of divine vengeance, and the beginning of that more insupportable condemnation with which the finally impenitent must be overwhelmed in a future world. But your circumstances are totally different, if, like the Psalmist, you have become sensible of your guilt, and have felt contrition and self-abasement on account of it, and have cast yourselves upon God's covenanted mercy, and have returned to him with renewed affection and devotedness. Having done this, you may be satisfied that God will not give you up to destruction; that he will not permit the calamities with which you are visited to crush you; that he will not allow a single pain to harass you for one moment longer than what is requisite for the vindication of his own ways, as connected with your moral corruption on the one hand, and with the advancement of your spiritual well-being on the other. He is neither vindictive nor relentless. He has no pleasure in your sufferings or in your death; but is rather willing that you should come to him, and be forgiven, and live. He appointed his own Son to 'make peace by the blood of his cross' between you and your offended God. This end is actually accomplished in behalf of all them that believe. And looking up to him in faith as not only full of compassion, but as reconciled to you, and reconciling you to himself, and 'not imputing to you your trespasses,' you have no more to fear from his indignation. That is overpast; and, beholding you in the face of Jesus Christ, he becomes your father, your protector, and your friend. And being the objects of his redeeming love, can you suspect for a moment that he will at any time abandon you to the malice of your enemies, or leave you a prey to the difficulties and the dangers with which you have to struggle? O no; you must not, you cannot entertain such hard and unjust thoughts of 'the Lord God merciful and gracious.' Doubtless he hates sin, and can have no complacency in those who commit it. Doubtless you have provoked his displeasure by your manifold and aggravated transgressions. Doubtless the supreme and holy ruler of the universe cannot clear the guilty, without an adequate satisfaction to the demands of his righteous and violated law. But this satisfaction having been made by the obedience of your divine surety, and your interest in it secured by the instrumentality of a true and cordial faith, there is nothing to prevent the love of God from following the impulse of its own inherent energies, and sending forth upon you all the blessings that can contribute to your safety and your happiness. From the riches of his grace, and the promises of his word, he is as much pledged to do you good, as if you had never swerved from the way of his commandments. And though you cannot be exempted from the ills that are incident to fallen humanity; and though, in the course of his Providence, you may have to bear many a heavy burden and to feel many a bitter pang; and though you may have to undergo special inflictions of adversity in consequence of special aberrations from the path of duty, still the Lord is on your side; he will guard you in your most perilous hour; he will support you under the pressure of your severest trials; he will ultimately deliver you from all your sorrows; and he will overrule the very chastisements which he lays upon you for your forgetfulness of him, or your disobedience to him, as the means of bringing you nearer to himself, of elevating your Christain character, and of rendering you fitter for that world where you shall never offend him, and never be afflicted by him any more.

Amidst all his sins and all his sufferings, the Psalmist had recourse to the exercises of devotion, he retired into his secret chambers, or he went into the public sanctuary, and addressed himself to God in prayer and supplication. This he knew to be his duty, and felt to be his privilege; and he not only exemplifies the practice, but gives his testimony to the divine goodness and faithfulness towards those who observe it, when he says, 'I cried unto the Lord with my voice, and he heard me out of his holy hill.' If, indeed, we are animated with the spirit of real piety, and if we have acquainted ourselves with God, with our dependance upon him, with his ability and readiness to save us, and with the encouragement he gives us to draw near to him; then, in all situations of perplexity, and danger, and distress, we will be irresistibly carried to the throne of his grace. That will be our resort in the ordinary course of our lives, and in the ordinary events of our lot; but surely we will hasten to it, and we will dwell before it, and we will plead at it, when labouring under strong convictions of sin, or exposed to peculiar hardships and calamities. What else can we do in such circumstances; in what other way can we consult our welfare; how can we otherwise do homage to the hearer of prayer? The divine character, as unfolded in the Scripture, holds out a broad invitation to every humble and suffering worshipper; and he to whom that character belongs, has expressly said to every one of his people, 'Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.' And it is nothing more than exercising that reverence which is due to the word of truth, and yielding to that lesson which is taught us by universal experience, when we cry unto God from the depths, and cry unto him, with the settled confidence, that he will listen to our petitions, and grant us according to our heart's desire. To be successful, however, in our application, we must be careful to make it in the appointed way. The Psalmist speaks of God's hearing him 'out of his holy hill.' His holy hill was Mount Zion. There the ark of the covenant was deposited. That was the ark of God's presence; from it he was pleased to give his answers to those who sought him by prayer. And David had respect to this institution, as originating in the wisdom and authority of the Being to whom he offered up his supplications, and trusted to it for obtaining the blessings which he asked. Now, in like manner, we must look to God as seated on a throne of grace, made accessible to us by the blood of Christ. He is to be approached only by that 'new and living way' which he himself has appointed. Every petition we prefer to him must be preferred in the name of Jesus, in a dependance upon the merits of his death, and the efficacy of his intercession. If we neglect to take refuge in this ark, when the floods of divine wrath, and of temporal adversity, are sitting in upon us, most assuredly we shall perish; and all the methods of deliverance we can have recourse to will be of no avail to our salvation. But if, agreeably to God's revealed plan of mercy, we regard it as the resting place of our hopes, and seek to it with confidence in its sufficiency, as well as its necessity, to rescue us from the surrounding deluge, then the overflowing of the waters will pass by, and we shall be safe amidst the perils which sink the unbelieving and the ungodly into perdition. Relying on the atonement and righteousness of our mighty Redeemer, we may 'come with boldness to the throne of divine grace, and there implore,' with the expectation of receiving, 'mercy to pardon, and grace to help us in our times of need.' Thus crying unto the Lord, and thus praying to him in faith, he will hear us, as he heard the Psalmist, out of his holy hill. And in answer to our believing entreaties, he will impart to us support and consolation, and deliverance; so that though we be 'troubled on every side, we shall not be distressed; though perplexed, we shall not be in despair: though persecuted, we shall not be forsaken; though cast down, we shall not be destroyed.'

But while the Psalmist refers with emphasis to God's extraordinary interpositions in his behalf, when his foes increased, and his situation was full of danger, he does not forget to make mention of the divine care exercised over him in the common habitudes of his life. 'He laid him down and slept; and he awaked, for the Lord sustained him.' Habits of piety in the mind, and correct views of providence, will lead us to acknowledge our obligations to our Heavenly Father, even in our most tranquil hours, and in our least considerable mercies. It is not only when we come safe out of the ensanguined field, or escape from the dreadful shipwreck, or are raised to unexpected honours and affluence, it is not only then that we should confess a present and wonder-working God, and give praise to him for such striking manifestations of his mercy: the wonders of his mercy and his power are just as real and just as worthy of praise, in our preservation from day to day, and from hour to hour, when every thing in our condition looks so peaceful and secure, that we are apt to think, we need no protector, and have no injury to fear. 'We laid us down, and we slept; and we awoke;' but it was 'the Lord that sustained us.' It was the great 'shepherd of Israel who slumbereth not nor sleepeth' that watched over us; that allowed 'no evil to befal us, and no plague to come nigh our dwelling;' that kept our vital functions in play while we were all unconscious and utterly helpless; and that brought us in health and comfort to the light, and the duties, and the privileges of another day. How many of our fellow creatures were there who, from poverty and misfortune, had no place on which to lay their aching head, and stretch their wearied limbs, while we were blessed with the sheltering roof and the bed of repose! How many have been all night long tossing with agony, or languishing in sickness, while we have enjoyed undisturbed and refreshing sleep! How many have shut their eyes never to open them again on this world; while we have been permitted to continue in the land of living men, to rise in the full possession of all our faculties, and still to engage in our work of preparation for eternity. And is not all this to be ascribed to him who careth for us, even when we are incapable of remembering him? And does it not call for our warm and unceasing gratitude? And should it not be daily acknowledged in the language of devout and cordial thanksgiving? Yes, my friends; if we are sensible of the relation in which we stand to God as our constant preserver, and if we feel as we ought to do under the experience of his minute and mighty guardianship, we will say with the Psalmist on another occasion, 'My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord; in the morning will I direct my prayer to thee, and will look up.' 'Every day that I rise I will bless thee, and I will praise thy name for ever and ever.'

And if God is pleased to sustain us in our midnight slumbers, and give us the comforts of quiet and unbroken repose, even when the storm of adversity is raging around us, (which is probably what David here particularly alludes to,) still warmer then should be our gratitude, and still louder our song of praise. Staying ourselves upon his grace and power, and maintaining a good conscience towards him, we shall find that his loving kindness extends to all the circumstances of our lot, and neglects nothing which is conducive to our personal comfort, or our ultimate safety. And having seen what he has done for his suffering people in this respect, or, it may be, having realized it in our own case, let us give glory to him for his goodness in the time that is past, and continue to trust in him for all the time that is yet to come. 'Why should we be afraid of ten thousands of people that may set themselves against us round about?' They are as nothing when they dare to contend with the Almighty, by assaulting and persecuting his servants. He will arise and take to him his great power, and save us out of their hands, and scatter them as chaff before the wind. He is able to 'smite all our enemies upon the cheek-bone,' so that they shall no longer be capable of harassing us with those bitter reproaches, and cruel calumnies by which they have hitherto endeavoured to wound and to destroy us. He is able to 'break the teeth of the ungodly,' so that with all their rancorous hostility, and all their demonstrations of malice, they shall not have the power of inflicting upon us any severe or lasting mischief, or of carrying into effect one of all the schemes which they have laid for our ruin. He is not only able to do these things in our behalf, but he has often accomplished them in the history of his persecuted church. They are recorded 'for our learning, that we, through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, may have hope.'

This hope, then, let us cherish amidst all the vicissitudes of our life, and even in the darkest hour of tribulation. Whatever be the evils that we suffer, and whatever be the evils with which we are threatened, let this great truth be constantly remembered, and firmly believed in, that 'salvation belongeth unto the Lord.' He is mighty to save, let our enemies be as formidable, and our circumstances as desperate as they may. It is his prerogative to save; for there is salvation in none other. It is his good pleasure to save; 'judgment is his strange work,' but he takes delight in the exercise of that mercy which rescues from the pressure of calamity, and from the jaws of death. And it is his promise to save; he has assured us that he will deliver them that put their trust in him out of all their troubles, and the fulfilment of this assurance is as certain as his faithfulness is unchangeable, and his strength omnipotent. Let us only be among the number of his people, and all will be well with us; his blessing will be upon us, and his is a 'blessing which maketh rich, and addeth no sorrow.' Men may revile us, our spiritual foes may assail us, all external things may seem to be against us, and not one feature of our condition may indicate that there is any hope for us; but, being the people of God, justified by his grace, sanctified by his Spirit, and devoted to him in the affections of our hearts, and in the obedience of our lives, we shall be the objects of his tender regard; a regard which will increase in proportion to our necessities; and being blessed of God, we shall be blessed indeed. 'All things shall be ours;' whether prosperity or adversity, joy or sorrow, life or death, things present or things to come. Every coming day will find us enjoying that 'peace of God which passeth understanding,' and which depends not on the favour of men, or on the wealth of the world. And at whatever time it shall please our Heavenly Father to remove us, the blessedness which he gives upon earth will be exchanged for the blessedness which he gives in heaven; and as a gracious recompense for all our services, and a happy termination to all our sorrows, we shall enter into the regions of immortality, and into the felicity of 'the just made perfect.'

NOTICES OF RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

The Journal of two voyages along the coast of China, in 1831 and 1832; the first in a Chinese Junk; the second in the British ship Lord Amherst: with notices of Siam, Corea, and the Loo-choo Islands; and remarks on the policy, religion, &c. of China. By Charles Gutzlaff, New York: John P. Haven. 1833. Pp. 332, 12*mo.*

The title indicates the nature of this volume and will awaken in many a desire to become acquainted with its contents. The first Journal appeared sometime since in the Chinese Repository, a work published at Canton, and from thence was copied into many of the periodicals of our land. The second is now for the first time offered to the public. The author is a very remarkable man. He was born in Prussia, and received a medical education. Seven years since, he devoted himself to a Missionary life in the East. Since that time, he has been abundant in labours and sufferings, and has been very successful too in the cause of his Master. He appears to possess a zeal and faith truly apostolic. It is delightful to learn the fact, that the religious prospects of China are brightening, that her millions are accessible through the medium of Tracts and the printed Word. Armed with these weapons, a few such men as Gutzlaff would soon effect wonderful changes in the Celestial Empire.

The Bible Companion, designed for the assistance of Bible classes, families, and young students of the Scriptures, illustrated with maps and engravings. From the last London edition. Revised and adapted to the present times, with an Introduction by Stephen H. Tyng, D.D., Rector of St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia. Edward C. Mielke, 1833. Pp. 149, 18*mo.*

The increasing study of the Holy Scriptures is one of the most interesting facts the age presents. The publication of all books tending to facilitate this, ought to be cordially welcomed and sustained. The work before us is one of this description. It contains in a small space the information that is necessary to a profitable study of the Bible, and will prove peculiarly acceptable to those whose limited means and circumstances preclude the possession and study of larger works. Its chief value consists in the analysis which is presented of each book of scripture. On this subject Dr. Tyng justly remarks, "it is amazing to an unpractised student, what degree of light is thrown upon the doctrinal statements, as well as the historical references found in them, by a previous consideration of the scope and design of the work. Let one of the Epistles be taken for example. If it be taken up and read, as they often are, as an independent writing, it will be found, to a very great degree, unintelligible. References will be found which cannot be explained, and assertions to the comprehension of which there is no key. And it may be read over many times without any distinct impression being made upon the mind, or any real information having been derived from it. If the same writing be taken up again, after information has been obtained in regard to the writer, the circumstances under which it was written, the persons to whom it was addressed, the object and purpose for which it was written, it will appear like another production. Difficulties will be cleared up, dark passages will seem quite intelligible, and the epistle will give new information and light, as often as it is considered. I have seen a Bible-class astonished and delighted at the amount of knowledge in regard to one of St. Paul's epistles, which a mere reference to the circumstances contained in his history in the Acts was able to communicate. Such kind of information is here collected in a compact and convenient form, and I cannot but hope, that the publication of this work will be found a real service to the youthful readers of the Bible among our churches."

Memoir of the Rev. George Burder, author of the "Village Sermons," and Secretary of the London Missionary Society. By Henry Foster Burder, D.D. New York: Jonathan Leavitt. Boston: Crocker and Brewster, 1833. Pp. 381, 12*mo.*

The subject of this memoir was one of the most useful men of the age. He was born in London in 1752. He began his ministry among the Methodists, but did not long remain in connexion with them, at the age of twenty-six, he was ordained to the pastoral office and settled over an independent church at Lancaster. Five years afterwards he removed to Coventry. Here he laboured with great faithfulness for twenty years, when he was called to London as secretary of the Missionary Society and editor of the Evangelical Magazine. He also took the pastoral charge of the church in which he was born and baptized. Here he laboured incessantly until his death in 1832. His principal publications, beside his contributions to the Evangelical Magazine are, "Early Piety," a book for children—his "Closet Companion," "Village Sermons," "Cottage Sermons," and "Sermons for the Aged." He also published "A Series of Observations on the Pilgrim's Progress," and an abridgment of "Owen on the Spirit." His "Village Sermons" have probably had a wider circulation than any other in the language.

The life of so useful and distinguished a man cannot but be interesting. Though the volume before us does not contain much of striking incident, yet in his diary and letters there is that amiable simplicity of character, ardent piety and soundness of judgment manifested, that will richly reward the reader for a careful, and indeed repeated perusal.

Polynesian Researches, during a residence of nearly eight years in the Society and Sandwich Islands. By William Ellis. From the latest London Edition. In four volumes 12*mo. New York: J. & J. Harper,* 1833.

The first English edition of this work appeared in 1821. It has since passed through several editions, and is now for the first time offered to the American public. The author was for eight years a Missionary at Tahiti. From his daily journal, from printed and manuscript documents in the possession of the London Missionary, Society, and from the communications of various Missionaries, the materials for these volumes have been drawn. They contain a brief but satisfactory history of the origin, progress, and results of the Missionary enterprise, which, during the last thirty years, has transformed the barbarous, cruel, indolent, and idolatrous inhabitants of Tahiti, and the neighbouring islands, into a comparatively civilized, humane, industrious, and Christian people. They also comprise a record of the measures pursued by the native governments, in changing the social economy of the people, and regulating their social intercourse with foreigners, in the promulgation of a new civil code (a translation of which is given,) the establishments of courts of justice, and the introduction of trial by jury. Besides information on those points, they furnish an account of the intellectual culture, Christian experience, and general conduct of the converts; the proceeding of the Missionaries in the several departments of their duty; the administration of the ordinances of Christianity; the establishment of the first churches, with their order and discipline; the advancement of education; the introduction of arts; the improvement in morals; and the progress of civilization.

Scenes in our Parish. By a Country Parson's Daughter. First and second series. New York: Published by Harper & Brothers, 1833. Pp. 260, 12*mo.*

This will be a very popular book among the serious lovers of amusing literature. We are disposed to believe the anonymous author when she tells us that she is a country parson's daughter, and that the scenes she describes are from real life. She evinces great vivacity of mind, a fine susceptibility to the beauties of nature, a heart to feel for the sufferings of her race, and a desire to promote their highest interests. She has, too, a delicate sense of the ludicrous, and what is remarkable for one who has so much poetry about her, a goodly showing of strong common sense. Better than all, a vein of apparently sincere and genuine piety runs through the book.

She is quite too discussive in her habits, and deals too much in descriptions of flowers and natural scenery. The style is in the main, chaste and unaffected, and there are not infrequent passages of beautiful simplicity.

The author has an almost hysterical horror of "reform," and her solicitude for the fate of the establishment, and that of the world which she seems to think dependant thereon, is sometimes amusing.

Exposition of Psalm CXIX. as Illustrative of the Character and Exercises of Christian Experience. By the Rev. Charles Bridges, M. A. Vicar of Old Newton, Suffolk. First American from the sixth London edition. Philadelphia, George Latimer & Co. 1833. Pp. 360, 12*mo.*

Mr. Bridges is one of the most spiritual and popular writers of which the establishment can boast. His work on the "Christian Ministry," has been widely diffused and highly appreciated, and the exposition has passed through six editions in three years—a fact alike creditable to the author, and to the church which thus evinces an increasing demand for sound evangelical truth. The writer informs us that this Psalm was selected in consequence of its peculiar adaptation to Christian experience, that his main design in its study was to furnish his own mind with a correct standard of evangelical sincerity in the habitual scrutiny of his own heart and to assist others in that important duty. The composition of the work is diversified with as much variety as the nature of the subject will allow. The descriptive character of the book will be found to be interspersed with matter of discussion, personal address, hints for self-inquiry, and occasional supplication, with the earnest endeavour to cast the mind into that meditative, self-scrutinizing, devotional frame, in which the new creature is strengthened, and increases and goes on to perfection.

AUTHOR OF "AN EXPOSITION OF THE BOOK OF PSALMS," ETC.

PREFACE.

As the forms of infidelity are constantly changing, it becomes the duty of all good men to watch its versatile movements, and to endeavour, according to their several abilities, to counteract its subtle and pernicious influence. Standing, as we now do, in the full blaze of secular knowledge, there is the utmost danger, through the depravity of our fallen nature, of our preferring the wisdom of man to the wisdom of God; and if the advocates of revealed truth do not rush into the field of conflict with the enemies of human happiness, there is reason to fear that scepticism will obtain a partial and momentary triumph:—I say partial and momentary, for the truth of Heaven must ultimately prevail, and every power that would silence the voice of "THE LIVING ORACLES" must at last be crushed by the omnipotent energy of the Son of God. I am not afraid for the ark of the Lord; but I regard it as a solemn duty to contribute my aid, however humble, to the defence of revealed truth; and particularly to make my appeal to that portion of my fellow men who, either from mental tendency, or association in life, are peculiarly exposed to the desolating and pernicious onset of sceptical opinions.

I am aware there is nothing novel or peculiar in the treatise which I now place on the altar of the public; but I am fully satisfied that the position I have taken is sure, and that the sternest or the most insiduous infidelity has no honest argument to oppose to the conclusions I have ventured, with unhesitating confidence, to draw. I have written with the decision which becomes him who feels he has truth, and the truth of Heaven, on his side; and I beseech no man, who deigns to examine what I have said, to indulge a sneer, while conscience tells him that he should offer up a prayer to "the Father of lights" for wisdom to guide his devious course, and, above all, to rectify his wayward and erring heart.

If there be any thing requiring distinct specification in the plan of the following work, it is the order pursued in laying down the series of evidence in support of the claims of Revelation. Whether right or wrong, I have wrought my way from the interior to the outworks; and have made my first attack on the citadel of the heart, by endeavouring to point out the adaptations of Christianity to the known and admitted condition of human nature. In doing so, I flatter myself that I have pursued a simpler and more natural course than those writers upon the same important subject who have placed an almost exclusive dependence upon external evidence. At the same time, I have not dared to overlook any part of that proof which shows the Bible to be the word of God.

In the views I have ventured to express, in reference to the momentous subject of Inspiration, I am fully aware that I have exposed myself to the criticisms of some of my friends, eminent for their piety and their biblical erudition. But this I cannot help. I have gone where truth led me; and I verily believe, in the fullest sense, that the Scriptures are—The Word of God. Should any respectable individual, giving his name, do me the honour to controvert my views of verbal inspiration, I shall, if spared, endeavour to reply to his animadversions. But I will not allow myself to be dragged into the field of controversy by any one who treats this awful subject with irreverence. May all my readers be taught of God!

PART FIRST.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

"THERE IS NO FEAR OF GOD BEFORE THEIR EYES:"—Such is the concluding sentence of a description which strips fallen humanity of all its boasted excellence; which shows, by a most convincing train of reasoning, that Jews and Gentiles are alike guilty before God; and which pictures, in vivid colours, the awful depravity into which men sink without the intervention and the vital reception of the Gospel of peace. As the whole race are involved in one common apostacy, there is only one remedy that meets their case, and that remedy is Christianity. Wherever this divine catholicon is embraced, it ultimately effects the cure of man's moral distempers; it purifies his conscience from guilt, by an application of "the blood of sprinkling;" it purifies his heart by the operation of a living faith; and it purifies his life by the all-subduing influence of motives which animate him with the love of God, and with the quenchless desire of being conformed to his moral image. Wherever Christianity is rejected, man remains the victim of apostacy, the child of wrath, the sport of evil passions, and, in the truest sense, "without God, and without hope in the world." Whether we survey a state of pure heathenism,* or contemplate a condition of society in which Christianity is rejected as a fable, we behold, in either case, a soil fertile in every species of wickedness that can insult the divine Majesty, or that can degrade and brutalize the human race. Could we conceive of a community wholly made up of men denying Revelation, and wholly imbued with the principles and feelings of modern deism, we should have presented before our minds a scene of moral turpitude and guilt, too fearful to admit of minute examination. In such a community, we should see every social tie dissolved, every virtuous obligation trampled upon, and all the savage passions of the human heart brought into resistless and destructive play. In the creed of an infidel there is nothing whatever to deter him from the basest actions, provided he can screen himself from the eye of public justice, and from the scorn and derision of his fellow men. He is a man altogether without principle, who denies the legitimate distinction between virtue and vice, who resolves all human motive into a principle of self-love, and who is an equal foe to the laws of Heaven, and to the wise and benevolent institutions of men. A powerful writer, and an acute observer of mankind, has said, that "modern unbelievers are Deists in theory, Pagans in inclination, and Atheists in practice."† They profess, indeed, to believe in one supreme and uncreated Intelligence, infinitely benevolent, and infinitely holy; but they neither cultivate his benevolence, nor imitate his purity; and as it respects prayer, and praise, and the homage of devout worship, they are as scornfully neglectful of them as if there were no God, and are practically in that state of total irreligion, which shows that verily "There is no fear of God before their eyes." Though they talk loudly of one God, and profess to pay him homage in the temple of nature, it is most clear that in escaping from the folly and absurdity of the "gods many and lords many" of the heathen, they have plunged themselves into a state of reckless scepticism and doubt, which leaves every perfection of the Deity undefined, which utterly extinguishes his moral government, and which renders even the belief of his very existence a powerless and uninfluential admission.

By the aid of Revelation, indeed, they have wrought their way out of the Pantheon; but, standing in the full blaze of celestial discovery, they have set themselves to blaspheme "the only living and true God." Ungrateful return for that light which the God of mercy has shed upon their path, and which was never surely intended to heighten their guilt, or to accelerate their condemnation!

What, then, are we to understand by modern infidelity? Not surely that infidelity is a new thing; for since man lost the image of his God, he has, in all the periods of his eventful history, evinced a tendency to discredit his Maker, and even "when he knew him, not to glorify him as God." To provide, in some degree, against this tendency, and to preserve the successive revelations of Heaven from being utterly lost, the Most High selected one family as the depositaries of his truth, and as the ministers of his mercy to the rest of mankind.

It would be easy to show, by an induction of facts, that it was infidelity, in the days of old, which paved the way for the abominations of polytheism. Men first discredited and opposed the true oracles of Heaven, and then they set themselves to serve God in their own way, and to proscribe a religion and a worship for themselves; and because 'they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient; being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, back-biters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents; without understanding, covenant breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful; who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." It was such infidelity as this, my esteemed reader, which prepared the minds of mankind for all the grossness and all the absurdity of heathenism; it was such infidelity as this which obtained in Philistia, and Egypt, and Canaan; it was such infidelity as this which called forth the stupendous energy of Omnipotence, in confounding and terrifying those evil powers who contemned the name of Israel's God, and oppressed the chosen tribes; yea, it was such infidelity as this which prompted all the idolatries of the ancient church, who no sooner forgot the Lord their God, than they set themselves to worship the gods of the nations among whom they sojourned.

Infidelity is no new thing. It is a plant indigenous to the sinful heart of man; it has sprung up in every age; it has more or less prevailed in every nation under the whole face of heaven; it is the palpable exhibition of that secret and deep-rooted unbelief which is unwilling to accredit any communication as divine that does not picture the Most High as a being altogether answering to the sinful imaginings of a depraved and apostate heart.

By modern infidelity, then, we are simply to understand those new forms, and that new energy which scepticism has put on, in modern times, and more particularly since the era of the French revolution; by which it has mightily diffused itself among all ranks of society, and has produced a class of writers capable of making their appeal to each separate branch of the community. It is modern, because those who are yet in middle life can remember the baneful period when it began to exert its giant strength, and when, with a fiend-like daring, it aimed a deadly blow at the thrones of monarchs and at the altars of religion. We can remember all this, and we can trace in the bloody and impure and ruthless steps of infidelity, the hateful character which belongs to it. It is modern, for it has decked itself forth in a thousand novel aspects,—and at one time assuming the air of reason and philosophy; at another, appealing to the most vulgar prejudices of the human mind; now weaving itself into the texture of history, and then clothing itself in the maxims of political wisdom; in some instances, concealing itself beneath the witchery of a well-imagined tale; and, in others, polluting even the very streams of salvation, by infusing a portion of its deadly virulence into the theology of the age.*

It is modern, for where, at any former period in the history of the world, did a thing so worthless and abominable put on such an imposing air, and give itself forth as an angel of mercy to the afflicted race? Though it has taught men, that "adultery must be practised if we would obtain the advantages of life; that female infidelity, when known, is a small thing; and, when unknown, nothing;"† that "there is no merit or crime in intention;"‡ that "the civil law is the sole foundation of right and wrong, and that religion has no obligation but as enjoined by the magistrate;"§ that "all the morality of our actions lies in the judgment we ourselves form of them;"‖ "that lewdness," in certain cases only, "resembles thirst in a dropsy, and inactivity in a lethargy;"¶ that virtue is "only the love of ourselves;" though these are the scandalous lessons which it has unblushingly taught mankind, yet is it loudly proclaimed as the only system calculated to model and perfect humanity; as the last and only refuge for the sorrow-

* It may be fairly questioned, from the practices of all pagan countries, whether there be any people in a state of pure heathenism. Tradition seems every where to have spread some faint glimmerings of celestial light.

ing, suffering, and unhappy children of men! This it is which is to rescue them from all unworthy prejudices, which is to dissipate the mists of ages, which is to bring back the golden period of wisdom and reason, which is to convert the whole earth into a paradise, and which is to make men happy as angels under its mild and benignant sway!! There is no cant so disgusting as that of infidelity. Though most of its advocates have been libertines, though its footsteps may be traced in the blood which it has spilt, though it has trampled on all the laws of personal property and of individual right, though it pollutes and degrades wherever it touches, yet are its advocates ever and anon boasting of its sublime virtues, and its blessed achievements. One thing we may be quite sure of, that no one will listen to their vain and empty declamations till he has lost a certain portion of self-esteem, and till he wants to find an excuse for his conduct in the laxness and uncertainty of his belief. Looking at both the literary and vulgar part of modern infidels, we are constrained to say of them, in the words of the great apostle, "There is no fear of God before their eyes."

CHAPTER I.

The views which Infidels have entertained respecting the moral character of God.

God cannot be duly feared, as the proper object of religious homage, where his moral attributes and perfections are lost sight of. If we disconnect his wisdom and power from his holiness and goodness and justice, it is impossible to conceive of him with reverence, or to think of him with complacency. In the Christian Scriptures, God's natural attributes are invariably represented as the ministers of his benevolence, integrity, and faithfulness. They declare him to be "a God of truth, and without iniquity; just and right" in all his ways. They proclaim him to be "the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and in truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin, and yet by no means clearing the guilty." They describe him as "of purer eyes than to behold evil," and tell us that "he cannot look upon iniquity." They exhibit him as "righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works." They teach us, that he is "not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness, neither shall evil dwell with him." Such is the God of Revelation; a Being infinitely wise and powerful indeed, but one, at the same time, "glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, and ever doing wonders;" a Being before whom the highest orders of created intelligences prostrate themselves and exclaim, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory."

How unlike are these descriptions of the eternal and immutable God, to the vague, contradictory, and even wicked representations of infidelity. "We cannot," says Lord Bolingbroke, "ascribe goodness and justice to God, according to our ideas of them, nor argue with any certainty about them;" and again, "it is absurd to deduce moral obligations from the moral attributes of God, or to pretend to imitate him in those attributes." The language held by Bolingbroke is common to the infidel school. The entire moral character of God is overlooked by them, unless when they talk of his mercy, which they always do in a manner totally inconsistent with the existence of any such thing as a moral government. Mercy displayed at the awful risk of prostrating the claims of immutable holiness, can only be another name for injustice; and can therefore have no affinity to that infinitely benevolent Being who, in all the distributions both of his goodness and mercy, acts in a manner worthy of himself, the source and pattern of all the rectitude and purity which exist throughout the universe.

"The object," says a distinguished author, "of the Christian adoration is Jehovah, the God of Israel; whose character for holiness, justice, and goodness, is displayed in the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, in a more affecting light than by any of the preceding dispensations. But who or what is the god of deists? It is true they have been shamed out of the polytheism of the heathens. They have reduced their thirty thousand deities into one, but what is his character? What attributes do they ascribe to him? For any thing that appears in their writings, he is as far from the holy, the just, and the good, as those of their heathen predecessors. They enjoy a pleasure, it is allowed, in contemplating the productions of wisdom and power; but as to holiness, it is foreign from their inquiries: a holy God does not appear to be suited to their wishes."*

After tracing the conflicting views of modern infidels, in reference to the proper standard of morality, the same powerful writer adds,—"It is worthy of notice that, amidst all the discordance of these writers, they agree in excluding the Divine Being from their theory of morals. They think after their manner; but 'God is not in all their thoughts.' In comparing the Christian doctrine of morality, the sum of which is love, with their atheistical jargon, one seems to hear the voice of the Almighty, saying, 'who is this that darkeneth counsel with words without knowledge? Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole of man.'"†

CHAPTER II.

Though Infidels profess to hold the doctrine of the Divine Existence, yet they refuse or neglect all religious worship.

In this feature of their character, they are more inconsistent, and more irreligious too, than even pagan idolators themselves, who evince great zeal and make many sacrifices in the service of their dumb idols. One would imagine, that if there be one great first cause, the Creator and upholder of all things, the benignant source of all the happiness which creatures in any part of the universe enjoy; one would imagine, I say, that if such a Being exists, he is entitled to the devout and spiritual worship of all his intelligent creatures. Such is the dictate even of unassisted reason, as has been demonstrated by a reference to the rudest and most brutalized portions of the human race. How astounding then is the fact, that only in Christian countries can men be found denying the validity of stated worship to the Deity; as if the only use to be made of Revelation were to employ it for the horrid purpose of obliterating all our natural feelings of reverence for his awful perfections! In the inspired volume we learn that "God is a spirit, and that they who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." This supposes the duty of worship, and prescribes the qualities by which it is to be distinguished. The language of those who know the divine character, and who possess a right spirit, will ever be, "O come, let us sing unto the Lord; let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation. Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto him with psalms. For the Lord is a great God, and a great King above all gods. O come, let us worship and bow down, let us kneel before the Lord our Maker; for he is our God, and we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand." Men may boast as they please of their belief in one God, but if they do him no actual homage, if they have no stated seasons and places of devotion, they are in a far worse condition than were those benighted Athenians, whom Paul beheld prostrate at an altar dedicated to "the unknown God." It is the temper, the disposition of infidelity, no less than its preposterous creed, which distances it from the spirit of true worship. Devotion cannot grow in a soil on which the inexpressible levity of scepticism has cast its withering blight. Religious awe cannot be felt in a mind that has no sensible hold of God's moral perfections. Love to God, drawing the soul forth in repeated and habitual acts of grateful adoration, cannot dwell in a heart where worldly lusts and enmity against the moral government of the Most High are struggling for the mastery.

The very same thing which led men of old to forsake the worship of the only living and true God, and to betake themselves to the abominations of idolatry, is that which banishes from every circle of infidels everything like the semblance of religious homage to the Deity. Is it demanded what this said thing is? I reply, in the language of the Apostle, "they did not like to retain God in their knowledge." They lost all delight in his holy character, and hence they sought relief for their guilty feelings in the exercise of a religion which corresponded with the dictates of their own impure hearts.

Deists are placed somewhat peculiarly. As they are found only where Revelation has either completely banished the grossness of idolatry, or where, at least, it has shed its benignant rays, they cannot for shame revel in the impurities of heathenism; but as they take no delight whatever in the character of that one God whom they profess to adore, they live in the habitual and avowed neglect of his worship. The ancestors of paganism forsook his worship, "because they did not like to retain him in their thoughts;" and for the same reason precisely infidelity has no temple, no altar, no sacrifice, no avowed, habitual, and well-defined worship to that glorious Being, from the near contemplation of whose character it shrinks with instinctive dislike and dread.

Could we see infidelity cultivating the spirit of prayer, laying aside its extreme and disgusting levity, and evincing an anxiety to arrive at the true knowledge of God, we should begin to hope on behalf of its unhappy victims; but reckless as its advocates are of all devotion, and leaning as they do to their own understanding, and evincing an utter contempt for every thing sacred, we are compelled to look on them as in a condition peculiarly hopeless, and must say respecting them "There is no fear of God before their eyes."

CHAPTER III.

A brief survey of the character of that morality which Infidelity inculcates and displays.

All who read the Bible attentively, whatever they may think of its divine origin, must be struck with the perfection of its moral precepts, and especially with the sublime and cogent reasons which it assigns for the performance of every duty which we owe both to God and man.*

That monster of wickedness, Thomas Paine, whom no man that ever knew could trust, has said respecting the Bible—"I feel for the honour of my Creator in having such a book called after his name." He must surely have meant, that he felt for himself, when he discovered in the Bible, if he ever read it, such an array of holy and benevolent precepts upon which it had been his habitual practice, during a long life, to trample with proud disdain!

The morality of the Bible is not the morality of mere decorum, the garnishing of the outward man, the "making clean the outside of the cup and platter;" it is the morality of principle; it is the morality of right dispositions; it is the morality of love to God and love to man. Infidelity says, "there is no merit or crime in intention;" but Christianity says, that hatred is murder, that secret lust is adultery, and that we must "love the Lord our God with all our heart, and strength, and mind, and our neighbour as ourselves." It prohibits the resentment of injuries, and urges the forgiveness of enemies. It tells us "to weep with them that that weep, and rejoice with them that rejoice." It enforces every relative duty by an appeal to motives equally tender and sublime, and it demands a personal sanctity of manners, which admits of no reserve, and leaves room for the indulgence of no single habit of transgression.

If infidelity were from above, it would bear the marks of its celestial origin. God must be holy; and a religion suited to his intelligent creatures ought to carry with it some resemblance to his moral nature. Infidelity has no such resemblance in either theory or practice. In theory it is an apology for almost every crime that disgraces human nature; and in the different codes of its advocates, every species of transgression is either defended or palliated. And what it is in theory, it is yet more abundantly in practice. Its leading characters have been worthless beyond expression. What were Herbert, and Hobbes, and Shaftesbury, and Woolston, and Tindal, and Bolingbroke, but so many notorious hypocrites, who, for a piece of paltry self-interest, professed to love and reverence Christianity, while they were all the while insidiously endeavouring to lower its credit in the world? In the long and gloomy catalogue of human delinquents, where shall we find two miscreants such as Rochester and Wharton? They were indeed a reproach to our common nature. Morgan's dishonest quotation of Scripture to serve a purpose, and his miserable cant in professing himself to be a Christian, notwithstanding his amazing zeal to subvert all the peculiarities of revealed religion, speak volumes as to his notions of morality. Hume, the most dishonest and prejudiced of all historians,* died as a fool dieth, cracking vulgar jokes with some of his unhappy companions.† Voltaire so little regarded truth, that, in speaking in his "Ignorant Philosopher" of the tolerative spirit of the ancient Romans, he observes, "they never persecuted a single philosopher for his opinions from the time of Romulus till the popes got possession of their power." In this passage a veil is drawn over the massacre of thousands and tens of thousands of unoffending Christians. In like manner, this boasted friend of liberty and reason, when he describes the expatriation, or cruel death of one million of French Protestants, speaks of them as "weak and obstinate men." As these Protestants, not being infidels, were stripped of all claim to philosophy, we suppose it was a small matter to murder such vulgar persons in cold blood! We find this same champion of infidelity requesting his friend D'Alembert to tell for him a direct lie, by denying that he was the author of the "Philosophical Dictionary." His friend told the lie for him; and he has himself well described his own character in the following words:—"Monsieur Abbé, I must be read, no matter whether I am believed or not." Voltaire, after all his infidelity, being threatened by the authorities, died a Catholic.

Rousseau was profligate and immoral from his youth up. "I have been a rogue," says he, "and am so still sometimes, for trifles which I had rather take than ask for." He abjured Protestantism and became Catholic; "for which," says he, "in return, I was to receive subsistence; but," he adds, "from this interested conversion, nothing remained but the remembrance of my having been both a dupe and an apostate." After this, settling at Geneva, and finding that there he was denied the rights of Christian citizens, he renounced popery and conformed to the religion of the state. The life of this wretched man was one continued and uninterrupted scene of hypocrisy, fornication, seduction, base intrigue, and, withal, constant violation of the rules of honesty. What he said of one of the events of horror which marked his career may be applied, with too much truth, to his whole history—"Guilty without remorse, I soon became so without measure."

CHAPTER IV.

The practical effects of Infidelity.

It is no wonder surely that such a race of men should have prepared the minds of their disciples for deeds of unusual atrocity. In a neighbouring country, a fit theatre presented itself for the exhibition of infidelity in its own native colours. There gross superstition on the one hand, and arbitrary government on the other, led thousands virtuously to sigh for national deliverance. With loud professions of love of liberty and self-devoted patriotism, infidelity rushed into the field of conflict; but though she professed to be an angel of mercy, she soon proved herself to be but a fiend of perdition. There was no deed of horror which she did not perpetrate. Within her destructive sphere life and property ceased to have any value attached to them. The most virtuous citizens fell victims to her insatiable cruelty. Personal aggrandizement became the sole object of her ambition; and, under the fair pretence of philosophy, of enlightened policy, and of regard to the public weal, a whole nation was laid in ruins, every public institution was plundered, the state was sunk in anarchy and confusion, deeds of blood too shocking to describe were perpetrated, and the church herself, already sufficiently degraded, was made the organ of propagating blasphemies the most hideous against the God of heaven. "Infi-

* How can the guardians of the rising generation still leave them to the guidance of such a sycophant in politics, and such a sceptic in religion?

† "Nothing but the most frivolous dissipation of thought can make even the inconsiderate forget the supreme importance of every thing which relates to the expectation of a future existence. Whilst the infidel mocks at the superstitions of the vulgar, insults over their credulous fears, their childish errors, or fantastic rites, it does not occur to him to observe that the most preposterous device by which the weakest devotee ever believed he was securing the happiness of a future life, is more rational than unconcern about it. Upon this subject, nothing is so absurd as indifference; no folly so contemptible as thoughtlessness and levity."—See a work entitled "The Nature of the Proof of the Christian Religion, &c." by D. B. Baker, A. M., p. 42 delity," observes a spirited and able chronicler of these events, "having got possession of the power of the state, every nerve was exerted to efface from the mind all ideas of religion and morality. The doctrine of the immortality of the soul, or a future state of rewards and punishments, so essential to the preservation of order in society, and to the prevention of crimes, was publicly ridiculed, and the people were taught to believe that death was an everlasting sleep.

"They ordered the words 'Temple of Reason' to be inscribed on the churches, in contempt of the doctrine of revelation. Atheistical and licentious homilies were published in the churches, instead of the old service; and a ludicrous imitation of the Greek mythology exhibited under the title of 'The Religion of Reason.' Nay, they went so far as to dress up, with the most fantastic decorations, a common strumpet, whom they blasphemously styled 'The Goddess of Reason,' and who was carried to church on the shoulders of some jacobins selected for the purpose, escorted by the national guards and the constituted authorities. When they got to the church, the strumpet was placed on the altar erected for the purpose, and harangued the people, who, in return, professed the deepest adoration of her, and sung the Carmagnole and other songs by way of worshipping her. This horrid scene; almost too horrible to relate; was concluded by burning the prayer-book, confessional, and every thing appropriated to the use of public worship; numbers, in the mean time, danced round the flames with every appearance of frantic and infernal mirth." I might also notice the fiend-like malignity which was directed against the institution of the Sabbath, during the reign of terror in France, as if the sole design of that desperate faction was not only to efface all reverence for the Deity from the public mind, but also to destroy every memorial of an intelligent creature's obligation to him, and every symbol of the existence of a moral government.

Let revolutionary and infidel France teach mankind, by one great and effective lesson, what the enemies of Revelation can do to heighten the standard of national morals, and to render inviolable the persons and properties of men. With the page of their own infamous history before them, let sceptics of every school blush to talk of the benefits which their system is fitted to confer on the human race. And let them remember, that the grand reason why the prevalence of their principles has ever issued in the disruption of every social and moral tie, has been because there was "no fear of God before their eyes."

CHAPTER V.

*A contrasted view of Infidelity and Christianity.

From such scenes as these, how delightful to turn to the pure, and mild, and benignant genius of Christianity! Were her golden rule, "as ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them" the universal law of all the families and nations under heaven, how would it change the face of society! how would it stem the torrent of pride, ambition, and vain glory! how would it cause wars, and rumours of wars, to cease to the very ends of the earth! how would it unite the whole family of man in one common bond of brotherhood! how would it banish injustice, cruelty, oppression, and licentiousness from the earth! In proportion as Christian principles have triumphed, in that same proportion immorality has disappeared, and all social virtues have been practised; and when it is universal, which we are assured it will be, it will bring moral health along with it to all the dwellers upon earth.

"Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity," said the immortal Washington, "religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labour to subvert the great pillars of human happiness, those firmest props of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connexions with private and public felicity. Let it be simply asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in the courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of a peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle."*

In a happier age, fast approaching, Christianity will dictate rules of right government; it will establish equitable principles of national commerce; it will teach kings and senates how to rule in wisdom and love; it will remove the great barriers to national tranquillity and national prosperity out of the way, by constituting the "people all righteous," and setting up the authority of God as the best possible support of laws which accord with his word.

Infidelity can dream of no such renovation. Its past steps may be traced in blood and anarchy; and the prospect which stretches before it is scarcely less appalling. It has no link whereby to bind man to man, because it severs man from his Maker. It is essentially heartless and cruel. It rules without God, and would exclude him from his own world, and nothing awaits it but the exposure and infamy which must sooner or later overtake all systems of evil.

---

* The Bishop of Calcutta, in his twenty-second lecture on the "Evidences of Christianity," has finely contrasted the character of Voltaire with that of the Hon. Robert Boyle. "Now contrast," says he, "with this character, any of the eminent Christians that adorned their own country and Europe about the same period. Take the Hon. ROBERT BOYLE, of whom it is difficult to say whether his piety, as a Christian, or his fame, as a philosopher, was most remarkable. Consider the compass of his mind, the solidity of his judgment, the fertility of his pen, the purity of his morals, the amiableness of his temper, his benificence to the poor and distressed, his uniform friendships, his conscientious aim at truth in all his pursuits and determinations. At an early age he examined the question of the Christian religion to the bottom, on occasion of some distracting doubts which assaulted his mind. Confirmed in the truth of Christianity, his whole life was a comment on his sincerity. He was admitted to certain secret meetings before he had reached mature years—but they were graced and enlightened associations—for canvassing subjects of natural philosophy, at a time when the civil wars suspended all academical studies, and they led to the formation of one of the noblest establishments of his country.* His disinterestedness and humility were such that he refused the provostship of Eton, and the honours of a peerage, that he might devote his talents and time and noble fortune to works of public utility and benevolence. His uniform regard to truth made him the example and admiration of his age. His tenderness of conscience led him to decline the most honourable office† in the scientific world, because he doubted about the oaths prescribed, and his reverence for the glorious Creator induced him to pause whenever he pronounced his name. From such a student we may expect the truth. From such a philosopher we receive, with unmixed pleasure, 'A Treatise of the high veneration which men's intellect owes to God;'* or a discourse 'On greatness of mind promoted by Christianity.' "†

The same excellent author furnishes the following admirable contrasts:—

"Contrast, in point of mere benevolence, the lives and deportment of such an infidel as Rousseau, and such a Christian as Doddridge; the one all pride, selfishness, fury, caprice, rage, gross sensuality—casting about firebrands and death—professing no rule of morals but his feelings, abusing the finest powers to the dissemination, not merely of objections against Christianity, but of the most licentious and profligate principles;—Doddridge all purity, mildness, meekness, and love, ardent in his good will to man, the friend and counsellor of the sorrowful; regular, calm, consistent; dispensing peace and truth by his labours and by his writings; living, not for himself, but for the common good, to which he sacrificed his health and even life.

"Or contrast such a man as Volney with Swartze. They both visit distant lands,—they are active and indefatigable in their pursuits,—they acquire celebrity, and communicate respectively a certain impulse to their widened circles; but the one, jaundiced by infidelity, the sport of passion and caprice, lost to all argument and right feeling, comes home to diffuse the poison of unbelief, to be a misery to himself, the plague and disturber of his country, the dark calumniator of the Christian faith. The other remains far from his native land to preach the peaceful doctrine of the gospel on the shores of India; he becomes the friend and brother of those whom he had never seen, and only heard of as fellow-creatures,—he diffuses blessings for half a century,—he insures the admiration of the heathen prince near whom he resides,—he becomes the mediator between contending tribes and nations,—he establishes a reputation for purity, integrity, disinterestedness, meekness, which compel all around to respect and love him,—he forms churches,—he instructs children,—he disperses the seeds of charity and truth,—he is the model of all the virtues he enjoins."

* Washington's Farewell Address to the people of the United States.

O, what a world were this if all men were infidels! Then, indeed, would they soon destroy themselves. Their vices would be such as to annihilate all the social sympathies, and to cause the various elements of society to rush together in wild confusion and ruin.

What cause of congratulation is it, that infidelity, in its more direct forms, has so little power in this country to mould our national institutions! No one who marks the zeal and malignity of our infidel press, can doubt, for a moment, what would be the fate of every honest and virtuous family, if infidels could, by any means, acquire ascendancy. There is a great deal of secret and avowed infidelity in the land; but, blessed be God, our property, our domestic peace, our national security are not as yet menaced by the impugners of Revelation.

It is at the same time a mournful consideration, that so many of the labouring classes of the community are vitiated by the wretched dogmas of this school. It is a distinct characteristic of modern infidelity, that it aims to subvert the hopes of the poor. The writings of Mr. Paine, combined with other circumstances, have led to this feature in its malignant history. The libertinism of sceptics, till of late years, was regarded as the exclusive privilege of the educated, the intellectual, and the distinguished portion of mankind. Now it is far otherwise; the pestilence has spread itself, and operatives, in every department of trade, are plied by the apostles of infidelity, who, not content with destroying the poor man's hopes of immortality, set themselves to lower all his notions of moral obligation, to vitiate all his social habits, to foster in him the spirit of rebellion against all constituted authority, and thus, as it were, to deck their victim for the day of sacrifice. I firmly believe that in London alone, to say nothing of other large populations, there are thousands and tens of thousands lost to industry, to health, to reputation, and to peace, outcasts from society, and terrors to the community, who might trace the utter wreck of their characters to their association with companions of infidel sentiments, and to their familiarity with the infidel press. It has been my lot as a Christian minister, more than once, to confirm these affecting statements by the unequivocal avowals of infidels themselves, in the last periods of human existence, and also by witnessing in some, once promising characters, the baneful effects arising from the adoption of infidel opinions.

CHAPTER VI.

An affectionate appeal to those who have been entangled in the snares of Infidelity.

When I reflect how many there are whose faith in Christianity has been shaken, and whose minds have fallen a prey to the wiles of scepticism; and, moreover, when I call to remembrance that so many of the young and promising rank among the victims of this moral contagion, I cannot but feel an earnest desire to become an instrument of good to a portion of my fellow-creatures, at once so interesting and so much exposed. O that God would strengthen me to speak a word to unhappy and deluded sceptics! With all the zeal for their salvation that I can possibly give utterance to, would I make my appeal to their judgments and consciences. Let me bespeak their candour. I am conscious of no motive but a desire to honour God, and to save their souls. Regarding them as the victims of fatal error, I am devoutly anxious to see them extricated from it. Their creed I hold to be alike gloomy and pernicious, and I would show them a more excellent way, and would introduce them, with a bounding heart, into the light and liberty of Christianity.

What, then, let me ask, has led you to reject Christianity? Have you carefully examined it, and found its evidence defective? If so, where does the difficulty press? If you are really perplexed, ask counsel of some enlightened Christian, and he will readily aid you in disposing of the doubts and misgivings of a mind really sincere. I believe a doubting man may be sincere. There are many volumes suited to your state, and which you might read with the greatest possible advantage. Let me particularly recommend to your attentive perusal "The Gospel its own Witness," by the late Rev. Andrew Fuller; "The Evidences of Christianity," by Dr. Paley; "A Short Method with Deists," by Leslie; Dr. Chalmers' works on "The Christian Revelation," and a work entitled "A Treatise on the Nature and Causes of Doubt in Religious Questions."

But let me deal honestly with you, as your friend. Have you all this supposed difficulty about the evidence and the truth of Christianity? Or is your hesitancy of a very different order? Do you feel a repugnance to the holy requirements of Christianity, and a consequent dread of the judgments which it threatens? And does this prompt in you the baneful wish, "O that it might not be true?" Remember what Rochester said—"A bad life is the only grand objection to this book;" laying his hand emphatically on the Bible. Has not this been very much the case with you? You have fallen into sinful courses—you have yielded to the ways of the world—you have gone with a multitude to do evil—you have forsaken your better fellowships—you have learnt to spend your Sabbaths in pleasure, and you have gradually become more and more careless. In this state you have been very unhappy at times; you have thought, well, "what if, after all, the Bible be true! What if, after all, the wicked shall be turned into hell!" At this juncture, some one further advanced in scepticism than yourself has aided you in shaking off the galling yoke of conscience. He has put some infidel publication into your hand; you have read it; it has fallen in with your previous wishes and habits; you have said, "This is the very thing I wanted;" and you have, at last, learned to revile the Bible, to set light by its hopes, and to talk slanderously of its professors.

Come now, my friend, and let us reason together. Look back on the process. Why did you so readily drink in the poison contained in the infidel volume? Why? because you were in a state of mind very much the opposite of that which the Bible demands. But what have you found, my friend, in the regions of scepticism? You have relinquished the hopes of Christianity, by Christ Jesus. What have you obtained in their place? Amidst all your acquirements, have you found peace of mind? Will your present character and your present religion sustain you in a dying hour? Multitudes of infidels have found their creed, at death, insufficient to meet the awful catastrophe. Not a single instance can be produced, in which a believer in Revelation was terrified or dismayed because he had been a Christian. Many have been distressed on account of the defective evidence of their Christianity, but none on account of their being Christians. Does it never occur to you, that if Christianity be true, you are undone?—that if it be false, he who believes it can suffer no injury?* Who, let me ask you, are your companions? What are your pursuits? and what your hopes? I deeply feel for you, while I greatly blame you. You may have been inadequately instructed; you may have seen bad examples; you may have witnessed great inconsistencies in some of the professors of religion. Granting, however, that all this may have been the case, still the interests of the soul are a personal concern. No man can stand in your place when you die. I beseech you, then, to arouse yourself from that lethargy into which sin and unbelief, acting and reacting, have conjointly sunk you.

Ask yourself this question, "What makes me a sceptic? Is it because I have examined for myself, and know the Gospel to be a fable? or is it because that I desire it may be one?" And why should you desire this? If Christianity does not meet your case, no other system can. Infidelity has not met your case; it has not awakened hope; it has not allayed despair; it has not ministered peace. No: it has only stupified a conscience which must yet awake; it has only taught you to put the evil day far away; it has only blinded you for a time to the dread prospects of a future and impending eternity.

Why, I ask again, should you wish that Christianity may not be true? Is it because you feel yourself guilty, and shrink from the condemnation which it threatens? Well might you thus shrink if it did not reveal a remedy, as well as disclose a disease and point out its consequences. You are guilty—yea, ten thousand times more guilty than you ever imagined yourself to be; but what I maintain is, that if you turn away the eye of faith from that great sacrifice which Christianity

---

* "Indisputably," said Lord Byron, in a letter sent by him to the late Mrs. Sheppard, "the firm believers in the Gospel have a great advantage over all others, for this simple reason—that if true, they will have their reward hereafter; and if there be no hereafter, they can be but with the infidel in his eternal sleep, having had the assistance of an exalted hope through life, without subsequent disappointment, since (at the worst, for them) 'out of nothing, nothing can arise,'—not even sorrow."

reveals, you must sink for ever beneath the pressure of your guilt, and with this superadded horror, that you perished at the threshold of mercy.

Is it because you do not love the pure and holy demands of Christianity, that you turn away from it? Well, but is not this, its pure character, the proof of its celestial origin? and if so, will it avail you to reject it? Will the holy life it requires be less obligatory because you determine not to pursue it? Will the great Judge excuse you at last because you loved your sins more than his revealed will?

Besides, what is to root out unholy inclinations, to correct depraved habits, to superinduce devotion, and to raise the soul to God? Is it not divine meditation on the blessed word? Here is that consecrated fountain which, by the grace of God, shall quench your thirst of sin. Here you may read of "the new heart" till you know by experience what it is. Here is a divine Deliverer, whose "name is called Jesus, because he saves his people from their sins." Here is a divine Sanctifier, who can "create within you a clean heart, and renew within you a right spirit." One word more, and I have done. Ask God to teach you. Ask him, if the Bible be from him, to enable you to come to the belief of it. Ask him to remove your blindness, to allay your prejudices, and, above all, to prevent any sinful habit from giving a bias to your decision. Make no delay in this work. If you die a stranger to the hopes of Christianity, it had been better for you that you had never been born!

PART SECOND.

THE TRUTH AND EXCELLENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

CHAPTER I.

The comparative credit due to the conclusions of Sceptics and Christians.

"For we have not believed cunningly devised fables."

Such, at least, is the Christian's estimate of the stability of his own hopes; and such is the settled conviction of every sincere friend of revealed truth. When the moral character and habits of those who profess their belief in Christianity is taken into account, there can be no hesitation in admitting that they are strictly honest in the avowal of their faith, and that they do not affect to repose on the truth of a system which, after all, they secretly disbelieve. That there are many false pretenders to the faith of Christ is readily conceded; but after the names of all such have been struck off from the list of its genuine friends, there will yet remain a multitude of honest men, far above all suspicion, who, in life, and at death, have professed their sincere and heart-felt belief in the religion of Jesus of Nazareth. To impugn their integrity, as men of veracity, would be alike absurd and unjust. They are, beyond doubt, entitled to all credit for sincerity, when, with the Bible in their hands, they exclaim, "We have not followed cunningly devised fables."

The great question then is, are they mistaken in the estimate which they have formed of the Bible? Are they under the influence of a delusion, though they fondly believe that they have embraced the truth of God? In deciding such inquiries as these, several considerations naturally occur to the mind, irrespective even of the direct evidences of the Christian revelation.

What, then, has been the amount of intellectual qualification possessed by Christians for investigating the truth or falsehood of their hopes? It may be true, indeed, that the mass of those who have embraced the gospel have been little elevated, in point of mind, above any other equal portion of the human race; although it cannot be denied, that in Christian countries the common people are much superior to their fellows in heathen lands. But be this as it may, can any one affirm that among the list of Christian advocates there are not to be found multitudes of men in the highest degree qualified to decide upon any question of evidence submitted to their notice? Will it be pretended that imbecility of intellect produced the faith of such men as Sir Isaac Newton, John Locke, Sir Matthew Hale, the Hon. Robert Boyle, Bishop Butler, Dr. Watts, Mr. Wilberforce, Dr. Paley, Dr. Beattie, Dr. Chalmers, and Robert Hall? Such a pretence, on the part of any infidel, would be equally fatal to his sense and candour. In grasp of mind, in depth of erudition, in diversity and extent of science, the pledged advocates of the gospel have had no rivals in the republic of letters, or in the ranks of scepticism.* All who know any thing of the state of facts, must concede this point, that the sublimest exercise of reason is not incompatible with the most profound deference to the truth and excellence of Revelation. It is easy for some infidel demagogue to vaunt himself of his great wisdom and learning before an ignorant and vicious assembly; but let the entire

* The following eloquent passage, from a speech of the late Lord Erskine, delivered by him in the Court of King's Bench, on occasion of a prosecution for the publication of Paine's "Age of Reason," may not be unacceptable, as tending to illustrate the position, that superiority of intellect has been enlisted on the side of Christianity:—

"'It seems, gentlemen,' said his lordship, 'this is an age of reason;' and the time and the person are at last arrived, that are to dissipate the errors which have overspread the past generation of ignorance. The believers in Christianity are many, but it belongs to the few that are wise to correct their credulity.' Belief is an act of reason, and superior reason may, therefore, dictate to the weak.

"In running the mind along the list of sincere and devout Christians, I cannot help lamenting that Newton had not lived to this day, to have had his shallowness filled up with the new flood of light.

"But the subject is too awful for irony; I will speak plainly and directly. Newton was a Christian!—Newton, whose mind burst forth from the fetters cast by Nature upon our finite conceptions. Newton! whose science was truth, and the foundation of whose knowledge of it was philosophy; not those visionary and arrogant presumptions which too often usurp its name, but philosophy, resting upon the basis of mathematics, which, like figures, cannot lie. Newton, who carried the line and rule to the utmost barriers of the creation, and explored the principles by which, no doubt, all created matter is held together and exists.

"But this extraordinary man, in the mighty reach of his mind, overlooked, perhaps, the errors which a minuter investigation of the created things on this earth might have taught him of the essence of his Creator.

"What, then, shall be said of the great Mr. Boyle, who looked into the organic structure of all matter, even to the brute inanimate substances which the foot treads on? Such a man may be supposed to have been equally qualified with Mr. Paine to 'look through Nature, up to Nature's God.' Yet, the result of all his contemplation was, the most confirmed and devout belief of all which the other held in contempt, as despicable and drivelling superstition.

"But this error might, perhaps, arise from a want of due attention to the foundations of human judgment, and the structure of that understanding which God has given us for the investigation of truth.

"Let that question be answered by Mr. Locke, who was, to the highest pitch of devotion and adoration, a Christian. Mr. Locke, whose office was to detect the errors of thinking, by going up to the fountains of thought, and to direct into the proper track of reasoning the devious mind of man, by showing him its whole process, from the first perceptions of sense to the last conclusions of ratiocination; putting a rein, besides, upon false opinion, by practical rules for the conduct of human judgment.

"But these men were only deep thinkers, and lived in their closets, unaccustomed to the traffic of the world, and to the laws which practically regulate mankind!

"Gentlemen! in the place where we now sit to administer the justice of this great country, above a century ago, the never-to-be-forgotten Sir Matthew Hale presided,—whose faith in Christianity is an exalted commentary upon its truth and reason, and whose life was a glorious example of its fruits in man,—administering human justice, with a wisdom and purity drawn from the pure fountain of the Christian dispensation, which has been, and will be in all ages, a subject of the highest reverence and admiration.

"But it is said by the author, that the Christian fable is but the tale of the more ancient superstitions of the world, and may easily be detected by a proper understanding of the mythologies of the heathen.

"Did Milton understand those mythologies? was he less versed than Mr. Paine in the superstitions of the world? No! they were the subject of his immortal song; and though shut out from all recurrence to them, he poured them forth from the stores of memory, rich with all that man ever knew, and laid them in their order, as the illustration of that exalted faith, the unquestionable source of that fervid genius, which cast a shade upon all the other works of man. The mysterious incarnation of our blessed Saviour (which this work blasphemes in words so wholly unfit for the mouth of a Christian, or for the ear of a court of justice, that I dare not, and will not, give them utterance), Milton made the grand conclusion of the "Paradise Lost,"—the rest from his finished labours,—and the ultimate hope, expectation, and glory of the world.

"'A virgin is His mother, but His sire
The Power of the Most High; he shall ascend
The throne hereditary, and bound his reign
With earth's wide bounds, His glory with the heaven.'" history of the Christian era be appealed to as the proof, that the choicest spirits in each age, since the days of the apostles, have been the professed adherents of the gospel. Christianity, then, has not been subjected to the humiliation of being only embraced by the weak and ignorant of mankind; it has called forth the plaudits of the greatest men that ever lived, and has done more by its own simple energy to augment the genius and to multiply the acquirements of the race, than all other systems of religion and other causes combined.*

But I ask again, what have been the moral qualifications possessed by Christians to enable them to decide upon the validity of their own hopes? Have they been men, in general, whose perceptions have been blunted and vitiated by an irregular and profligate life? or has not the very reverse of this been the case? If two persons of equal intellect, but of extremely different moral habits, the one devout, consistent, benevolent; and the other proud, self-important, devoted to pleasure, should set themselves to ascertain the truth or falsehood of any system assuming to be a revelation from God; which of the two parties might be expected to be the more successful in the investigation, provided that the assumed revelation were genuine? It cannot surely be denied that the advantages in favour of the man of correct moral feeling and habit would be immense. Nor can it be maintained by any one in possession of sound reason, that a wrong state of mind and character will not materially influence the decisions of the understanding, in reference to moral truth. Upon this principle it is that we enter our earnest protest against the flimsy dogma of modern infidelity, that belief is, in all cases, a thing strictly involuntary. On the contrary, we submit, that in no case where belief is claimed on behalf of moral truth, can it be yielded in a state of mind fairly entitled to the appellation involuntary. That can never be involuntary which may either be prompted or retarded by the state of disposition. Nothing is more obvious than that men may blind themselves to the light of truth, and stumble, as in the dark, at noon-day. But who would say that that blindness is involuntary which is the result of a man's loving darkness rather than light, because his deeds are evil?

Upon a full and impartial review of the moral character and habits of those who have truly embraced Christianity, we are disposed to abide by the conclusion, that their advantages for reaching truth have been astonishingly great. Compared with the leading advocates of Deism, they stand on a lofty eminence, from which, with a vision unclouded by the mists of prejudice and crime, they can discern the moral beauty and loveliness of that fair land which opens to their view in the territory of revealed truth.†

If, then, the intellectual advantages of the Christian are fully equal to those of the infidel, and if his moral advantages are far superior, to what conclusion must such a fact conduct us? Why, to this, that the Christian is much more likely to be right in embracing the gospel, than the sceptic is in rejecting it. His judgment is not less to be respected, and his dispositions and habits are more in accordance with the dictates of what even natural conscience and pure deism would pronounce to be right. And do we on this account urge men to receive Christianity? By no means. All we demand is, that they will give it a fair hearing, and that they will look on it with that respect which will dispose them to weigh well its divine evidence, and not rashly to dash from their parched lips the cup of salvation. We ask not that men should believe because others have believed; but that they would honestly inquire whether believers or sceptics are most worthy of imitation? The careful investigation of this question will generate a state of mind favourable to the claims of revelation, and will prompt the reasonable desire that the gospel may be true.

I may here premise, that no man was ever in earnest to find out the truth of Christianity who did not make conscience of imploring God's direction and assistance in an inquiry upon which so much depends. If Christianity be not a revelation from God, then has none ever been vouchsafed to the children of men; and if none has ever been vouchsafed, then are the whole race sunk in darkness as to the character of God, and the destinies of futurity. If Christianity be a revelation from God, then is it treason against Heaven to reject its evidence, or to set light by the remedy which it prescribes for our fallen and guilty nature. Under these circumstances, how necessary is it to ask of God that he would lead us, his erring children, into all truth, and that he would so far banish every unholy prejudice that our minds may be open to receive whatever bears upon it the stamp of a celestial origin. It is a mournful fact that this spirit of devotion seems an utter stranger to almost all writers of the sceptical class. They boast of their deism, and neglect one of its first and simplest lessons, viz., the duty of an intelligent, but feeble and dependant creature seeking counsel of the great and merciful Being who formed him.

CHAPTER II.

Showing that the evidence of Christianity is of such a nature that it admits of being brought home individually, with convincing power, to every man's bosom.

It is never to be forgotten that those who are called to examine the divine pretensions of Christianity are the very persons interested in its communications. To man it distinctly makes its appeal, and in him it proposes to effect that mighty renovation of which it speaks. Should it be true, then, to its own assumed character, it will undoubtedly verify its several claims in the personal consciousness of all its recipients. I choose to begin here, because I am satisfied that no man can sit down to investigate the truth of this Bible, who does not stand in need of light on the subjects of which it treats. Every man's conscience may suggest to him that he has offended against God, that he has violated, in innumerable instances, his own sense of right and wrong, and that there may be some fearful retribution awaiting transgressors in another and unknown state of existence. But whatever Reason may surmise on these subjects, she has no balm with which to soothe an anguished conscience, no system of propitiation by which to relieve a guilty and foreboding mind, no mediator between the offended Majesty of Heaven and his erring creatures. It is Christianity alone which opens up a door of hope to an apostate race; every thing besides is utter conjecture. Infidels may boast of the composure and satisfaction they feel in contemplating the issues of the present life; but their exemption from anxious dread is but one instance out of many in which the voice of conscience is silenced by that spirit of utter and reckless scepticism, which on the one hand rejects a mass of well-authenticated evidence, and on the other professes firm belief and unshaken confidence in its own dogmas, without so much as a title of proof to support them.

The man, then, who examines Christianity in a right spirit, may expect to perceive, in its intimate bearing on his own case, that it is of God. If he is in that state of mind which is suitable to a rational creature anxious to know the will of God, he will find in Christianity what he can discover no where else. Is he conscious of sin? it reveals to him its true character, traces it to its source, and points to its consequences. Is he the subject of legitimate dread and apprehension in prospect of standing before an offended God? it tells him how his guilt may be effectually removed, and how the peace of an accusing conscience may be restored. Is he oppressed whenever he thinks of the divine purity, and contrasts it with a nature ever prone to evil? it proposes to subject him to a healing and remedial process, by which moral health is to be restored to his diseased soul, and by which he is to be taught to delight in God, and to aspire after his likeness. Is he mournfully sensible of the fact, that "all is vanity and vexation of spirit," and that nothing under the sun can satisfy the desires of a mind panting after immortality? it opens up to his view sources of never-ending delight, it brings him to the very fountain of all happiness, it shows him how his fondest expectations may be realized, it tells him how to delight in God, and how to draw near in acceptable worship to Him whom angels adore, and before whom the spirits of darkness flee in terror and dismay.

It becomes every man who sets himself to the task of examining Christianity, to fix his attention on the following momentous inquiry:—"Is this professed revelation adapted to my actual necessities? to my fears and hopes? to the circumstances by which I am surrounded? and to the prospects which stretch before me?" If, upon minute inquiry, it is found to be thus adapted to our fallen state, it will surely carry along with it a striking demonstration of its divine origin; and if, upon actual experiment, we find that the reception of Christianity allays our guilty fears, gives peace to our troubled consciences, quenches the thirst of sin, inspires the hope of immortality, supplies motives for patient endurance, and sheds the lustre of moral loveliness and purity over the character in whom it dwells, then may we assure ourselves of the source whence it sprung, and then may we enter, with a full heart, into the meaning of the beloved disciple when he says, "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself."*

The measure of spiritual knowledge is also the measure of barbarism and of civilization, of mental stupidity, or mental illumination."—Evidences, Fourth Edition, 12mo, pp. 427, 428.

† "Religion cannot exist," said Sir Walter Scott, "where immorality prevails, any more than a light can burn where the air is corrupted."—Life of Napoleon, vol. i. p. 54.

"I think," said the good and great Richard Baxter, "that in the hearing and reading of the Bible, God's spirit often so concurreth, as that the will itself should be touched with an internal gust and savour of the goodness contained in the doctrine, and at the same time the understanding with an internal irradiation, which breeds such a certain apprehension of the verity of it, as nature gives men of natural principles. And I am persuaded that this, increased by more experience and love, doth hold most Christians faster to Christ than naked reasonings could do. And were it not for this, unlearned, ignorant persons were still in danger of apostacy by every subtle caviller that assaults them. And I believe that all true Christians have this kind of internal knowledge from a suitableness of the truth and goodness of the gospel to their now quickened, illuminated, and sanctified souls."†

Let no one venture to reject Christianity, then, who has never made it the subject of his intense regard, in connexion with the exigencies which press upon his own condition and prospects. It can be but ill understood by the man who has never looked at it in its adaptation to his own case. It is an individual, as well as a general remedy; and the true study of Christianity is the examination of its coincidence with the wants and wishes, the hopes and fears, which press upon every son and daughter of Adam. For the want of this close inspection of the individual aim of Christianity, it is to be feared that thousands either reject it, or are utterly indifferent to it. But how contrary is all this to the spirit of true science, which rejects nothing, and admits nothing but upon actual experiment.

Let Christianity be fairly put to the test; let it be taken home with unhesitating confidence to the heart; let its divine remedies be applied to the distempered mind; let its proffered influence be implored; let its true character as a restorative system be fully and impartially tried, and then, should it after all fail to impart peace, to heal the malady of the soul, to answer its own professed designs, let it be held up to that obloquy which it deserves.

But where is the man who ever betook himself to Christianity without finding it to be the refuge of his weary mind? Who could ever, upon actual trial, charge it with a lack of faithfulness to its own pretensions? Who ever embraced its animating hopes without finding them productive of peace, and purity, and joy? Who ever became a true Christian without feeling the self-evidencing power of the gospel? Who ever believed on the Son of God without having proof, in his own mind, that the Bible is true? Who ever made actual trial of Christianity without finding it to be the "wisdom of God, and the power of God," to the salvation of his soul? Who ever knew the truth as it is in Jesus without being made free by it from the thraldom of sin and the bondage of corruption? The man who is a genuine believer is as fully conscious as he is of existence, that Christianity is no cunningly devised fable. It has established its throne in the deep-seated convictions of his heart. He has felt the transformation it has wrought: "old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." His entire character has been favourably affected by it. Upon his once gloomy path it has shed the light of immortality; it has taught him to "rejoice even in tribulation;" it has changed all the aspects of life, by throwing over them the hues of eternity; it has conferred on him a reality of happiness which the whole creation had no power of imparting. In his own person he beholds a monument of the truth and excellency of Christianity, which forbids him for ever to doubt. By other evidences, indeed, his faith is confirmed; but in his peace of mind, in that "hope which is full of immortality," and in the heavenward bearing of his once earthly character, he is enabled to feel that Christianity is no "cunningly devised fable."

Having briefly looked at what may be regarded as the experimental evidence which Christianity is capable of planting in every man's bosom, we may now advance to other parts of this momentous subject.

CHAPTER III.

Containing a brief survey of those branches of evidence which it is proper to urge upon the attention of those who have not as yet yielded up their minds to the divine authority and transforming power of the Gospel.

Some of those evidences may be traced in the internal character of Christianity itself, and others in those outward attestations by which Divine Providence has demonstrated the fact of its celestial origin. As I am fully convinced of the self-verifying power of the religion of Jesus Christ, I think it well to begin with the first of these branches of evidence, that no one may, with truth, imagine that we shrink from a thorough investigation of the internal structure and actual tendencies of our Holy Faith.*

SECTION I.

The internal evidence of Christianity.

When the subject of internal evidence has at any time deeply engaged my thoughts, I have proposed to myself the following question: "What is the most wonderful, and at the same time the most unaccountable, object which presents itself to our notice in a careful perusal of the New Testament Scriptures?" This question has always drawn forth one simple answer: the character of Jesus of Nazareth. In examining the internal evidence of Christianity, look—

1. At the moral character of its Great Founder. Let that character be fairly investigated, and I am greatly mistaken if it will not breed a conviction that Christianity must be from heaven. That such a person lived, and suffered, and died in the land of Judea, is admitted equally by heathen and Jewish writers, and requires no formal proof, therefore, to establish the fact. Josephus, Suetonius, Tacitus, and Pliny the Younger, place beyond all reasonable doubt the fact of his existence, and the period of his life, misery, and death.

But what an object of astonishment and wonder do we behold in "the man Christ Jesus!" Trace the son of Mary and Joseph from the manger at Bethlehem to the cross on Cavalry, and what a combination do you witness of all that is innocent and pure and benevolent! Here is wisdom the most profound in the absence of all the ordinary means of acquiring it. Here is a Being in whom all the social and relative affections are not only seen to advantage, but in absolute perfection. Here are humility and dignity perfectly combined; the loftiness of moral excellence, without a single approximation to the feeling of contempt for others. Here is a sanctity of character which never yielded to a single temptation, and never deviated from the path of rectitude in a single instance, combined at the same time with a condescension and mercy which never spurned the miserable, and never frowned on the trembling penitent conscious of his guilt and pleading for forgiveness. Here is one who never resented an injury, and never forgot a kindness; who never thought of an enemy, but to bless him, or of a faithless friend, but to pity and forgive him. Here is one whose days were devoted to the exercises of active benevolence, and whose nights were spent in communion with his God, who sought no reward of all his generosity, who wept tears of anguish over the approaching fate of those who persecuted him at every step of his existence with unabating cruelty, and who spent his last breath in praying for his guilty and relentless murderers. Whence such a character as this? Was it from earth or heaven? If from earth, then where can we look for its great archetype? Not, surely, in the Gentile world; for it infinitely surpassed even the ideal models which were laid down by the purest and most enlightened of its philosophers. Not in the Jewish world, for even its most cherished patriarchs were chargeable with innumerable imperfections; and in the days of Jesus of Nazareth, the great body of the nation were peculiarly degraded, both as it respected the acquirements of the understanding, and the habits of the life and conduct. Whence, then, this mysterious and wonderful personage; this Being so unlike all the generations of men who had preceded him or who have followed after him, yet clothed in a human form, possessed of human sympathies, and subject to human woes? No wonder that Rousseau, in his exquisite and well-known contrast between Socrates and Christ, should feel himself constrained to remark, that "the inventor of such a personage would be a more astonishing character than the hero."* "Is it possible," said he, speaking of the Bible and of the character of Christ, "is it possible that a book, at once so simple and sublime, should be merely the work of man? Is it possible that the sacred personage, whose history it contains, should himself be a mere man? Do we find that he assumed the tone of an enthusiast or ambitious sectary? What sweetness, what purity in his manner! What an affecting gracefulness in his delivery! What sublimity in his maxims! What profound wisdom in his discourses! What presence of mind, what sublimity, what truth in his replies! How great the command over his passions! Where is the man, where is the philosopher, who could so live and so die without weakness and without ostentation? When Plato described his imaginary good man, loaded with all the shame of guilt, yet meriting the highest rewards of virtue, he described exactly the character of Jesus Christ: the resemblance was so striking that all the fathers perceived it." Yet this was the strange and unhappy man who, through the wickedness and pride of his heart, declared, "I cannot believe the gospel."

* I do not think, judging from the manner in which infidels themselves have written, that the most successful method of assailing them is to begin with a discussion of the external evidences of the gospel. From their general ignorance of the character of Revelation itself, and from its marked adaptation, when examined, to produce conviction of its divine origin, I rather hesitate as to the propriety of demanding the belief of a sceptic upon the mere presentation of its external credentials. Besides, there is scarcely any object to be achieved, by this mode of procedure, which is not equally well answered by the method of arguing the truth of scripture from an examination of its own contents. Assuredly the divine authority of the heavenly messengers may be verified as much by what they say, as by any other circumstance whatsoever; and if the real power of conviction lies in their message, it seems but right to try its efficacy.

Upon no correct or reasonable supposition whatever but that the Lord Jesus was the very person he assumed to be, the person whom the Christian Scriptures describes him to be, viz., the Messiah of the Church, and "God manifest in the flesh," can we account for the solitary and awful grandeur† of a character "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens," "who did no sin," and "who knew no sin."

The Rev. Charles Bridges, in his excellent Memoirs of Miss M. I. Graham, (and which I take the liberty of strongly recommending to the notice of the young,) who had been considerably tinctured with infidelity, states that the character of Christ, as a proof of the credibility of the Christian Revelation, arrested her peculiar attention. A minute scrutiny of his spotless life was most satisfactory in its result. "The more," said she, "I studied this divine character, the more I grew up, as it were, into its simplicity and holiness, the more my understanding was enabled to shake off those slavish and sinful prejudices which had hindered me from appreciating its excellence. Truly, his words were dearer to me than my necessary food. He was my 'All in All.' I did not want to have any knowledge, goodness, or strength, independently of him. I had rather be 'accepted in the Beloved,' than received (had that been possible) upon the score of my own merits. I had rather walk leaning upon his arm than have a stock of strength given me to perform the journey alone. To learn, as a fool, of Christ, this was better to me than to have the knowledge of an angel to find out things myself.

"From that moment," she adds, "I ceased to stumble at the doctrines of the cross. The doctrines of Scripture, which had before appeared to me an inexplicable mass of confusion and contradictions, were now written on my understanding with the clearness of a sun-beam. Above all, that once abhorred doctrine of the Divinity of Christ was become exceeding precious to me. The external evidences of Christianity, though I now perceived all their force, were no longer necessary to my conviction. From that time," she concludes, "I have continued to 'sit at the feet of Jesus, and to hear his word,' taking him for my teacher and guide in things temporal as well as spiritual. He has found in me a disciple so slow of comprehension, so prone to forget his lessons, and to act in opposition to his commands, that were he not infinitely 'meek and lowly of heart, he would long ago have cast me off in anger; but he still continues to bear with me, and to give me 'line upon line, and precept upon precept;' and I am certain that he 'will never leave me, nor forsake me,' for though I am variable and inconsistent, 'with Him there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.'"

Such was the effect produced upon this intelligent lady's mind by an examination of the moral character of the Lord Jesus, and I am satisfied that a similar result will follow in every instance the adoption of the same course. At least we do claim from infidels, if they will still continue to reject the truth, that they furnish us, upon their own principles, with some reasonable account of the source whence sprung the ineffable purity and benevolence of the Son of God. Till they have accounted for his unequalled character they are chargeable with the utmost levity and irrationality in persisting in their unbelief.*

2. Contemplate, as another internal evidence of the divine origin of Christianity, the unrivalled sublimity of its diction.

Compared with the rich treasures of the Old and New Testament Scriptures, all other compositions must retire into the shade. Rousseau must have felt this conviction most powerfully when he made the following reluctant but important concession: "I will confess," said he, "that the majesty of the Scriptures strikes me with admiration, as the purity of the gospel hath its influence upon my heart. Peruse the works of our philosophers with all their pomp of diction; how mean, how contemptible are they, compared with the Scriptures!"

The opinion of Rousseau is confirmed by that of men vastly his superiors in learning and virtue. Sir William Jones, than whom few of the human race have been distinguished by a more laudable thirst after knowledge, has penned the following striking, but just eulogium, on the style and manner of the sacred writers: "The collection of tracts which we call, from their excellence, The Scriptures, contain, independently of a divine origin, more true sublimity, more exquisite beauty, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains of poetry, and eloquence, than could be collected within the same compass from all other books that were ever composed in any age or in any idiom. The two parts of which the Scriptures consist are connected by a chain of compositions which bear no resemblance in form or style to any that can be produced from the stores of Grecian, Indian, Persian, or even Arabian learning. The antiquity of those compositions no man doubts, and the unstrained application of them to events long subsequent to their publication, is a solid ground of belief that they are genuine predictions, and consequently inspired."

† Bishop Sherlock, in contrasting the character of Jesus Christ with that of Mahomet, has, in one of the most beautiful personifications in our language, finely touched the argument for the truth of Christianity here contended for. "Go," says he, "to your Natural Religion; lay before her Mahomet and his disciples arrayed in armour and in blood, riding in triumph over the spoils of thousands and tens of thousands who fell by his victorious sword; show her the cities which he set in flames, the countries which he ravaged and destroyed, and the miserable distress of all the inhabitants of the earth. When she has viewed him in this scene, carry him into his retirements. Show her the prophet's chamber, his concubines and wives; let her see his adultery, and hear him allege revelation and his divine commission to justify his lust and his oppression.

"When she is tired with this prospect, then show her the blessed Jesus, humble and meek, doing good to all the sons of men, patiently instructing both the ignorant and perverse; let her see him in his most retired privacy; let her follow him to the mountain, and hear his devotions and supplications to God. Carry her to his table to see his poor fare, and hear his heavenly discourse. Let her see him injured, but not provoked; let her attend him to the tribunals, and consider the patience with which he endured the scoffs and reproaches of his enemies. Lead her to his cross, and let her view him in the agony of death, and hear his last prayer for his persecutors—'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.'

"When Natural Religion has viewed both, ask—which is the prophet of God? But her answer we have already had when she saw part of this scene through the eyes of the centurion who attended at the cross; by him she spake and said, 'Truly this man was the Son of God.'"—See Sherlock's Sermons.

* See a very able Discourse on the Character of Christ, as an evidence of the Christian Religion, by the Rev. W. Walford, in a volume lately published by the Independent ministers of London on the Evidences of Christianity. See also the present Bishop of Calcutta's Seventeenth Lecture on the Evidences, &c.

The celebrated Mr. Addison, in discoursing on the same subject, says, "After perusing the book of Psalms, let a judge of the beauties of poetry read a literal translation of Horace or Pindar, and he will find int hese two last such an absurdity and confusion of style, with such a comparative poverty of imagination, as will make him sensible of the vast superiority of Scripture style."

If we examine carefully the pathetic story of Joseph and his brethren; the songs of Moses at the Red Sea, and on the borders of the promised land; the sublime narrative of the giving of the Law from Mount Sinai; the celebrated prophecy of Balaam; the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple; the visions of the Jewish prophets, particularly those of Isaiah; the odes of Jesse's son; the matchless sermon on the Mount; the public appeals of the apostles before heathen tribunals; and the mystic symbols of the Apocalypse, we cannot but be struck and awed with the unrivalled diction, the surpassing imagery, and the lofty conceptions of the inspired writers. Let all the other books of antiquity be produced; let the classic page disclose its richest stores; let the entire mass of apocryphal writings undergo the strictest scrutiny; let Egypt, and Greece, and Arabia bring forth the proudest monuments of their genius; let the most dazzling passages of the Koran be separated from the mass of its absurdities; let all ages and all nations vie with the writers of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, and it will be seen, by a judge of the most inferior grade, that no argument can be held for a single moment as to the comparative grandeur of the book commonly called the Bible, that it throws the whole round of other productions into the shade, and that it is written altogether in a style and manner which admits of no successful rival or counterfeit.

Now, what is the force of this particular argument? Why, the Bible was written by the posterity of Abraham; a people proverbial for their destitution of all mental refinement, and who, in their secular history, have displayed a marked inferiority to all the other nations of antiquity. The conclusion then is, if the wonderful volume known by the name of the Bible was verily the production of several Jews, who lived in different ages of the world, they must have written under a direction and an impulse more than human; they must have written under the guidance of that Spirit, to whom they themselves trace their loftiest and humblest inspirations. I feel that this conclusion is sound and rational. Try the Bible by any other Jewish production of any age whatsoever, try it by any work that has ever emanated from the pen or the genius of man, and the feeling must resistlessly take possession of the mind, that the words which God speaks, "They are spirit, and they are life." Unlike every other document that has been handed down from a remote antiquity, the volume of inspiration carries along with it, in the unutterable dignity and sublimity which pervade all its parts, an evidence of the source whence it sprung; an evidence which could not fail to strike the mind even of an untutored savage, who might meet with it accidentally in some vast desert, and who had no living teacher to unfold to him the character or merciful designs of the God whom it reveals. How can men of taste, and genius, and literature, remain blind to this argument! The very poetry, the lofty and well sustained imagery, the unparalleled diction of the sacred volume, will rise up in judgment against them, inasmuch as their dislike to the truths of revelation has led many of them to overlook qualities which would have commanded their profoundest veneration had they been able to discern them in a single uninspired production. It may be added here, that the few infidels who have written in commendation of the style of the inspired writers have totally neglected to account for the commanding and indubitable superiority of the Scriptures to all other compositions. Upon any hypothesis but that of their divine origin the attempt must utterly fail. My only wish is, that intelligent men would make the honest effort to satisfy their own convictions that the Bible might have been written by such persons as the Jewish patriarchs and the Fishermen of Galilee, without any divine afflatus; when such an attempt has been made by them, I am satisfied that, whether they are led to embrace the Holy Scriptures as the word of God or not, they will be compelled to admit the fact that, upon all the canons of literary criticism ever admitted, there is nothing whatever to warrant the idea that the Bible has been furnished to mankind in the same way, and on the same principles as other documents of a remote antiquity. When men are brought thus far there is great reason to hope that they will look with some measure of devoutness and integrity at the whole question of Christian evidence.

3. Let the high standard of the morality of Christianity be examined with impartiality, and it cannot fail to arouse attention to its extraordinary claims. For though the uncompromising sanctity of revealed truth is among the chief reasons which induce men to cavil at its evidence, and secretly to reject its authority, it is, nevertheless, one of the most powerful and indubitable proofs of its proceedings from the fountain of infinite purity and benevolence.*

On this subject the celebrated John Locke has said, "The morality of the gospel doth so far excel that of all other books, that to give a man full knowledge of true morality, I would send him to no other book than the New Testament." And, verily, if we examine all the writings of the most enlightened and virtuous of the heathen world, and compare or rather contrast them with the writings of inspiration, we shall be fully satisfied of the accuracy of this great man's opinion. That there are fine passages on certain branches of morals, in some of the writings of pagan philosophers and poets, we do not attempt to deny; but the great question is, what were their writings as a whole, and what were the views of morality generally entertained and acted upon among their disciples? Is it not notorious that self-murder,† that crimes which admit of no description,‡ that theft, that sacrilege, that fornication, that adultery,§ that revenge, that pride, that dissimulation in the worship of the gods,‖ that habitual disregard of the duty of prayer,¶ and that awful irreverence for the name of the Great Supreme, are taught, with an unblushing effrontery, by some of the chief patrons and guardians of pagan morality? Who does not know that some of the most brilliant passages, both of the Greek and Latin classics, cannot be read by ingenious youth without involving the risk of a total downfal of their morals? We shall find no counterpart, indeed, to the writings of heathen antiquity, unless we turn to the licentious and utterly reckless productions of modern infidelity, in which every thing like disguise is laid aside, and men are taught to do, without restraint, whatever their own vile inclinations may dictate.

How unlike the imperfect and often polluted writings of men is the system of morality laid down and detailed in the several books of the Old and New Testament! Let any man devote a reasonable period to the examination of the spirit and moral precepts of Christianity, and he will be compelled to admit its unsullied purity, its coincidence with all our natural notions of right and wrong, and its indubitable tendency to improve human intercourse, and to constitute mankind a community of brothers. Did all men believe and obey the dictates of Revelation, what a mighty and favourable revolution would be wrought in the entire frame-work of society! What habit of known evil does it not proscribe? What irregular passion does it not forbid? What acknowledged virtue does it not enforce? What kindly or generous affection does it not inculcate? How lofty is its standard of action! Though self-interest is not and cannot be excluded from a system so adapted to the nature of man, yet it is only permitted to occupy a subordinate place in the morality of the gospel. There men are urged to endure and act "as seeing Him who is invisible;" there we are commanded to do no act of beneficence to be seen of men; there the honour of God and the good of others are the objects at which they are called habitually to aim; there the surface morality of the world is treated with scorn, and a right state of the thoughts and affections is imperatively demanded; there meekness, and humility, and condescension, are represented as the true path to greatness; there haughtiness and pride are associated with all that is mean and worthless; there an assuming and lofty air is forbidden even in the ordinary intercourses of social life; there covetousness is branded as idolatry; hatred as murder, and hidden lust as adultery; there every species of resentment is absolutely prohibited; there the refusal to forgive an injury is described as an effectual barrier in the way of the exercise of divine mercy; there all detraction, all backbiting, all evil speaking, all envy, all malice, all circumvention, are shown to be inconsistent with the hope of eternal life, and the state of acceptance through a Redeemer.

There is indeed one grand peculiarity belonging to the morality of Christianity, which distinguishes it from that of every other system, viz:—the sublime and all-subduing character of its motives. Many useful virtues were enjoined by the Gentile philosophers, but they had no paramount considerations by which to ensure obedience to their own precepts; they had no moral engine of sufficient power to urge a sinful race onward in the path of obedience. Hence their code of morals was almost a dead letter, little regarded by themselves, and totally overlooked by the mass. But who can glance for a moment at the morality of the Bible without coming into contact with those mighty and heart-stirring considerations which are fitted to rouse all the sensibilities of human nature, and to subdue into willing and grateful obedience the most stubborn and rebellious of the race? Let the following examples of the class of motives referred to suffice: "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-speaking, be put away from you, with all malice: and be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought to love one another." "Let nothing be done through strife or vain-glory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves." "Ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are his." "The love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him that died for them and that rose again."

How mean and poverty-stricken are the motives of all other systems when compared with the religion of Christ Jesus! A book which founds its code of morals upon such considerations can never surely be the production of man. In the wide range of his efforts there is nothing analagous. The fair inference, therefore, is, that a greater than man speaks to us in the living oracles.

It may be safely affirmed, that if Christianity were cordially embraced as the religion of mankind, it would renovate the entire fabric of society. It is impossible for any one to say advisedly, or with truth, that one immoral habit, or one irregular thought or desire, receives a sanction from the writings of Christ and his apostles. The Christian may often have reason, through the infirmity and corruption of his fallen nature, to blush on account of the very imperfect manner in which he acts out his great principles; he may often have occasion to mourn that in him the religion of Jesus has such an unworthy representative; but he can at all times refer with exultation and triumph to the glorious charter of his hopes; and while he sees that "the wickedness of man upon earth is great," he may unhesitatingly assure himself that the total neglect or but partial reception of Christianity is the sole cause of the crime and wretchedness which abound. The enemies of revelation themselves being judges, what can they predicate of its probable tendency on the race but unmixed good? Must they not own that all the moral evil which abounds in the earth is in direct violation of the doctrines and precepts of revealed truth? Must they not, however reluctantly, concede, that the principles of deism are feeble and powerless as a system of moral renovation, compared with the high and holy dictates of the Gospel? Who does not perceive that if a time should ever arrive when all men shall give heed to the words of Christ, that that will be the precise period of the world's deliverance from the cruel vassalage of sin? "Men would then," to use the words of an eminent divine, "universally do justice, speak truth, show mercy, exercise mutual forgiveness, follow after peace, bridle their appetites and passions, and lead sober, righteous, and godly lives. Murders, wars, bitter contentions, cruel oppressions, and unrestrained licentiousness, would no more desolate the world, and fill it with misery; but righteousness, goodness, and truth would bless the earth with a felicity exceeding all our present conceptions. This is, no doubt, the direct tendency of the scriptural doctrines, precepts, motives, and promises: nothing is wanting to remedy the state of the world, and to fit men for the worship and felicity of heaven, but that they should believe and obey the Bible. And if many enormous crimes have been committed under the colour of zeal for Christianity, this only proves the depravity of man's heart; for the Scripture, soberly understood, most expressly forbids such practices; and men do not act thus because they duly regard the Bible, but because they will not believe and obey it."*

Now the argument for the divine origin of Christianity arising from its transcendent morality, may be viewed in various lights. In the first place, how comes it to pass, that of all the religions which have sought to obtain the suffrages of mankind, that of Jesus of Nazareth is incomparably the most pure and benevolent in its tendency? How comes it to pass, moreover, that among a rude people, such as were the Jews, there should have arisen a system of faith and worship, which, for grandeur of conception and sanctity of character, outstrips all the other records of time? Is there not in this very circumstance a presumption of the highest order in favour of the divine origin of Christianity?

But supposing, in the second place, that the apostles of our Lord were chargeable with the crime of dexterously imposing a false religion upon mankind, how happens it that they set themselves with such zeal and ardour to oppose the prejudices and preconceived notions of their countrymen? How happens it that they took the very method the least likely to conciliate their good opinion, and to secure their hearty approval? How happens it that in their system of morality they not only struck a death blow at the pride and hypocrisy of their own nation, but insisted on a purity of heart and life which they knew must expose them to the hatred and derision of all mankind? Upon a mere human calculation they adopted a method which could only issue in a perfect failure. Had they flattered the depravity of man; had they introduced a scheme which winked at any of his corruptions; had they imitated the subsequent conduct of the False Prophet; had they promised to their disciples a life of ease and sensual indulgence; had they exhibited in their own history an exemption from poverty, reproach, persecution, and death; in a word, had there been any one thing in the scheme of doctrine they taught to secure the esteem and to call forth the approbation of a corrupt and vitiated state of society, we might then have been left to suspect that they had artfully constructed a system to suit the depraved taste of mankind, and to raise themselves to notoriety by pandering to the vices of human nature. But when the very reverse of this is the case; when the morality of the Gospel is so lofty and unbending as to surrender none of its claims to meet the prejudices either of Jews or Gentiles; when it is so pre-eminent as to stand forth, in solitary grandeur, amidst the religions of all ages and all nations; when it is found to embody every quality which is fitted to diffuse peace, and justice, and benevolence among mankind; when it is impossible to detect in it a single precept which would not elevate the character of man and augment all his personal and relative enjoyments, what ought any thoughtful or considerate mind to conclude respecting it, but that it is the offspring of the Fountain of all Purity, and that it has been vouchsafed by Him in mercy to heal the distempers and redress the miseries of our fallen race?

I conclude this chapter in the words of one who cannot be suspected of any undue partiality to the Christian faith, of one who, unhappily for himself, did not allow the convictions of his judgment to rule his decisions or to form his character:

"The Gospel, that divine book, the only one necessary to a Christian, and the most useful of all to the man who may not be one, only requires reflection upon it to impress the mind with love for its author, and resolution to fulfil his precepts. Virtue never spoke in gentler terms; the profoundest wisdom was never uttered with greater energy or more simplicity. It is impossible to rise from the reading of it without a feeling of moral improvement. Look at the books of the philosophers, with all their pomp: how little they are compared with this! Shall we say that the history of the Gospel is a pure fiction? This is not the style of fiction; and the history of Socrates, which nobody doubts, rests upon less evidence than that of Jesus Christ. After all, this is but shifting the difficulty; not answering it. The supposition, that several persons had united to fabricate this book, is more inconceivable than that one person should have supplied the subject of it. The spirit which it breathes, the morality which it inculcates could never have been the invention of Jewish authors; and the gospel possesses characters of truth so striking, so perfectly inimitable, that the inventor would be a more astonishing object than the hero."*

Let attention be devoted—

4. To the coincidence of Christianity with the character of God, and the actual condition of man."†

There is a marked tendency in the human mind to trace results to some adequate cause. Hence our dissatisfaction in the mere perception of facts which, in our present state of knowledge, we cannot account for; and hence also the restless effort made by us to discover some principle of causation sufficient to produce the phenomena beheld. The revolutions of the heavenly bodies must impress every one endowed with reason that there is some mighty impulse to which they are all obedient; and the feeling we have of the existence of such an impulse has roused that inquiry into the laws of the material universe which has led to all the discoveries of modern science, and which has enabled us to trace, in the one pervading law of gravitation, the reason of certain revolutions and appearances, which without such an application of the human faculties must have been hid in perpetual obscurity.

Nor is the tendency in man to reason from effects to causes the only one discoverable in the examination of what may be called his mental instincts. It is obvious that he is equally prone to reason from causes to effects; so that when he has satisfied himself as to the existence of a particular cause, and has acquired some knowledge of the mode in which it operates, he is prepared to concede that other effects may be attributed to it besides those which he has already discovered, provided they are in no way inconsistent with the facts and relations now perceived.

Now, the tendencies thus described will be found equally to manifest themselves in reference to mental and moral science, as in reference to the phenomena of the material universe. It is to these laws of our nature that we are indebted for many of those inductions by which we are enabled to judge of the characters and actions of men, and to predicate what may or may not be reasonable to anticipate in certain given circumstances.

Apply these general principles to the investigation of the subject in hand. The Bible is a book professing to come from heaven. Is it, then, a communication possessing anything in common with our ordinary associations? or is it a book so entirely new as to furnish us with no means of judging of it by the exercise of that ordinary tendency of our nature which leads us to judge of causes by their effects, and of effects by their causes? The slightest examination of the Christian scheme will convince any impartial mind that the view of the divine character and government which it presents is in strictest harmony with what may be deduced from the survey of nature, the phenomena of divine providence, and the dictates of natural conscience. The particular modifications of divine perfection which are seen displayed in the pages of revelation may be to a great extent new, but the great question is,—Are not these modifications such as to fall in and harmonize with all that the reason of man would suggest to him, as suited to the character of God and the condition of human nature? I am satisfied that the discoveries of the Bible, though so transcendently glorious, are, in their great outline, answerable to all our natural conceptions of the Most High, as the supreme moral governor.

Two things seem necessary to authenticate a religion as coming from God,—first, that the facts and representations which it contains should be such as to exhibit all that is lofty in wisdom, mighty in power, awful in purity, and subduing in kindness; and, second, that the representation thus afforded of the divine character should, when contemplated and believed by man, be fitted, by the laws of his being, to transform him into the divine image, and to make him a partaker of the divine happiness. The very first showing of Christianity is to this effect. It proposes, by an overwhelming manifestation of the character of God in the great scheme of redemption, to raise man from his present state of sin and rebellion, and to confer on him that elevated species of blessedness which arises from conformity to the will of an infinitely perfect Being.

"When," says an eloquent writer, "we read a history which authoritatively claims to be an exhibition of the character of God in his dealings with men; if we find in it that which fills and overflows our most dilated conceptions of moral worth and loveliness in the Supreme Being, and at the same time feel that it is triumphant in every appeal that it makes to our consciences in its statements of the obliquity and corruption of our own hearts, and if our reason farther discovers a system of powerful moral stimulants, embodied in the facts of this history, which necessarily tend to produce in the mind a resemblance to that higher character which is there portrayed; if we discern that the spirit of this history gives peace to the conscience by the very exhibition which quickens its sensibility; that it dispels the terrors of guilt by the very fact which associates sin with the full loathing of the heart; that it combines in one wondrous and consistent whole our most fearful forebodings, and our most splendid anticipations for futurity, that it inspires a pure and elevated and joyful hope for eternity by those very declarations which attach a deeper and more interesting obligation to the discharge of the minutest part of human duty, if we see that the object of all its tendencies is the perfection of moral happiness, and that these tendencies are naturally connected with the belief of its narration; if we see all this in the gospel, we may then say that our own eyes have seen its truth, and that we need no other testimony. We may then well believe that God has been pleased, in pity to our wretchedness, and in condescension to our feebleness, to clothe the eternal laws which regulate his spiritual government in such form as may be palpable to our conceptions, and adapted to the urgency of our necessities."*

Such an interposition has the Eternal Majesty of heaven vouchsafed in the revelation of mercy by Christ Jesus, a revelation which abounds in all that is awful and all that is tender; which describes God as the avenger of sin, and the Saviour of the guilty; which exhibits the loftiest claims of the lawgiver, and the tenderest attributes of compassion; which makes moral impunity infinitely odious and detestable, by the very means whereby it is forgiven; which points to a guilty race reclaimed and saved, while the Glorious Projector of the scheme stands forth before the intelligent universe in the ineffable majesty of spotless and unchangeable purity.

Does reason tell us, that as God has seen fit to create various orders of intelligent creatures, to him they must all be accountable, and over them all he must exercise the right and the control of a moral governor? Revelation comes in with its direct and absolute assurance upon this point, resolving all the doubts which sin had fostered in the human mind, and proclaiming God's right to rule, his title to obedience, and his determination to punish every infringement of his righteous government. Had the Bible said less on this head, or spoken a language quite different, it would have been at variance with the simplest dictates of sound reason. If there be one God, the creator and upholder of the universe, the fountain of all being, and of all happiness, it follows by resistless consequence, that he is the governor of the world he has made, and that the laws by which he governs must be in accordance with the dictates of his own pure and benevolent nature. The Scriptures teach us distinctly what those principles are; but in doing so, they do not violate one of all our natural conclusions.

Does the reason of man whisper to him, that the Being who made him is the constant inspector of his actions, and that a period may arrive when an account will be required of the manner in which he has passed the few short years of his transitory existence? Revelation does not proffer its aid to repress this natural and almost universal feeling; but to place it upon the sure basis of a divine communication, to impart to it the character of an incontrovertible truth, and to raise it to the potency of an all-pervading and all-subduing motive.

Does a secret monitor disturb man's inward repose, and tell him that he has sinned against his own acknowledged standard of duty, and fill him with awful forebodings of judgment to come, and urge him to many a vain expedient for the settlement of that score of guilt which he knows he has been contracting from the earliest dawnings of reason? Revelation does not lift up its voice to repress the natural testimony of conscience, but to cause it to be heard in yet louder strains of condemnation; to strip man of all vain conceit of excellence which, in his fallen state, he does not possess; to show, by the pure standard of the written law, how far he has departed from his original integrity; to present such an image of his moral defection as shall cause him to loathe and abhor himself in dust and in ashes before God; and to teach him the utter insufficiency of all human aid to extricate him from that state of condemnation and sin into which, by rebellion against the righteous Lawgiver of the universe, he has sunk.

Does the mind of man, conscious of its own evil desert, and no less conscious of the blight which sin has spread over all the sources of human enjoyment, sigh after some hidden well-spring of life, some new manifestation of the character of God, which shall dart a ray of mercy and hope across the gloom of his apostacy; some divine balm that shall heal those wounds which have been inflicted in his lacerated spirit? Yes, my beloved reader, such have been, and such are the wishes and aspirations of the guilty spirit of man. He has departed from "the fountain of living waters," and the entire range of creature enjoyment has proved but a broken cistern to him. He is not, indeed, rightly affected with the true nature of his malady, nor does he properly appreciate the means by which his peace and happiness may be restored; but he is in that precise state in which, if he will open the revelation of God, and prayerfully examine its contents, he will find the very blessings after which he sighs, and in the application of them, will perceive that the Author of his being is also the God of his salvation.

In the promise of a Saviour, divinely accomplished in the fulness of time, and in the propitiatory sacrifice of the cross, we behold a scheme which bears along with it indubitable proofs of its conformity to the character of God, and of its adaptation to the guilt and necessity of man. It is so far, indeed, above all his natural conceptions of a divine interposition, that it may well be styled "the wisdom of God in a mystery;" but it is at the same time so exquisitely adjusted to his moral relations, and to the moral catastrophe in which he is involved, that he has only to open his eyes that he may see, and his heart that he may feel. The problem of his salvation is here solved, while the claims of the moral governor remain unimpaired. His conscience tells him that he is a transgressor; but it suggests no effectual method of escape from merited condemnation. But Christianity points him to "the blood of the Lamb," to the "one offering" of Jesus Christ, "for the sins of the people." He feels that he is at a fearful moral distance from God; but he sees in the method of his reconciliation the means whereby his nature may be reclaimed, and learns that a heart all rebellion may be drawn by the mighty attractions of divine love into the habit of cheerful, unreserved, and filial obedience.

To doubt that such a scheme, so perfect in its conformity to all that we connect with the infinitely pure Spirit, and so admirably adapted to the nature, condition, and prospects of man,—to doubt that such a scheme is from heaven, is to do violence to the surest inductions of enlightened reason, to turn a deaf ear to the voice of conscience, and obstinately to lose sight of a coincidence which distinctly shows that the nature of man and the means of his redemption lay claim to a common origin.

Without the provisions of the Bible, man is a wanderer and an outcast. He beholds, in some measure, his responsibility and his guilt; but he has no well defined prospect of how it may fare with him when his body goes down to the dust. He feels that this world is a wilderness, and all its inhabitants mourners; but he is unable to solace himself in the prospect of a blessed immortality. He finds himself the subject of indefinite forebodings, and discovers nothing in the wide range of created nature that can fill up the desires of a mind distanced from its native element; but how to impart a fixed character to his hopes, and how to satisfy his enlarged desires, he knows not. Let him turn, then, to the well-springs of salvation, let him view the character of God as set forth in the doctrine of the gospel, let him examine for himself the great mystery of godliness, let him yield up his whole soul to the impression of redeeming love, let him implore the spirit of Christ to unfold the infinite grace and loveliness of his character, let him bow down his reason to the verities of the cross; then will his guilt subside, his fears vanish, his prospects brighten; then will his soul glow with ardent love to God, then will the darkness which broods over the scenes of earth be scattered; then will the truth of revelation be felt; then will the self-evidencing power of the gospel be verified; and then will the proud objector be converted into a "little child," and the vain disputer into a meek and humble disciple of the Son of God.

Section II.

The external evidence of Christianity.

By the external evidences of Christianity we are to understand those attestations to its divine origin which have been either directly vouchsafed from heaven, or which may be infallibly traced in its early success and in its great moral results. And if, by an impartial survey of the various topics connected with internal evidence, we are compelled to admit the presumptuous boldness of those who can disburden their minds of all apprehension in rejecting a scheme distinguished alike by its grandeur and adaptation; by a careful examination of external evidence, we are driven to the conclusion, that the rejector of Revelation is at war with omnipotence, and that he is standing out against a species of proof which demands of every intelligent and accountable creature the most prompt and unhesitating submission. Such is the nature and such the variety of external evidence, that it leaves every man inexcusable who remains in secret or avowed oppositon to the claims of the gospel. In treating of the subject of external evidence I begin—

1. With Miracles.

If the Bible be from God, it must be true in itself, irrespective of all miraculous attestation; and if it be not from God, it is equally clear that no miracle can have been vouchsafed on its behalf. *A miracle is an act of Omnipotence, which deviates from, or suspends the ordinary course of nature, and which is fitted to produce an impression upon rational beings by the very circumstances of its singularity and its unaccountableness. Such an interposition we may assure ourselves would not be granted in support of any messenger not from God, or of any doctrine containing in it the slightest shade of imposture.

The most inveterate enemies of Revelation have been compelled to admit that a miracle wrought by any being professing to act under the authority of God, would be a sufficient evidence of the divinity of his mission. "We know," said a Jewish ruler to Christ, "that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him." A principle is here admitted which it is impossible, consistently with sound reason, to deny; it is this: that a teacher working miracles furnishes indubitable evidence that his mission is from God. To test, with utmost severity, the evidence of miraculous interposition in any given instance, must be an imperative duty, but to withhold our assent to any doctrine after the finger of Om-

* Dr. Samuel Clarke has said that "A miracle is a work effected in a manner unusual, or different from the common and regular method of providence, by the interposition of God himself, or of some intelligent agent superior to man, for the proof or evidence of some particular doctrine, or in attestation of the authority of some particular person." The Rev. Richard Watson, in his Theological Dictionary, observes, that "A miracle, in the popular sense, is a prodigy or an extraordinary event which suprises us by its novelty. In a more accurate and philosophic sense, a miracle is an effect which does not follow from any of the regular laws of nature, or which is inconsistent with some known law of it, or contrary to the settled constitution and course of things. Accordingly, all miracles presuppose an established system of nature, within the limits of which they operate, and with the order of which they disagree."

nipotence has inscribed over it its celestial origin, is to trample reason in the dust, and to set up in its place the most inveterate and stupid prejudice.

The question, then, is, did Christ and his apostles perform the miracles attributed to them in the books of the New Testament? and did they appeal to those miracles in confirmation of the message they delivered? In reading the inimitable discourses of Christ, no one can hesitate for a moment as to the nature of the appeal made by Him to miracles. "The works," said He, "which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me." "The works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me." "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works; that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him." "Believe that I am in the Father and the Father in me; or else believe me for the very work's sake." Here miracles are assumed, upon the ordinary principles of reason, to be a sufficient evidence of Christ's mission from the Father to every impartial and unbiassed mind. So unhesitatingly did Jesus of Nazareth use this argument, that when the disciples of John came to him to inquire whether he was indeed the Christ, his only reply was, "Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them."* And when the apostles of our Lord allude, at any time, to the power by which they perform their several miracles, they invariably refer to the all-potent charm of "that name which is above every name;" as when the helpless paralytic was healed at the beautiful gate of the Temple—"If we, this day," said Peter, "be examined of the good deed done to the impotent man, by what means he is made whole; be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole."

The whole question of miracles, then, must resolve itself into a matter of fact. And the attempt of Hume and others to blink the fact, by assuming the insufficency of any testimony to transmit the knowledge of a miraculous occurrence, is neither more nor less than to affirm, that if God should at any time see fit to perform a miracle, in attestation of some message of mercy to a ruined race, he could not adopt any method by which the certain evidence of its occurrence could be preserved from age to age.† It is not surely, the spirit of sound philosophy in which any man asserts that a miracle is contrary to experience. It may not, indeed, come under the head of the ordinary experience of mankind; but that it is contrary to it cannot be shown. According to our ordinary experience, bodily disease, when successfully removed, is subdued by the influence of certain human remedies which God is pleased to bless. According to the wonderful history of the gospel, disease is often rebuked by a word, a look, an exercise of the secret will of the miraculous agent. But what is there, we ask, in these two distinct classes of facts opposed to each other? They may each, indeed, belong to a distinct chain of causation; they may be totally independent events; they may admit and require various kinds of proof; but he who says that they are contrary the one to the other, utters a sentiment opposed to true philosophy, and commits his good sense in his zeal to overturn the evidence of the gospel. "To pronounce a miracle to be false," says a distinguished writer, "because it is different from experience, is only to conclude against its general existence from the very circumstance which constitutes its particular nature; for if it were not different from experience, where would be its singularity? Or what particular proof could be drawn from it if it happened according to the ordinary train of human events, or was included in the operation of the general laws of nature? We grant that it does differ from experience; but we do not presume to make our experience the standard of the divine conduct."‡

We hear much among infidel writers of the immutability of the laws of nature; but whence do they learn that these laws are never to be infringed on by the omnipotent will of the Infinite Mind? It is surely no proof that the Almighty is a changeable being because he either creates a world, or acts according to his own infinite perfections in governing it. There is often a great deal of assumption in the use of the terms "laws of nature," "course of nature," &c., as employed by writers of a sceptical turn. If in the use of such terms it were only intended to assert, that the Most High has subjected the material universe to the government of certain great laws, which act uniformly, except when he is pleased to suspend or to counteract them, there could be no objection whatever to the phraseology employed; but when they are spoken of as a kind of intelligent and independent power; when they are described as something almost distinct from the continued exercise of the divine behest; when they are regarded as an imperative control, binding even the will of Deity itself, they are placed in an imposing light, to which they have no conceivable title. "Our knowledge of the ordinary course of things, though limited, is yet real; and therefore it is essential to a miracle, both that it differs from that course, and be accompanied with peculiar and unequivocal signs of such difference. We have been told, that the course of nature is fixed and unalterable; and therefore it is not consistent with the immutability of God to perform miracles. But, surely, they who reason in this manner beg the point in question. We have no right to assume that the Deity has ordained such general laws as will exclude his interposition; and we cannot suppose that he would forbear to interfere where any important end could be answered. This interposition, though it controls, in particular cases, the energy, does not diminish the utility of those laws. It leaves them to fulfil their own proper purposes, and effects only a distinct purpose, for which they were not calculated. If the course of nature implies the laws of matter and motion, into which the most opposite phenomena may be resolved, it is certain that we do not yet know them in their full extent; and, therefore, that events which are related by judicious and disinterested persons, and at the same time imply no gross contradiction, are possible in themselves, and capable of a certain degree of proof. If the course of nature implies the whole order of events which God has ordained for the government of the world, it includes both his ordinary and extraordinary dispensations, and among them miracles may have their place as a part of the universal plan. It is, indeed, consistent with sound philosophy, and not inconsistent with pure religion, to acknowledge that they might be disposed by the Supreme Being at the same time with the more ordinary effects of his power; that their causes and occasions might be arranged with the same regularity; and that in reference chiefly to their concomitant circumstances of persons and time, to the specific ends for which they were employed, and to our idea of the immediate necessity there is for a divine agent, miracles would differ from common events, in which the hand of God acts as efficaciously, though less visibly. On this consideration of the subject, miracles, instead of contradicting nature, might form a part of it. But what our limited reason and scanty experience may comprehend, should never be represented as a full and exact view of the possible or actual varieties which exist in the works of God."*

It is daring and presumptuous in the extreme to attempt, by reasonings à priori, to set aside the physical possibility of a miracle, or to assume that human testimony is inadequate to the task of rendering it available to the conviction of mankind. If the argument à priori is at all to be admitted in a question of mere fact, where the senses were originally appealed to, it were easy to show that the miraculous attestations of the gospel are entitled to all the benefits which it can possibly yield. No one can prove that it is contrary to the determined arrangements of Divine Providence that miracles should be wrought; no one can assert, in the spirit of true science, that it may not have been a part of the great scheme of God's moral government thus to step aside from the rule of his ordinary procedure; no one can advisedly say that if an occasion worthy of miraculous interposition should present itself to the divine omniscience, God would fail to grant such interposition; no one can seriously contemplate the professed objects of Christianity, or examine in detail its wondrous provisions, without being constrained to admit, that it furnishes an occasion worthy of some unusual effort of omnipotence; and no one can calmly survey the miraculous facts recorded in the gospel history without feeling that they are admirably adapted to attest as divine the several communications to which they belong. A priori, I should say, that nothing is more reasonable than to suppose, first, that God would furnish his erring and sorrowful children with a revelation of his merciful designs; and, second, that he would so attest that revelation with the finger of omnipotence as to leave all without excuse who did not embrace its inestimable provisions. If any one is bold enough to affirm that testimony is an insufficient medium for the conveyance of a miraculous history, he should be prepared to go the whole length of his extravagant assumption, and to maintain, that no revelation could at any time be imparted by God to his creatures, because human testimony, the only method of transmitting historic facts, was insufficient to the task of conveying to the next and to succeeding generations the evidence of such revelation having been imparted. There is no end to vague conjecture if it is allowed to usurp the province of sound reason, and to dictate, before hand, what may and what may not be proper in the Almighty to do. There is no sure way of knowing what God may do, but by ascertaining what he has done; and this can only be known through the medium of that testimony, the accuracy of which admits of being tested by rules which cannot deceive.

* The last clause of this appeal is founded on the argument for Christianity which is derived from prophecy, and which will be glanced at in a subsequent part of this treatise. It was a distinct part of Messiah's prophetic character that when he appeared he should "preach glad tidings to the meek"—that is, to the poor.—Isaiah, lxi. 1.

I would state the argument, then, on behalf of the miracles of the New Testament in some such way as the following:—The gospel history informs us that both Christ and his apostles wrought miracles; it shows us that those miracles were appealed to as evidences of their divine mission; and it presents every direct and collateral mark of authenticity and truth which can possibly belong to any document of antiquity. It is admitted, on all hands, that Jesus of Nazareth actually lived and died in Judea; that his followers became zealous and successful in the propagation of his cause after his death; and that they were surrounded by many inveterate enemies, both among their own countrymen and the Gentiles. In the midst of danger, and in opposition to all their own worldly interests, they persevered even unto death. The cause they espoused was at all times open to the gaze of subtle and fierce enemies, who would have been more than happy to detect any imposture, and who would have been eagle-eyed to discover any pretension to the exercise of the mighty power of God which was not actually possessed. The persecutors of Jesus of Nazareth had their attention drawn to his miracles, which could no longer be hid in a corner; and, unable to account for them, and anxious to prevent their mighty effect, they attributed them to satanic power. The cause, however, spread with amazing rapidity, and the death of the Master but added fresh energy to the cause of his disciples. For a time, indeed, through the weakness of their faith, they were filled with gloomy forebodings; but, according to his own prediction, their divine Leader rose from the dead; with powers of tongues and gifts of healing they went forth in his name; his resurrection they openly proclaimed in the city of Jerulalem; thousands of impenitent Jews laid down the weapons of their hostility; the miracles of Christ and his apostles were acknowledged by multitudes as indubitable matters of fact; and their fame spread throughout the whole world. Had they been mere impostures, they would have been speedily detected; on the contrary, however, they drew down the peculiar notice of heathen writers, and Celsus himself finds no better method of disposing of them than by absurdly attributing them to a skilful use of the arts of magic on the part of Christ's disciples.*

The following things are clear respecting Christ's miracles: They were of such a nature as to surpass all efforts of human power or skill. By them, and without the intervention of second causes, the blind received their sight, the paralytic instantly walked, the lepers were cleansed. By them five loaves and two small fishes were multiplied so as to become food for thousands; by them simple water was converted into wine; by them the stormy tempest was hushed into an immediate calm; by them the spirits of darkness were compelled to depart from those unhappy victims whom they had been suffered to possess; and by them, once and again, the dead were restored to life, and became the resistless witnesses of a supernatural interposition. Now, in all these cases, every human being was an equally sufficient judge; from the very nature of the facts it was impossible that any one could be deceived; the finger of God was so distinctly palpable, that both sense and reason combined to verify the true nature of the events.

Again, the miracles of Christ were done in public, at the doors of the Jewish temple, in the places of public resort, when he had been preaching to thousands, and when thousands were the actual subjects of them.

They were, moreover, of such a nature that no collusion, no magical art, no legerdemain, no kind of deception, could have been practised.

They were wrought in the presence of persons full of enmity and cruel hatred, who would not have failed to lay open the entire imposture, had any existed; but so confounded were the Scribes and Pharisees at the sight of them, that they sought relief from their unhappy impressions, by representing Jesus of Nazareth as in league with the great spirit of darkness.

The accounts of these miracles were, soon after their occurrence, published to the world, in the very places where they happened; yet no evidence can be adduced to show that a single contemporary of the Saviour was found bold enough to deny the fact of their occurrence; nor indeed can it be shown that any attempt of this kind was made* till long after Christ had ascended to heaven. "Here, it may be demanded, When could the belief of such transactions have been obtruded on mankind, if they had never happened? Surely not in the age when they were said to have been witnessed by tens of thousands, who were publicly challenged to deny them if they could! Not in any subsequent age; for the origin of Christianity was ascribed to them, and millions must have been persuaded that they had always believed those things of which they had never till that time so much as heard."†

Having offered the preceding remarks on the miracles of Christ, I would just observe, that the miracles recorded in the Old Testament Scriptures belong to the same great system of truth, and are supported by similar evidence. Infidels have spoken of the Patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations as if altogether distinct from the religion of Christ; but this is a gross mistake, as Christianity is the consummation of all those institutions which are embodied in the Jewish Scriptures. The miraculous fact of a universal deluge is abundantly confirmed by all the researches of geologists, and the organic remains of a former world must leave those inexcusable who reject the data of revelation. And with regard to the miraculous history of the Israelites in Egypt, at the Red Sea, in the Wilderness, and in Canaan, the facts of that history and the national monuments which, from the earliest ages, were fixed on to perpetuate it, combine to relieve the mind from the slightest suspicion as to its genuineness. "Can any man of common sense think that Moses and Aaron could possibly have persuaded the whole nation of Israel that they had witnessed all the plagues of Egypt, passed through the Red Sea with the waters piled on each side of them, gathered the manna every morning, and seen all the wonders recorded in their history, had no such events taken place? If, then, that generation could not be imposed on, when could the belief of these extraordinary transactions be palmed upon the nation? Surely it would have been impossible in the next age to persuade them that their fathers had seen and experienced such wonderful things when they had never before heard a single word about them in all their lives, and when an appeal must have been made to them, that these were things well known among them! What credit could have been obtained to such a forgery at any subsequent period? It would have been absolutely necessary, in making the attempt, to persuade the people that such traditions had always been current among them; that the memory of them had for ages been perpetuated by days and ordinances, observed by all the nation; and that their whole civil and religious establishment had thence originated: and could this possibly have been effected if they all knew that no such memorials and traditions had ever been heard of among them?"‡

I cannot deny myself the pleasure of furnishing my readers with a remarkably clear and beautiful account of the mira-

* Justin Martyr, Apol. I, chap. xxxvii., assures us that the early apologists for Christianity insisted more on the argument from prophecy than from miracles, because, when they appealed to miracles, the enemies of the truth retorted upon them, by attributing the entire miraculous phenomena of the gospel to the power of magic. The apologists were wrong, but the fact speaks volumes as to the reality of the miracles recorded by the Evangelists.

* The fable that the disciples stole the body of Jesus will be dealt with in its own proper place; It is evident, however, that no use was made of it by the Jews where it could have been most available; in fact, it was too absurd to be gravely referred to;

cles of the Mosaic dispensation furnished by the ingenious author of "Theological Institutes," who has already been referred to.*

"Out," says he, "of the numerous miracles wrought by the agency of Moses, we select, in addition to those mentioned in chap. ix., the plague of DARKNESS. Two circumstances are to be noted in the relation given of the event. (Exod. x.) It continued three days, and it afflicted the Egyptians only, for "all the children of Israel had light in their dwellings." The fact here mentioned was of the most public kind; and had it not taken place, every Egyptian and every Israelite could have contradicted the account. The phenomenon was not produced by any eclipse of the sun, for no eclipse of that luminary can endure so long. Some of the Roman writers mention a darkness by day so great that persons were unable to know each other; but we have no historical account of any other darkness so long continued as this, and so intense that the Egyptians "rose not up from their places for three days." But if any such circumstance had occurred, and a natural cause could have been assigned for it, yet even then the miraculous character of this event would remain unshaken; for to what but to a supernatural cause could the distinction made between the Israelites and the Egyptians be attributed, when they inhabited a portion of the same country, and when their neighbourhoods were immediately adjoining? Here then are the characters of a miracle. The established course of natural causes and effects is interrupted by an operation upon that mighty element, the atmosphere. That it was not a chance irregularity in nature, is made apparent from the effect following the volition of a man acting in the name of the Lord of Nature, and from its being restrained by that to a certain part of the same country; 'Moses stretched out his hand,' and the darkness prevailed, every where but in the dwellings of his own people. The fact has been established by former arguments; and the fact being allowed, the miracle follows of necessity.

"The destruction of the FIRST-BORN of the Egyptians may be next considered. Here, too, are several circumstances to be carefully noted. This judgment was threatened in the presence of Pharaoh, before any of the other plagues were brought upon him and his people. The Israelites also were forwarned of it. They were directed to slay a lamb, sprinkle the blood upon their door-posts, and prepare for their departure that same night. The stroke was inflicted upon the first-born of the Egyptians only, and not upon any other part of the family; it occurred in the same house; the first-born of the Israelites escaped without exception, and the festival of 'the passover' was from that night instituted in remembrance of the event. Such a festival could not in the nature of the thing be established in any subsequent age, in commemoration of an event which never occurred; and if instituted at the time, the event must have taken place, for by no means could this large body of men have been persuaded that their first-born had been saved, and those of the Egyptians destroyed, if the facts had not been before their eyes. The history, therefore, being established, the miracle follows; for the order of nature is sufficiently known to warrant the conclusion, that, if a pestilence were to be assumed as the agent of this calamity, an epidemic disease, however rapid and destructive, comes not upon the threat of a mortal, and makes no such selection as the first-born of every family.

"The miracle of dividing the waters of the RED SEA has already been mentioned, but merits more particular consideration. In this event we observe, as in others, circumstances which exclude all possibility of mistake or collusion. The subject of the miracle; the witness of it the host of Israel, who passed through on foot, and the Egyptian nation, who lost their king and his whole army. The miraculous characters of the event are:—the waters are divided and stand up on each side; the instrument is a strong east wind, which begins its operation upon the water, at the stretching-out of the hand of Moses, and ceases at the same signal, and that at the precise moment when the return of the waters would be the most fatal to the Egyptian pursuing army.

"It has, indeed, been asked whether they were not some ledges of rocks where the water was shallow, so that an army, at particular times, might pass over; and whether the Etesian winds, which blow strongly all summer from the north-west, might not blow so violently against the sea as to keep it back 'on a heap.' But if there were any force in these questions, it is plain that such suppositions would leave the destruction of the Egyptians unaccounted for. To show that there is no weight in them at all, let the place where the passage of the Red Sea was effected be first noted. Some fix it near Suez, at the head of the gulf; but if there was satisfactory evidence of this, it ought also to be taken into the account that formerly the gulf extended at least twenty-five miles north of Suez, the first place where it terminates at present.* But the names of places, as well as tradition, fix the passage about ten hours journey lower down, at Clysma, or the valley of Bedea. The name given by Moses to the place where the Israelites encamped before the sea was divided was Piha-hiroth, which signifies 'the mouth of the ridge,' or of that chain of mountains which line the western coast of the Red Sea; and as there is but one mouth of that chain through which an immense multitude of men, women, and children, could possibly pass when flying from their enemies, there can be no doubt whatever respecting the situation of Piha-hiroth; and the modern names of conspicuous places in its neighbourhood prove that those by whom such names were given believed that this was the place at which the Israelites passed the sea in safety, and where Pharaoh was drowned. Thus we have close by Piha-hiroth, on the western side of the gulf, a mountain called Attaka, which signifies deliverance. On the eastern coast opposite is a head-land called Ras Musa, or 'the Cape of Moses;' somewhat lower, Harnam Faraun, 'Pharaoh's Springs;' whilst at these places; the general name of the gulf itself is Bahr-al-Kolsum, 'the Bay of Submersion,' in which there is a whirlpool called Birket Faraun, 'the Pool of Pharaoh.' This, then, was the passage of the Israelites; and the depth of the sea here is stated by Bruce, who may be consulted as to these localities, at about fourteen fathoms, and the breadth at between three and four leagues. But there is no 'ledge of rocks;' and, as to the 'Etesian wind,' the same traveller observes, 'If the Etesian, blowing from the north-west in summer, could keep the sea as a wall, on the right, of fifty feet high, still the difficulty would remain of building the wall to the left, or to the north. If the Etesian winds had done this once, they must have repeated it many a time before or since from the same causes.' The wind which actually did blow, according to history, either as an instrument of dividing the waters, or, which is more probable, as the instrument of drying the ground, after the waters were divided by the immediate energy of the Divine power, was not a north wind, but an 'east wind;' and, as Dr. Hales observes, 'seems to be introduced by way of anticipation, to exclude the natural agency which might be afterwards resorted to for solving the miracle; for it is remarkable that the monsoon in the Red Sea blows the summer-half of the year from the north, and the winter-half from the south, neither of which could produce the miracle in question.'

"The miraculous character of this event is, therefore, most strongly marked. An expanse of water, and that water a sea, of from nine to twelve miles broad, known to be exceedingly subject to agitations, is divided, and a wall of water, is formed on each hand, affording a passage on dry land for the Israelites. The phenomenon occurs, too, just as the Egyptian host are on the point of overtaking the fugitives, and ceases at the moment when the latter reach the opposite shore in safety, and when their enemies are in the midst of the passage, in the only position in which the closing of the wall of waters on each side could ensure the entire destruction of so large a force!

"The falling of the MANNA in the wilderness for forty years, is another unquestionable miracle, and one in which there could be neither mistake on the part of those who were sustained by it, nor fraud on the part of Moses. That this event was not produced by the ordinary course of nature, is rendered certain by the fact, that the same wilderness has been travelled by individuals, and by large bodies of men, from the earliest ages to the present, but no such supply of food was ever met with, except on this occasion; and its miraculous character is further marked by the following circumstances: 1. That it fell but six days in the week. 2. That it fell in such prodigious quantities as sustained three millions of souls. 3. That there fell a double quantity every Friday, to serve the Israelites for the next day, which was their Sabbath. 4. That what was gathered on the first five days of the week stank and bred worms if kept above one day; but that which was gathered on Friday kept sweet for two days; and 5. That it continued falling while the Israelites remained in the wilderness, but ceased as soon as they came out of it, and got corn to eat in the land of Canaan. 6. Let these very extraordinary particulars be considered, and they at once confirm the fact, whilst they unequivocally establish the miracle. No people could be deceived in these circumstances; no person could persuade them of their truth if they had not occurred; and the whole was so clearly out of the regular course of nature, as to mark unequivocally the interposition of God. To the majority of the numerous miracles recorded in the Old Testament, the same remarks apply, and upon them the same miraculous characters are as indubitably impressed."

To these remarks I may just add, that the fact of the antiquity, genuineness, and uncorrupted transmission of the books both of the Old and New Testament Scriptures, is sustained by an uninterrupted chain of evidence, which could be adduced in favour of no other document of a remote antiquity, and which ought to have shamed and for ever silenced the opponents of revelation. Even enemies themselves have unwittingly served the cause of truth by adding to this testimony. The Jews are to this day, and have been through every past age, the effective and unanswerable defenders of their own canon; and the enemies of Christianity who arose in the second century and downwards, were valuable coadjutors of the Christian apologists, in alluding to the alleged facts of Christianity, though with a view to refute them. It would be easy to show, not only that the Christian fathers, notwithstanding their many errors and absurdities, served the cause of revelation, by proving the antiquity, genuineness, and uncorrupted character of the sacred text; but that Clesus, and Porphyry, and Julian, to say nothing of the Roman historians, Tacitus and Suetonius, did an immense service, though they intended it not, in endeavouring to refute facts which, if they had never existed, could not have obtained currency in the world.

It is unreasonable, then, in the extreme to refuse credit to the facts of Christianity, standing as they do upon such an irrefragable basis. God has spread over them the shield of omnipotence, and he who will not be convinced by a well-authenticated testimony of miracles would not be persuaded though one actually rose from the dead.

As the resurrection of Christ is a fact of such vital moment in the argument connected with miracles, I shall devote to it the notice of a distinct discussion, hoping thereby to condense into very narrow limits the amount of proof arising to Christianity from the survey of its miraculous character.

2. The argument derived from the Resurrection of Christ.

It must have been remarked by every careful observer, that there are two distinct classes of miracles recorded in the gospel history, those which the facts of Christianity themselves involve, and those which were wrought by our Lord and his apostles in confirmation of the message they delivered. The necessity, perhaps, of the latter class of miracles chiefly originates in the first. A revelation of facts and doctrines altogether supernatural seemed to demand an attestation corresponding to its own nature. It is difficult, indeed, to conceive of the idea of an express and direct revelation from the Infinite Mind without instantly associating it with what is miraculous, and without feeling a sort of intuitive conviction that it will be supported with a species of evidence answering to the wondrous facts which it professes to disclose. Most of the doctrines of revelation far transcend the puny conceptions of finite minds, and some of them are of such a sublime nature that they are to be regarded rather as subjects of humble belief than as topics of querulous dispute.

The resurrection of Christ, in common with his incarnation, his temptation, his transfiguration, and his ascension to the right hand of power, is a fact of a distinctly miraculous character. It is, moreover, a fact which was divinely attested on the day of Pentecost, and, subsequently by indubitable marks of a supernatural interposition.

For a person to rise from the dead is an indisputable manifestation of the mighty power of God; and if it can be shown that Christ actually rose from the dead, according to his own predictions, it must of necessity follow that both the prescience and the omnipotence of Deity were associated with the wondrous event. Many sceptics have been ready to admit, that if the resurrection of Christ could be fully established their opposition to Christianity must cease. It was impossible for them to concede less than this; and the zealous efforts they have made to repudiate the evidence of our Lord's resurrection sufficiently proves their anxiety to get rid of a fact which, if properly established, must, as by some mighty convulsion, shiver infidelity to atoms.

As the doctrine contended for is of such vast importance to the full development of the truth of Christianity, it is a peculiarly happy circumstance that the evidence upon which it stands is of such a diversified and powerful kind; bearing, as it were, an exact proportion to the commanding position which it occupies in the Christian scheme. With the fact of Christ's resurrection from the dead, the whole system of Christianity must stand or fall; to bear witness to this fact the office of apostles was mainly established; upon its reception our salvation vitally depends; and by its all-powerful influence believers are inspired by the animating hope of eternal life.

By this event, also, Christ was "declared to be the Son of God with power;" by it the perfection of his atonement was fully announced; and by it the evidence, pattern, and earnest of the resurrection of all his followers were strikingly displayed. How momentous, then, upon the showing of Christianity itself, is the doctrine of Christ's resurrection! How firm ought our faith to be in the evidence by which it is supported! And how cautious and thoughtful ought he to be who ventures to treat it as an imposture of human device!

In briefly surveying the evidence upon which the doctrine of Christ's resurrection rests, we are naturally led to inquire whether his death actually took place? Here no conceivable difficulty can arise. The fact is admitted both by friends and enemies; and as the Jews procured his crucifixion and thirsted for his blood, there can be no reason to doubt that they would carry the infamous sentence of the law into complete execution. Fully aware of his own predictions that he would rise again, they did not suffer his body to be removed from the cross till every symptom of life was extinct; and so decisive were the marks of dissolution, that the soldiers, perceiving that he was already dead, did not break his legs, according to ordinary custom, when they wished to hasten the death of a particular culprit; but one of their number "pierced his side with a spear, and forthwith came thereout blood and water." Nor did Pilate deliver up his body to be buried till he received direct assurance from the officers in command that the victim of Calvary had actually expired.

Nor was the place of Christ's burial less manifest than the fact of his death. No secrecy was attempted to be practised in this matter by Joseph of Arimathea, or any of the rest of Christ's disciples. The request, indeed, that they might be put in possession of the body of Jesus was complied with; but all their movements were watched with nicest scrutiny, and a Roman watch of sixty soldiers was instantly set over the place of sepulture.

That Christ died, then, and was buried, no one can doubt. Jews and heathens confirm the facts. Yet in a period short of three full days, notwithstanding the strict watch of a Roman guard, the body of Christ, by the admission of the disciples and Pharisees, is removed from the tomb. A rumour of the fact instantly spreads, and enemies and friends have each their particular mode of accounting for it. Which account, then, bears upon it the signature of truth; the disciples or the Jews? They cannot be both true, for they are contradictory. The disciples say that two women, Mary Magdalen and Mary the mother of James and Salome, had repaired to the sepulchre for the purpose of perfuming the body of Christ with Eastern spices, and that an angel appeared to them, rolling away the stone from the door of the sepulchre, and inviting them, in the language of condescension, to look into the now empty tomb, where their Lord had been placed on the evening of the crucifixion, but from whence he had now risen in the exercise of an omnipotent power; it is moreover stated by the disciples, that the women received commission from the angel to announce the fact of Christ's resurrection to the rest of his followers. From the same source we learn, that others subsequently repaired to the tomb and found the body of Christ removed, and only the linen in which it was wrapped left behind; that the fact of an actual resurrection was demonstrated by the appearance of Christ to several of his disciples, both alone and in full assembly; that the eye saw him, that the hand touched him, that the mind entered into fellowship with him, that some enjoyed the benefit of his conversation, partook of food with him, listened to his instructions, received his commands, and for the space of more than five weeks, had more or less intercourse with him; when, at the end of this period, and after he had given commission to his apostles, he finally conducted his disciples to a mountain in Galilee, and rose to his native heavens in their admiring presence.

Such is the account of Christ's resurrection as furnished by his friends. And what is there in the opposite scale? Nothing whatever. It is, said, indeed, by the Sanhedrim, that the disciples stole the body of Jesus while the watch slept! This is verily all, in the shape of fact, that the Jews ever attempted to oppose to the combined testimony of the disciples; and it is so utterly absurd, that nothing but the consternation occasioned by the astounding fact of the resurrection could have tempted them to induce the watch, by an act of bribery, to make such a statement. Either the watch were asleep or awake: if awake, how could an armed body of sixty men have allowed the disciples to rob the tomb of its sacred inhabitant? and if asleep, how could they bear testimony to the fact of the disciples' theft! This wild and extravagant fabrication, however, was speedily abandoned. Not once is it adverted to on those trials of the apostles which soon took place at Jerusalem, on account of their bold and open proclamation of their Master's resurrection. Though the apostles were cited before that very body who had given currency to the report of the disciples' theft, they are not even once taxed with the crime; not a whisper escapes the lips of the Sanhedrim on the subject; not one of all the watch is brought forward to confront the apostles, and to shame them out of their adherence to the imposture of the resurrection; on the contrary, an influential member of the Jewish council advises forbearance to the witnesses of the resurrection, and intimates even the possibility of the event itself. If the Sanhedrim had had the slightest belief of the wicked story invented, would they have adopted such a course? Undoubtedly not. Now was the time to muster all their strong evidence against the facts of the resurrection, and to prevent its further currency among the people; but nothing whatever of this kind is resorted to; persecution and threats are the only weapons employed to check the rising doctrine; and a whole assembly of men, deeply involved in the consequences of the resurrection, not only succumb to the counsel of an individual, but apparently acquiesce in the hypothetical admission that the entire doctrine of the apostles may yet prove itself to be of God.

There is not, then, an atom of contradictory testimony to the fact of the resurrection as stated by the apostles. If we reject their account, we are left in a state of the wildest conjecture as to what became of the body of Jesus. Look, then, at their testimony, and see if it bears along with it the credentials of truth. Upon a review of the gospel history itself, was there any thing improbable in the occurrence of Christ's resurrection? Did he not again and again, in the presence of friends and enemies, predict the event, and point to it as the great seal of his mission? and did he not furnish examples of the same mighty power in the resurrection of Lazarus, and of the widow's son, as well as in many other demonstrations of his eternal power and godhead? Before any one can show that the event of Christ's resurrection was one by no means to be anticipated, he must disprove the entire facts of our Lord's history, and thereby subvert the testimony of Heathens, Jews and Christians. The question is, were the apostles deceived, or did they attempt to deceive others? The former of these could not have been the case; for they had every opportunity of identifying their Lord's person which could possibly be furnished, or which could ever be regarded, by the most scrupulous, as necessary. The very doubts of their own minds contributed to add strength to the conviction which they acquired of their Lord's identity; and for the space of full forty days, they were enabled, in a succession of interviews, to correct any sudden or erroneous impression, and to settle themselves in the triumphant belief that Christ was risen indeed.

Nor was there one sign of an impostor or deceiver attaching to these simple-hearted witnesses of the resurrection. There is no attempt to furnish one uniform record of the transaction. On the contrary, we have four different accounts of the resurrection, so distinct as to show that each writer aimed at truth, and was under no apprehension of discrepancy in his statements; and yet so entirely harmonious that the apparent contradictions only tend to establish the validity and perfect consistency of the history.*

It may be asked, moreover, when and where did the apostles of our Lord begin to proclaim the fact of the resurrection? Why, at the very period of its alleged occurrence, and in the very city of the crucifixion. When they were once convinced of the glorious event themselves, they were bold as lions in its defence, and were not afraid to give utterance to their convictions in the presence of those who must have possessed the best means of detecting the imposture, if any such had been practised. The most subtle and disputatious of the Jewish nation heard their testimony; malice, and wit, and power, were all enlisted against them; but the new doctrine prevailed, and fresh instances of miraculous power, in the gift of tongues, and in the ability to heal all manner of diseases, accredited the apostles as the commissioned servants of the Most High.

"In all other things," observes the late Mr. Scott, "they appeared simple, upright, holy men; but if in this they deceived, the world never yet produced a company of such artful and wicked impostors, whose schemes were so deeply laid, so admirably conducted, and so extensively and permanently successful. For they spent all the rest of their lives in promoting the religion of Jesus, renouncing every earthly interest, facing all kinds of opposition and persecution, bearing contempt and ignominy, prepared habitually to seal their testimony with their blood, and most of them actually dying martyrs in the cause, recommending it with their latest breath as worthy of universal acceptation. It is likewise observable, that, when they went forth to preach Christ as risen from the dead, they were manifestly changed, in almost every respect, from what they before had been; their timidity gave place to the most undaunted courage; their carnal prejudices vanished; their ambitious contests ceased; their narrow views were immensely expanded; and zeal for the honour of the Lord, with love to the souls of men, seem to have engrossed and elevated all the powers of their minds. A more complete human testimony to any event cannot be imagined; for if our Lord had shown himself 'openly to all the people' of the Jews, and their rulers had still persisted in rejecting him, it would have rather weakened than confirmed the evidence; and, if they had unanimously received him as Messiah, it might have excited in others a suspicion that it was a plan concerted for aggrandizing the nation."*

3. The argument derived from Prophecy.

This is a branch of Christian evidence possessing extraordinary power, and capable of very extensive application. The proper idea of prophecy is the foretelling of such future events as no human skill or sagacity could anticipate, and as nothing but the prescience of the Eternal could either know or reveal. This is the test applied of old to the false gods of the heathen; "Show us," said Jehovah to their votaries, "what shall happen; declare us things for to come; show the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods." If it can be shown that the leading facts recorded in Scripture were foretold by omniscience long ere they occurred, it will follow of necessity that a revelation thus accredited is from God. Prophecy is, indeed, a species of miraculous attestation, challenging the investigation of men in every age, and accumulating new materials of proof as the revolutions of Divine Providence disclose and illustrate the events embodied in the prophetic testimony.

The great object and end of the prophetic dispensation was evidently to testify "before-hand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow," and to this object and end all the predictions of Scripture might be shown more or less to contribute.

I shall begin, therefore, with those prophecies which relate more immediately to the Messiah; and if it should appear, from a survey of facts, that there were many prophecies uttered concerning Him which no human skill or forethought could have ventured to announce, and which have realized a minute and circumstantial accomplishment, it will then follow, that they furnish a convincing testimony to his character as the Son of God, and to his mission as the Saviour of the world. We shall first make the induction of the prophetic testimony, and then inquire how far it is probable that the prophecies of the Jewish Scriptures could have induced the followers of Jesus of Nazareth to endeavour, by their own means, to bring about the events predicted; in other words, to produce a coincidence in the life of Jesus to the anticipations of the prophets.

The minuteness both of the predictions and the fulfilments will, perhaps, surprise those who have not closely examined this most interesting topic. In the text referred to in the notes, the prophecy and its accomplishment will be placed in immediate contact, so that those who wish to examine this subject for themselves may see how utterly impossible it was for any thing like chance or human imposture to have furnished such an exquisite harmony.†

who was to bruise the head of the serpent.(a) This mysterious personage was to be of the seed of Abraham.(b) He was to belong to the tribe of Judah.(c) He was to be a member of the royal house of David.(d) He was to be born at Bethlehem Judah, the city of David.(e) He was to be miraculously conceived and born of a virgin.(f) He was to be carried into Egypt and called out of it.(g) He was to have Elias, or John the Baptist as his forerunner.(h) He was to confirm his mission and doctrine by miracles. (i) He was to make a public though lowly entrance into Jerusalem, riding upon a colt, the foal of an ass.(j) He was to be rejected of his own countrymen the Jews.(k) He was to be betrayed by one of his disciples.(l) He was to be sold for thirty pieces of silver.(m) He was to be scourged, mocked, and spit upon.(n) He was to be nailed to the cross, by his hands and his feet.(o) He was to be numbered with the transgressors.(p) He was to be mocked and reviled while on the cross.(q) He was to have gall and vinegar to drink.(r) His garments were to be parted, and upon his vesture lots were to be cast.(s) He was to be cut off from the land of the living by a violent death.(t) He was to be pierced, but not a bone of him to be broken.(u) He was to make his grave with the rich.(v) He was not to see corruption.(w) He was to rise from the dead.(x) He was to ascend into heaven, sit at the right hand of God, and pour out the Holy Spirit in his various gifts upon men.(y)

His divine dignity was also distinctly marked in the prophetic testimony. According to the flesh, he was to be of the seed of David; but beyond this there was a view of his character which exhibited him in all the glory of essential and uncreated Godhead. He was to be called Immanuel.(z) He was described as the mighty God.(aa) He was spoken of as Jehovah our righteousness.(bb) He was portrayed as the Son of God.(cc) He was declared to be David's Lord.(dd)

Nor were the offices which Messiah was to sustain overlooked by the omniscient spirit of the prophetic dispensation. He was to be a prophet like unto Moses.(ee) He was to be a priest forever, after the order of Melchisedec.(ff) He was to be an anointed King, on Zion's holy hill,—that is, the Messiah and Sovereign of his church.(gg)

In like manner the spiritual empire of the Son of God is portrayed in the prophetic page. Its nature, its extent, its duration, its blessedness, its happy subjects, are all described.(hh) And though many of the predictions which relate to that empire are not yet fulfilled, and though some of them will not realize their accomplishment till the consummation of all things; yet enough has been fulfilled to show that Christ and his kingdom are the distinct objects of reference, and that what is yet unaccomplished shall ere long have the light of Divine Providence shed upon it.

When I look at the number, minuteness, and singular character of the prophetic testimonies of the Jewish Scriptures to Messiah, and compare them with their exact and circumstantial accomplishment in the person, office, and empire of Jesus of Nazareth, I am equally astounded at the unbelief of Jews and Infidels. How can they resist such a flood of light? Upon any conceivable scheme of adjustment, how can they, in their present state of mind, account for the predictions and their fulfilment! Let it be remembered that Christians did not construct the prophecies; they formed part of a document in the hands of their bitterest enemies; and let it be equally remembered, that the principal facts in the history of the Son of God which verify the prophecies, were realities which the most inveterate infidels have been compelled to admit. Let the wondrous coincidence, then, be accounted for on any other principle but the admission of a great scheme of prophecy originating in the divine prescience, and intended to vindicate the claims of a revelation which has been vouchsafed by God to his bewildered and erring children.

I know of no method of evading the force of the argument derived from prophecy, but by the supposition, that the apostles of our Lord, finding in the Jewish Scriptures a vast number of predictive statements, concerning an illustrious personage who was to rise up in the nation of Israel, accommodated themselves, with their leader, to the scheme thus perceived by them. But the entire character and conduct of the men, their benevolence, their contempt for every thing like human ambition and applause, the purity and integrity of their manners, their fearless exposure of themselves to persecution and death, the total absence of any thing like inferior motive to sustain them, forbids us, upon all the ordinary calculations of human nature, to conceive of them as heartless deceivers and villains. If they were so, it may be safely affirmed that they acted a part the very opposite of all the other impostors that ever lived.

But supposing they were deceivers, and that they made themselves agents to the fulfilment of the Jewish prophecies; let us see how this can be borne out by the facts of the case. This inquiry is so well met by the present Bishop of Chester, that I cannot do a greater service to my readers than to quote his own words on the subject.

"It may be thought," says he, "that a design like that attributed to the followers of Jesus would be greatly assisted by the prophecies recorded in their national Scriptures, and pointing to some remarkable personage who was expected to appear.

"1. For example: the time of this appearance was fixed by the prophet Daniel at about four hundred and ninety years from his own days; which so closely corresponded with the birth of Jesus, that such an event was looked for, by 'devout persons,' at the very period when it occurred. This would be, as was before observed, a circumstance greatly in their favour.

"2. The next thing to be considered by the framer of this deceit, would be the place of their leader's birth. Jesus was born at Bethlehem. Upon consulting their Scriptures, they would find this passage respecting Bethlehem: 'Thou Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be the ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from of old, for everlasting.' This would prove, beyond what could be anticipated, an assistance of their design.

"3. It seemed to be intimated in the prophecies, that the deliverer who was to come should be preceded by a forerunner, who might awaken the attention of the people to him. For it was written, 'The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make straight in the desert a highway for our God.' And again, 'Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me; and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come into his temple.' Now it was notorious that a singular character, John, called 'the Baptist,' had appeared a short time before Jesus began his ministry, pretending to be this messenger, and nothing more, and directing his followers to one who was to 'come after him.' This was another coincidence equally wonderful and favourable.

"4 Further, as to the most important parts: the way in which Jesus had lived, and had been received, and died. His character, as represented in the Gospels, had been peculiar in every respect; but especially remarkable for the union of meekness and constancy which it displayed.

"Of unknown origin and humble parentage, he had attracted considerable notice, and many followers; yet he had not been generally acknowledged among his countrymen, and those who adhered to him were not the great and powerful. His life, upon the whole, was one of trial and hardship, not one of triumph and exaltation. In the end, he was sentenced to death with the notoriously wicked; and suffered a punishment, which even his judge confessed that his conduct had not deserved. Yet, though dying with malefactors, he was laid in a rich and honourable tomb.

"A character answering this description was portrayed by that prophet who had always been considered as most particular in what respected the future Messiah.

"It cannot be denied that the existence of these ancient prophecies would be very advantageous to men setting out with the purpose in question. But it is time to ask in our turn, how they came to find these prophecies ready to their hand? prophecies of such a nature, that no man could have contrived a scheme dependent upon them, because they could not command the fact by which they were to be fulfilled. With respect to the birth-place, for example: in order that it might happen to be Bethlehem, it was requisite that a general census should be held, convening all the inhabitants of the country to their chief town; by which means alone the mother of Jesus was called away from her usual residence, and her infant born at Bethlehem, instead of Nazareth. The preparatory ministry of the Baptist was equally beyond the control of the disciples. So were the minute details of incidents, which agree in a wonderful manner with the circumstantial narrative. The entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem, at once humble and triumphant.(a) The manner of his death, and his own countrymen the cause. The peculiar indignities which he underwent: the very words of mockery used against him.(b) The price which Judas received for his treachery. The purpose to which that money was applied.(c)

"Passages of this nature could not have been introduced by the apostles into the existing scriptures, because, as their countrymen were generally hostile to the design, such an attempt must have proved fatal to their pretensions. And further, because the books among which these scattered sentences are found, had now been extensively diffused during a period of three hundred years in a foreign language, defying the imposture of the whole nation, if the whole nation had concurred in the design.

"We are reduced, then, to the necessity of supposing that the followers of Jesus, desiring to deify their teacher, selected from their national Scriptures these pointed allusions to circumstances like his, which happened to be written there, and brought them forward to confirm his pretensions.

"But surely to ascribe coincidences like these to chance, to allege that all these passages were thrown out at random in the Jewish Scriptures, and that the circumstances of the birth, and life, and character, and death of Jesus, turned out so as to agree with them, is to attribute to chance what never did or could take place by chance; and in itself far more improbable than the event which such a solution is intended to disprove. For, allow to Jesus the authotity which he claims, and every difficulty vanishes. We should then expect to find prophetic intimations of his great purpose, and of the way in which it was to be effected. We should expect to find them, too, just what they are; not united and brought together in a way of formal description, which could only be a provision for imposture; but such scattered hints and allusions as, after the event has occurred, serve to show that it was predicted, by a comparison of the event and the prophecy.

"It ought to be observed, in addition, that if the disciples of Jesus had framed their story and their representation of facts, with a view of obtaining this collateral support, they would have been more diligent and ostentatious in pointing out the circumstances of resemblance. They would have anticipated the labours of those writers who have made it their business to show the completion of prophecy in the events related in the gospels. But, on the contrary, they bring these things forward in an historical rather than an argumentative way, and commonly leave the deductions which may be drawn from them to the discernment of after times."*

I must be allowed to remark, before dismissing this branch of evidence, that though the prophecies of the Old and New Testaments chiefly relate to the Messiah, and are all so constructed as, in their accomplishment, to add strength to the evidence which confirms the Christian revelation, they are by no means confined to the delineation of his character and claims. They occupy a range most extensive, and carry the mind over the eventful history of the Jewish nation, and of almost all the nations of heathen antiquity. Let it never be forgotten, that Nineveh's predicted ruin has come upon it; that Babylon, in all its boasted splendour, has been "swept with the besom of threatened destruction;" that Tyre, the great port of the ancient world, has become, according to the warnings of Ezekiel, a place only for the drying of fishermen's nets; that Egypt, the mother of arts, has become "the basest of kingdoms," and has never since been able "to exalt herself among the nations," as if to show that all the events of futurity are naked and open to that omniscient Spirit who foretold her doom, and predicted her permanent humiliation.

Nor, in contemplating the great scheme of prophecy, and the support which it yields to the truth of Revelation, must we lose sight of the destines of the Jewish nation.* In the fearful destruction of Jurusalem by the Roman army; in the dispersion and long-continued peculiarity of the seed of Abraham; in the contempt, persecution, and infamy which they have so long endured; in the promulgation of the gospel among Gentile tribes; in the many and hateful corruptions of the religion of Jesus which have been introduced through the medium of Anti-Christian powers; and in the preservation and growing triumphs of the Christian faith, we have such indubitable fulfilments of the prophetic record, that he who refuses to embrace, as divine, the wondrous volume

* "The Evidence of Christianity derived from its Nature and Reception." By John Bird Sumner, D.D., Lord Bishop of Chester. Fourth Edition. 12mo. pp. 124—133.

* "'The great lawgiver of the Jews,' observes Mr. Horne, (in his Introduction, vol. i. p. 327), foretold that they should be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth,—scattered among all people from one end of the earth, even unto the other,—find no ease or rest,—be oppressed and crushed always,—be left few in number among the heathen,—pine away in their iniquity in their enemies' land,—and become an astonishment, a proverb, and a bye-word unto all nations. These predictions were literally fulfilled during their subjection to the Chaldeans and Romans; and, in later times, in all the nations where they have been dispersed. Moses foretold that their enemies would besiege and take their cities; and this prophecy was fulfilled by Shishak, King of Egypt; Shalmaneser, King of Assyria; Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus, Epiphanes, Sosius, and Herod; and finally by Titus. Moses foretold that such grievous famines should prevail during those sieges, that they should eat the flesh of their sons and daughters. This prediction was fulfilled about six hundred years after the time of Moses, when Samaria was besieged by the King of Syria; also, about nine hundred years after that time, among the Jews, during the siege of Jerusalem, before the Babylonish captivity; and finally, fifteen hundred years after, at the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans. Though the Hebrews were to be as the stars of heaven for multitude, Moses predicted that they should be few in number, and his prophecy was fulfilled: for, in the last siege of Jerusalem, Josephus tells us that an infinite multitude perished by famine; and he computes the total number who perished by it, and by the war in Jerusalem, and other parts of Judea, at one million two hundred and forty thousand four hundred and ninety, besides ninety-nine thousand two hundred who were made prisoners, and sold unto their enemies for bondmen and bondwomen; and after their last overthrow by Hadrian, many thousands of them were sold; and those for whom purchasers could not be found (Moses foretold that no man would buy them) were transported into Egypt, where they perished by shipwreck or famine, or were massacred by the inhabitants. Since the destruction of Jerusalem, they have been scattered among all nations; among whom they have found no ease, nor have the soles of their feet had rest; they have been oppressed and spoiled evermore, especially in the East, where the tyranny exercised over them is so severe, as to afford a literal fulfilment of the prediction of Moses,—Thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have no assurance of thy life. Yet, notwithstanding all their oppressions, they have still continued a separate people, without incorporating with the nations; and they have become an astonishment and a bye-word among all the nations whither they have been carried since their punishment has been inflicted. The very name of a Jew has been used as a term of peculiar reproach and infamy. Finally, it was foretold, that their plagues should be wonderful, even great plagues, and of long continuance. And have not their plagues continued more than seventeen hundred years? In comparison of them, their former captivities were very short; during their captivity in Chaldea, Ezekiel and Daniel prophesied; but now they have no true prophet to foretell the end of their calamities. What nation has suffered so much, and yet endured so long? What nation has subsisted as a distinct people in their own country so long as the Jews have done in their dispersion into all countries? And what a STANDING MIRACLE is thus exhibited to the world in the fulfilment, at this very time, of prophecies delivered considerably more than three thousand years ago! What a permanent attestation is it to the divine legation of Moses!"

of which it forms such a distinguished part, sins against all the laws of moral evidence, and, at the same time, risks his eternal salvation by rejecting the council of God against himself.

4. The evidence of Christianity derived from a correct estimate of its early success.

It would be most inconclusive to infer the supernatural origin of Christianity from the mere fact of its success; inasmuch as some of the greatest impostures the world ever knew have obtained, for many ages, a most powerful and extensive dominion over the human mind. The early prevalence of the gospel is, in itself, no decisive proof of its divine origin. Ere it can be regarded as such, a number of circumstances must combine with the fact of its success, which admit of no just or rational solution but the admission of the finger of God. The question then is, did such circumstances evince themselves in the early triumphs of Christianity? And, if they did, wherein did they consist? and how do they admit of being exhibited in the shape of a conclusive argument for the truth and divinity of the gospel?

It is then a fact that Jesus of Nazareth was put to death in the reign of Tiberius, by the order of Pontius Pilate, his Procurator.* It is a fact that as early as the time of Claudius, who died within twenty years of the crucifixion, the religious assemblies of the Christians were proscribed under open pretext that they were withdrawing men from the worship of the gods.† It is a fact, that in the reign of Nero, the followers of Christ endured persecutions of the most fearful kind, and that this wicked despot endeavoured to fix upon them the stigma of burning Rome, though it was justly and loudly charged on himself.‡ It is a fact that Pliny the younger, a Proconsul under the Emperor Trajan, who was contemporary with Ignatius, and who flourished about seventy-five years after the death of Christ, describes the Christian assemblies in Bithynia and Pontus as consisting of "a vast multitude"§ of all ages and sexes, and speaks of Christianity as an inveterate superstition which had spread itself, not only through cities, but over villages and the whole country.* It is a fact, that Christian churches were established in every province of the Roman empire within a very brief period of the death of Christ,† and that thousands and tens of thousands of new converts maintained, with unshaken confidence, their adherence to the facts and promises of the gospel amidst the heaviest persecutions and calamities that ever befel mortals in this vale of tears. It is a fact that the first propagators of Christianity were only fishermen of Galilee, and that they sought and obtained no aid from human power in the prosecution of their extraordinary undertaking. It is a fact, that the experiment of Christianity was made in one of the most enlightened and refined periods in the history of the world, and on a theatre which laid it open to the scrutiny and detection of all Greece and Rome. It is a fact, that the first messengers of the cross entered into no compromise with

* See Tacitus, Anal. xv. 44. † See Suetonius in Claud. 25.

‡ See Tacitus, as above. I give Paley's translation. "But neither these exertions, nor his largesses to the people, nor his offerings to the gods, did away the infamous imputation under which Nero lay, of having ordered the city to be set on fire. To put an end therefore to this report, he laid the guilt and inflicted the most cruel punishments upon a set of people who were held in abhorrence for their crimes, and called by the vulgar, Christians. The founder of that name was Christ, who suffered death in the reign of Tiberius, under his Procurator, Pontius Pilate. The pernicious superstition, thus checked for a while, broke out again, and spread not only over Judea, where the evil originated, but through Rome also, whither every thing bad upon earth finds its way, and is practised. Some who confessed their sect were first seized; and afterwards, by their information, a vast multitude were apprehended, who were convicted, not so much of the crime of burning Rome, as of hatred to mankind. Their sufferings and their execution were aggravated by insult and mockery, for some were disguised in the skins of wild beasts and worried to death by dogs, some were crucified, and others were wrapt in pitched shirts, and set on fire when the days closed, that they might serve as lights to illuminate the night. Nero lent his own gardens for these executions; and exhibited at the same time a mock Circensian entertainment, being a spectator of the whole in the dress of a charioteer, sometimes mingling with the crowd on foot, and sometimes viewing the spectacle from his car. This conduct made the sufferers pitied; and though they were criminals, and deserving the severest punishments, yet they were considered as sacrificed, not so much out of regard to the public good, as to gratify the cruelty of one man."

§ "Ingens multitudo," a vast multitude, is the historian's expression. I insert the whole letter according to Milner's translation, though he has not preserved the full force of the original in his rendering of this expression.

"C. Pliny to Trajan, Emperor.

"Health.—It is my usual custom, Sir, to refer all things of which I harbour any doubts to you. For who can better direct my judgment in its hesitation, or instruct my understanding in its ignorance? I never had the fortune to be present at any examination of Christians before I came into this province. I am, therefore, at a loss to determine what is the usual object either of inquiry or of punishment, and to what length either of them is to be carried. It has also been with me a question very problematical, whether any distinction should be made between the young and the old, the tender and the robust;—whether any room should be given for repentance, or the guilt of Christianity once incurred is not to be expiated by the most unequivocal retraction;—whether the name itself, abstracted from any flagitiousness of conduct, or the crimes connected with the name, be the object of punishment. In the mean time, this has been my method, with respect to those who were brought before me as Christians. I asked them whether they were Christians: if they pleaded guilty, I interrogated them twice afresh, with a menace of capital punishment. In case of obstinate perseverance, I ordered them to be executed. For of this I had no doubt, whatever was the nature of their religion, that a sullen and obstinate inflexibility called for the vengeance of the magistrate. Some where infected with the same madness whom, on account of their privilege of citizenship, I reserved to be sent to Rome to be referred to your tribunal. In the course of this business, informations pouring in, as is usual when they are encouraged, more cases occurred. An anonymous libel was exhibited with a catalogue of names of persons, who yet declared that they were not Christians then, or ever had been; and they repeated after me an invocation of the gods and of your image, which, for this purpose, I had ordered to be brought with the images of the deities;—they performed sacred rites with wine and frankincense, and execrated Christ; none of which things, I am told, a real Christian can ever be compelled to do. On this account I dismissed them. Others, named by an informer, first affirmed, and then denied the charge of Christianity; declaring that they had been Christians, but had ceased to be so; some three years ago, others still longer, some even twenty years ago. All of them worshipped your image and the statues of the gods, and also execrated Christ. And this was the account which they gave of the nature of the religion they once had professed, whether it deserves the name of crime or error;—namely, that they were accustomed, on a stated day, to meet before day-light, and to repeat among themselves an hymn to Christ as to a god, and to bind themselves by an oath, with an obligation of not committing any wickedness, but, on the contrary, of abstaining from thefts, robberies, and adulteries;—also of not violating their promise, or denying a pledge;—after which, it was their custom to separate, and meet again at a promiscuous harmless meal, from which last practice they however desisted after the publication of my edict, in which, agreeably to your orders, I forbade any societies of that sort; on which account, I judged it the more necessary to inquire, BY TORTURE, from two females, who were said to be deaconesses, what is the real truth. But nothing could I collect, except a depraved and excessive superstition. Deferring, therefore, any further investigation, I determined to consult you; for the number of culprits is so great, as to call for serious consultation. Many persons are informed against, of every age, and both sexes; and more still will be in the same situation. The contagion of the superstition hath spread, not only through cities, but even villages and the country. Not that I think it impossible to check and to correct it. The success of my endeavours hitherto forbids such desponding thoughts; for the temples, once almost desolate, begin to be frequented, and the sacred solemnities, which had long been intermitted, are now attended afresh; and the sacrificial victims are now sold everywhere, which once could scarce find a purchaser. Whence I conclude, that many might be reclaimed were the hope of impunity, on repentance, absolutely confirmed."

The Emperor Trajan's reply to Pliny.

"You have done perfectly right, my dear Pliny, in the inquiry which you have made concerning Christians. For truly no one general rule can be laid down which will apply itself to all cases. These people must not be sought after: if they are brought before you and convicted, let them be capitally punished, yet with this restriction, that if any renounce Christianity, and evidence his sincerity by supplicating our gods, however suspected he may be for the past, he shall obtain pardon for the future, on his repentance. But anonymous libels in no case ought to be attended to; for the precedent would be of the worst sort, and perfectly incongruous to the maxims of my government."

* See Plin. Epist. Lib. x. Ep. 91.

† "The rapidity and extent of the propagation of the gospel were such as to prove its divine origin. On the very first day of its promulgation, three thousand were converted; these soon increased to five thousand. Multitudes, both of men and women, were afterwards daily added to the new religion. Before the end of thirty years, the gospel had spread through Judea, Galilee, Samaria, almost all the numerous districts of Lesser Asia; through Greece, and the Islands of the Ægean Sea, and the sea-coast of Africa, and had passed on to the capital of Italy. Great multitudes believed at Antioch in Syria, at Joppa, Ephesus, Corinth, Thessalonica, Berœa, Iconium, Derbe, Antioch in Pisidia, at Lydda and Saron. Converts also, are mentioned at Tyre, Cæsarea, Troas, Athens, Philippi, Lystra, Damascus. Thus far the sacred narrative conducts us. The religion being thus widely diffused, the New Testament carries us no further. But all ecclesiastical and profane history concurs in describing the rapid progress of the new doctrine. Tacitus, Suetonius, Juvenal, Pliny, Martial, Marcus Aurelius, sufficiently testify the propagation of Christianity."—See Bishop Wilson's Evidences, vol. i. p. 260, 12mo.

the vices and corruptions of mankind, but that they denounced every system of evil, and sought only to win men's applause by bringing them to perceive and acknowledge the exquisite loveliness of truth, and by teaching them to submit to a course of religious and moral discipline, which made them kind and forgiving, peaceful and holy. It is a fact, that the doctrine taught by the Apostles of Jesus of Nazareth was, in many respects, new; that it proclaimed facts of a strictly miraculous nature; that it sternly opposed every existing system of religion; that it rebuked and condemned those vices and depraved habits which universally prevailed; that, nevertheless, it rapidly spread, and that in less than three centuries it subverted the religion of pagan Rome, and established itself on the throne of the Cæsars.

Had Christianity been adapted to the depraved inclinations of the human heart; had it flattered men's pride, ambition, and vain-glory; had it promised or secured worldly honour and prosperity; had it been hailed by the great and noble of mankind; had it been supported by human power, and defended by the swords and shields of the earth; had conquering armies been its heralds, and the spoils of enemies its rewards; its success would then have been no mystery, and its triumphs would then have afforded no proof of supernatural interference. But if the reverse of all this was the case; if Christianity had nothing in it to pamper human corruption; nothing to administer to the pride of the human heart; nothing to present to its disciples in the shape of worldly allurement; nothing to draw around it men of high renown; nothing of power to terrify or subdue; nothing to support the courage of its professors but the testimony of a good conscience and the hopes of a better life; what shall be said if after all it triumphed? Yes, if while it opposes itself to all the world it prevail, what shall be said? if in the absence of all the ordinary causes and weapons of success it prevail, what shall be said? Let us look at the facts of this case, and impartially determine if there was any thing merely human in the original agencies of Christianity to account for the results which followed their employment. The results are these: the whole Roman empire, in a few short years, was pervaded by the gospel; multitudes of Jews and Pagans were won over to the sincere belief of the facts of Christianity; the very aspects and institutions of society were completely changed and re-modelled by the new doctrine;—the flames of persecution were borne with exemplary fortitude, patience, and forgiveness; the cause triumphed by means of its very disasters; and the power which attempted to crush it at last yielded to its mysterious influence.

Such are the results; and what are the apparent agencies by which they were effected? The doctrine of ONE who was crucified at Jerusalem between two thieves, the preaching of a few illiterate fishermen of Galilee, and the exemplary zeal and consistency of those who ranked themselves as the disciples of the cross.

If, then, the agencies of Christianity were merely human, or if they were nothing more than a system of deliberately adjusted imposture, how comes it to pass that there was so little in the apparent process to account for the effect produced? If all was of man, how did it happen that he constructed a scheme in the very teeth of human prejudice? and, more than this, how did it happen that a scheme so constructed obtained a footing among mankind? Was it so easy a thing to subvert Jewish prejudice, in the very city of Jerusalem, and to silence the oracles of heathenism where they had ruled with despotic sway, that twelve fishermen, just quitting their nets, and determining to become the founders of a new religion, should be deemed equal to the task? Let such a case be imagined to take place in our own age and nation. For if Christianity be not from heaven, nothing forbids the success of such another experiment on the credulity of mankind now any more than formerly. But does any one in his sober senses believe that it would succeed, or that it would produce even any considerable impression? We have had, it is true, occasional excitement produced by certain extravagant persons, but their partial success has mainly depended upon their appeal to the general data of Christianity, and upon their professed adherence to its cardinal doctrines. We might challenge all the philosophers who ever lived to invent or to propagate any imposture answering to the character of Christianity. The thing is impossible. Its facts and its success are solitary examples in the history of our world. Paganism and the religion of the False Prophet have nothing in common with them.* The former accumulated its materials by a progressive departure from all right notions of the moral character of God, and by its marked coincidence with every thing base and polluted in human nature; and the latter was propagated at the edge of the sword, and amidst all those promises of sensual indulgence which are so grateful to a nature prone to the love of sin.—But Christianity stood forth in the spotless purity of its divine Author, and refused to own any as its true disciples who remained under the dominion of their crimes. It assailed men with none of the weapons of human power, but made its triumphant appeal to the understanding and the heart. It boasted of no earthly patronage; but went forth in a secret and hidden power, which was "mighty to the pulling down of strong holds." All weakness in its exterior agencies, it became "the wisdom of God, and the power of God to the salvation" of thousands and tens of thousands who embraced its merciful provisions. It changed the very face of society, and effected revolutions in the manners, customs, and laws of mankind, which all other systems had failed to achieve. It is unphilosophical in the highest degree to trace its early prevalence to the mere influence of ordinary and secondary causes. There is no problem of the world's history bearing the least resemblance to it. The experience of mankind supplies no illustration of any thing like the successes of Christianity springing from mere human instrumentality, whether well or ill directed. Must men then acknowledge a miracle in their zeal to get rid of a miraculous history? This is indeed very preposterous; but it is nevertheless the condition to which those reduce themselves who would attempt to account for the mighty revolution produced by Christianity upon mere natural principles. They discard the doctrine of miracles, they repudiate the testimony by which the miraculous facts of the Gospel are handed down to mankind; but they call upon their disciples to believe, without a title of evidence, that the fishermen of Galilee could have done all that they did, and that Christianity could have gained all its conquests, without the slightest aid from heaven, nay, though imposture and deception were written on the entire undertaking. We demand of them an illustrative example, and we are sure that they cannot produce it. In the absence, then, of all experience to guide our course, and in opposition to all enlightened calculations of what human agency can effect, in certain given instances, we are called upon by infidels to believe that the early successes of Christianity might be traced to the operation of secondary causes.* To the mind of any unprejudiced person, this will present all the startling difficulty of a miracle, without any of that credible testimony by which alone a miracle can be shown to have taken place.

It is nothing short of an insult offered to my understanding, first to point me to the great moral and intellectual revolution which was produced by Christianity, within a very short period of the death of its founder, and then to assign as its sole cause, the zeal, energy, and talent of the fishermen of Galilee; and the credulity, love of novelty, and versatility which obtain among mankind.

Upon every sceptical theory, the early triumphs of the gospel are not only unaccounted for, but totally unaccountable. Such a change was never wrought by mere human means.

* "No religion, purely as a religion," observes Dr. Wilson, the present Bishop of Calcutta, "was ever propagated but the Christian. Heathenism was never a matter of dissemination or conversion. It had no creed, no origin distinct from the corrupt traces of a remote fabulous antiquity. It was a creature of human mould, contrived for the sake of human legislation. The Greeks and Romans imposed it not on their subject nations. Mahomedanism was the triumph of the sword. Conquest, not religious faith, was its manifest object; rapine, violence, and bloodshed were its credentials.

"No religion was ever attempted to be spread through the world by the means of instruction and persuasion, with an authority of its own, but Christianity. The idea never came into the mind of man to propagate a religion having for its set design and exclusive object the enlightening of mankind with a doctrine professedly divine, till Christianity said to her disciples, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." See "the Evidences of Christianity stated, &c. &c," in two vols. 12mo. Second edition, pp. 259, 260.

* The reader will perceive that the author has not taken any distinct notice of Gibbon's attempt to trace the success of Christianity to the influence of second causes. The reason is simply this, that he deemed it better to pursue the argument without encumbering it by any specific reference to the special pleadings and inconclusive reasonings of that great but unhappy day. The objections, however, have been met, though they have not been alluded to; and, indeed, it is a matter of just surprise that arguments so weak and futile should have ever been raised to the notoriety of a grave refutation. Those who wish to see this sceptical philosopher exhibited in his proper light, are recommended to read the Rev. A. Reed's discourse on "The Evidence of Revelation derived from the success of the Gospel." See Note, p. 182.

The entire experience of the race, and all the great facts of history, combine to show the utter irrationality of supposing that a few obscure fishermen and mechanics could have baffled all the wisdom of the wise, brought to nothing the counsel of the prudent, and levelled in the dust the mightiest fabrics of superstition and vice.

But when we admit the doctrine of a supernatural influence, according to the distinct announcements of Christianity itself, we are reminded of a cause adequate to produce the effects witnessed. Then we wonder not that the weakest instruments should prevail, that disaster should lead to triumph, and that the blood of the martyrs should be the seed of the church. If the mighty power of God was with the apostles, no wonder that thousands and tens of thousands should become obedient to their message. If the quickening energy of the living Spirit was seen, on the one hand, in external signs and wonders, rendering all gainsayers inexcusable; and, on the other, in inward, powerful, and all-subduing movements of the heart and conscience, what wonder was it if the congregated multitudes of Pentecoste trembled, repented, and turned to God; and if the Pagan world responded to the mighty and gracious impulse? By the nature of the facts to be accounted for, then, no less than by the actual data of Christianity, are we driven to the conclusion, that there was an interior and hidden but all controlling power, which accompanied and rendered effectual the first propagation of Christianity, which has watched over it from age to age, and which occasions all its success and all its blessed influence in the day in which we live. I conclude this branch of evidence in the language of an eloquent living author:—"Here is a religious system, denominated Christian, which enters the world at a most inauspicious period, supposing it to be an imposture. It has not one principle in common with the religions which then prevailed. It is attempted to be propagated by a few persons who are signally disqualified for the undertaking, and are hated of all nations. It is opposed, from the very first, by Jew and Gentile, and chiefly by those who had most power and influence in their hands. Moreover, this religion is hostile to human opinion, human prejudice, human interest, human nature; and this is apparent from the admitted nature of man and the avowed principles of the gospel, as well as from the facts, that when men have been induced to adopt the Christian name, they have remained at enmity to the Christian faith, and that there has been, in every age, a predominant disposition to misunderstand and misrepresent, to pervert and degrade it. Yet has this religion been propagated over the earth with a facility altogether unparalleled by any art or science. Yet has it found a place for itself in many a mind and country, to which the simplest mathematical demonstrations are at this moment unsolved problems.

"What is the conclusion? It is—it must be this—that the religion of Christ could not have been propagated by any earthly power—that it could not have been propagated by any mere external agency of Providence—that it could have been propagated only by a spiritual and supernatural influence addressed to the perceptions and affections of men,—and therefore that the religion of Christ is DIVINE, and its propagation through all ages is a DISTINCT, INDEPENDENT, and SPEAKING EVIDENCE of its DIVINITY."*

5. The Evidence derived from a survey of the moral and social benefits conferred on mankind by Christianity

This branch of evidence may be treated, like the preceding one, as a question simply of fact. For if it can be shown that Christianity has done more than all other causes combined to augment the resources of man's present enjoyment; if it can be shown that it has heightened, to an almost inconceivable degree, all the social virtues; if it can be shown that human nature has risen to an unheard-of elevation under its benign auspices, it will follow, as by resistless consequence, after all the fruitless experiments of Greece and Rome, that it owes its origin to the Fountain of all wisdom and benevolence.

It is a fact, then, that "the world by wisdom" never reformed itself. For the space of four thousand years effort after effort was made, but without avail, to reduce mankind to some standard of obedience, and to rescue them from the dominion of selfishness and crime. This process of renovation was attempted in the fairest portions of the globe, and amidst all the advantages of the highest intellectual cultivation. It was tried in the heart of Europe and Asia, when philosophy and arts had reached their greatest eminence, and when the human mind had been nurtured in the schools to prodigious greatness. In a thousand forms the task of bettering man's moral condition had been tried, but without even the shadow of success. Many of the precepts, indeed, of the heathen philosophers were good; but the motives urged by them were sometimes absurd, often vicious, and always powerless upon the great mass of the people. Their own standard of morals, in not a few instances, was glaringly defective; and as it respected the community at large, the theories of the schools did not so much as reach even the outward ear.

In all their pomp and magnificence, when poetry, and painting, and statuary, and arms, and empire had reached the very zenith of their glory, Greece and Rome were as little purged from crime and moral degradation as were the savage hoards of the north, who, in wild fury, broke in upon the empress of the world's destiny. The extreme of refinement, and the extreme of moral turpitude, met on the same theatre, and in the same actors. A base and monstrous idolatry every where prevailed, and every where associated itself with crimes which are reserved in Christian countries for the worst of men, and for the most hidden recesses of the basest and most degraded of mankind. "It is a shame even to speak of those things which were done of them in secret." The very temples of the gods were the dwelling-places of sin. There virgin innocence was sacrificed at the shrine of the most scandalous lusts; there human victims were immolated upon the blood-stained altars of a vile and unmeaning idolatry; and there every species of impurity and heartless cruelty received the sanction of a priesthood whose hands reeked with blood, and whose hearts were steeped in impenitence and covetous desire.

It is a fact, too, that all other nations have shown the same propensities, and have been distinguished by the same moral habits as Greece and Rome. It might have been supposed, indeed, that they would have been much more vicious; and that in proportion as they receded from the schools of philosophy, and from the sphere of the arts, they would put on a hue of pollution far deeper and more hideous. This, however, is by no means the case. The crimes of classic antiquity have never been exceeded in the African hoard, or in the Polynesian wild. Idolatry, human sacrifice, polygamy, female degradation, have every where abounded in heathen lands; while there stands not upon the record of this world's history one solitary instance of a nation rising, by its own energy, from the worship of false gods, or from the moral debasement and crimes which it uniformly involves.

It is a fact, too, that Christianity did operate, and still continues to operate, a wondrous change upon the state of society. This change it produced, at first, by means the most unlikely. By preaching salvation through the cross of Christ, the first heralds of Messiah's kingdom, though individuals comparatively obscure, brought about a revolution of public opinion and of outward manners such as had never been the result of any preceding attempt to enlighten and to purify mankind. In all the heathen provinces of the Roman empire, and in the very capital itself, idolatry was every where laid aside or proscribed. The oracles of paganism were silenced by the living oracles of God; and the horrid practices of the temples and the groves were exchanged for the decent solemnities of Christian worship, and for the sober and virtuous habits of Christian citizens. At Athens, and Corinth, and Ephesus, and, indeed, all the chief cities of heathen antiquity, the doctrine of Christ was the instrument of changing and remodelling the whole frame-work of society. Wherever it reached, it meliorated human life; and wherever it was actually embraced, it ennobled and purified individual character. The limits of Christianity have been, from its first propagation to the present moment, the boundary wall beyond which idolatry has not dared, in its direct forms, to pass. It has raised the standard of public morals above the most favoured models of pagan antiquity, not excepting those even of the far-famed kingdoms of Sparta and Syracuse. Where Christianity has waved her triumphant banner, she has given birth to a state of things altogether new. The worship of dumb idols* in every palpable shape, she has utterly abolished; the cruel and bloody rites which were practised for ages and generations under the auspices of the gods of heathenism, have been laid aside at her enlightened and benevolent call; the shameless, and even murderous, sports of the Colisseum she has frowned into total annihilation; the destruction of slaves and of female children finds no sanction where her voice of mercy is distinctly heard; the depreciation of the rights which belong to woman is no where countenanced beneath the mild sway of the gospel; the abominations of polygamy and capricious divorce are but little felt in any Christian state; the vassalage of domestic slavery has ceased to foster tyranny on the one hand, and ignoble baseness on the other;* the direful practice of private assassination,† by the dagger or by the poisoned bowl, finds no advocates in countries upon which the religion of Christ has exerted its beneficial tendency; the horrors of war, great as they must ever be, are mitigated in a tenfold degree under the generous dictation of the gospel; the poor, the aged and the afflicted are treated with a degree of consideration in Christian countries altogether unknown in pagan lands; and all the rights of property and of personal safety are guaranteed, with a degree of precision, in nations blessed with the light of revealed truth, to which Rome, in all the glory of empire, never attained.

* See a Discourse by the Rev. A. Reed, on "The Evidences of Revelation derived from the success of the Gospel," in a Volume entitled "Lectures on some of the Principal Evidences of Revelation, delivered at the Monthly Meetings, &c." pp. 225, 226.

* The idolatry of the Church of Rome, though practised under the Christian name, is of common origin with that of the Pantheon, and can be no less hateful in the sight of God.

All this is matter of fact, which no one who wishes his understanding to be respected will venture for a moment to deny. So palpably, indeed, is it such, that the traveller, blind-folded, may be able to tell when he passes from Christian territories into pagan lands. The heathen world was one vast theatre of crime, relieved, indeed, by here and there some heroic example of virtuous conduct, but sunk as a whole into the abyss of moral putridity and vice. But when Christianity arose in the East, like some bright and glorious luminary, it dispelled the darkness of the pagan world, and, in little more than two centuries from the time of its first publication, it shivered to atoms the whole system of idol worship, reconstructed the entire fabric of society, introduced new maxims of government and of personal conduct, changed the manners and habits of mankind, drove vice from its ancient lurking places, shut the temples of the gods, abolished the sacrifices of an idolatrous priesthood, and made the hopes and fears of immortality the governing principles of thousands and tens of thousands of the human race.

Whence, then, sprung the power of a triumph so great, so speedy, and so benignant?—a triumph which proclaimed peace on earth, and good will to men; a triumph bloodless and serene; a triumph which delivered such a large portion of the human race from the vassalage of the most cruel and abominable idolatries; a triumph which issued in a melioration in all the social relations of man which the wisdom of this world could never produce? Whence, I ask, sprung the power of such a triumph? Not from man assuredly; for it was unlike all the other manifestations of his mental character; and it was followed by such benign and holy results that it stood solitary and alone upon the page of this world's history. Nor was there any thing whatever in its origin to indicate the wisdom of man. Had man constructed a scheme of moral renovation, it would have been introduced to the notice of his fellow-creatures in a way very different from that in which Christianity began its auspicious career. Let two considerations then fully possess the mind, and it will be impossible to resist the conclusion, that Christianity is from heaven. In the first place, recollect that of all agencies that could be contemplated, the first heralds of the cross were the least likely to succeed in the proposed undertaking of converting the world; and, in the second place, bear in mind, as a matter of fact, that in spite of prejudice, in spite of a huge system of idolatry, in spite of all interest and power and terror, they did succeed in such manner as never before had been known; and in doing so changed the whole face of society, purified all the springs of human action, established the reign of peace and happiness, drove idolatry from the high places of the earth, and to the full extent of their triumph, paved the way for the realization of another paradise.

The power which scattered so much darkness, and which spread so much light; which wrought a change on mankind so pure and beneficial; which diffused such a mass of happiness, and checked such a mighty current of misery; which, like an electric shock, blasted and withered all the ancient fabrics of idolatry, and on their ruins erected a system of doctrine and a form of worship which promised and yielded peace and joy and happiness to all the dwellers upon earth, such a power as this could only have emanated from that throne from which issued originally the high behests of creation.

And, O! if a triumph which can yet only be regarded as partial, affords such intimation of the benevolent interposition of the Infinite Mind, what an evidence of the divine origin of Christianity will be supplied to mankind when its moral transformations are complete, when all nations are subjected to its righteous sway, when its disciples shall drink more deeply into its pure and benignant spirit, when that blessed influence which is now partial shall be universal, and when the church of the living God, vocal with his praise, shall reflect with sweetest lustre the radiance of his moral image.

Great as were the first triumphs of the gospel, there can be no doubt but that greater triumphs yet await its peaceful heralds. In the morning of its strength it subdued the Roman empire, and stood confessed the prevailing religion of the civilized world; but the time is fast approaching when it shall be proclaimed the religion of the whole earth, and when the mighty changes it shall work in the opinions, manners, and hopes of mankind, shall compel the most thoughtless of a rebellious race to exclaim, "this is the finger of God!" Then when "the people shall be all righteous," and when the Spirit of God shall be "poured out upon all flesh," shall it be seen that Christianity is the balm of bleeding hearts, the parent of peace and good will, and the angel of God's mercy to heal all the miseries and vices of an apostate race.

CHAPTER IV.

On the Transmission of the Sacred Books.

Though Christianity be a divine religion, it may be possible, in the lapse of ages, that the record which discloses its leading doctrines and facts has undergone some serious mutilation. Is this or is it not the case? This is an important inquiry, and it admits of an easy and satisfactory reply; a reply which must carry conviction to every candid mind as to the genuineness, authenticity, and incorruptness of the Sacred Books.

That they were written by the men whose names they bear is a thing quite as well established as that the Æneid was composed by Virgil, the Iliad by Homer, and the Cyropædia by Xenophon. The very literary character of the Old and New Testament Scriptures would go far to prove that they are genuine productions. They exhibit a diversity of style, which shows that they were written by various authors, and they display an idiomatic peculiarity corresponding to the ages and circumstances in which they were written. Thus, in the Pantateuch we meet with a slight mixture of Egyptian words, as might be expected if Moses was the writer; while in the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, there is a considerable infusion of Chaldee and Persian, connecting them beyond all reasonable doubt with a period in Jewish history subsequent to the Babylonish captivity. If, moreover, we turn to the New Testament, we find its several parts written in a species of Greek partaking largely of Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Latin words and phrases, a circumstance exactly answering to all that might have been anticipated upon the supposition that men in the precise condition of the Evangelists and Apostles had furnished their contents.

Nor is it within the range of probability to imagine for a moment that the sacred books are forgeries. If they are, then they must have been palmed upon the world by persons whose imposture could not be detected. But how could this occur in the matter of giving currency to the records of a public faith? Take, for instance, the Books of the Old Testament Scriptures. If they are not genuine productions, I ask who were the parties concerned in the iniquitous forgery? It could not be the men of heathen antiquity, for they were imperfectly acquainted with the national peculiarities and rites of the Hebrews; and were not likely, moreover, to stamp the seal of their approbation upon records which accredited the posterity of Abraham as God's peculiar people, and condemned the whole Gentile world as sunk in a state of idolatry and crime. It could not be the followers of Christ, for it is matter of undoubted historical certainty that the Scriptures of the Jews existed many centuries before the Christian name was ever heard of. It could not be the Jews themselves, for never was there a more uncompromising exposure of the crimes, idolatries, and righteous chastisements of a rebellious and guilty nation than that which they contain.

* In ancient Attica there were 450,000 inhabitants, out of which population only 40,000 are said to have been free. It is a dreadful blot upon the character of this country, that still she permits eight hundred thousand British subjects to be bought and sold, in the colonies, at the will of their masters. Christians should combine, as such, and seek the immediate removal from the land of this crying sin. Alas! that any of the American states should be found, to this day, engaged in the slave traffic! Surely the word liberty must freeze upon the tongues of such Americans, and surely Christianity itself can be known among them only as a name!

† It was no uncommon thing for a Roman prætor to convict, in one short season, in Italy, three or four thousand individuals for the crime of private assassination; and among these, husbands were often condemned for the secret murder of their wives in order to obtain their dowry; and wives for the murder of their husbands in order to secure a union to the miscreants who had seduced them from the paths of virtue.

If we look at the New Testament, it is equally unreasonable to suppose that it is not a genuine production, and that it was not actually written by the men to whom it is attributed. Unbelieving Jews and Gentiles were happily, in this instance, the guardians of revelation; for as they were equally opposed to the doctrine of Him whom they had combined to crucify, and as they were both zealous in persecuting all who ranked themselves as his humble and devoted followers, it stands to reason, that if the records of the Christian faith had not been genuine narratives of facts, furnished by the very men who assume to be the writers, the dishonest effort would have been detected and exposed, and the whole world, and all succeeding generations, would have been warned against the iniquitous attempt to originate a history not founded in fact.

The genuineness of the Books of Scripture was never called in question by friends or enemies. From the earliest periods of the Jewish history downwards, the Hebrews regarded their sacred Books as their peculiar treasure, and associated them all with their several authors and ages; and, in like manner, the Christians, from the apostolic age to the present moment, have had a regular succession of writers, who have quoted and authenticated, in various ways, the Books which compose the New Testament canon. It is an interesting fact that Celsus, and Porphyry, and Julian, and an endless race of heretics, combine with the apostolic and Christian fathers, Barnabas, Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius, in accrediting the Books of Scripture as genuine productions. The most inveterate opponents of revelation have been compelled to admit the fact that the Bible is no forgery.

Nor is there the slightest reason to suspect that the Scriptures have undergone any material alteration, or that they are not now in the same condition in which they were when they came from Moses and the prophets, the evangelists and apostles. To say that the original Hebrew and Greek manuscripts of the Bible, or that the ancient versions and translations, had not been deviated from in a single particular, would be to assume a position too lofty. In the process of transcribing some thousands of copies, before the art of printing was discovered, letters and syllables, and even words, without the intervention of a miracle, must have been left out. But that there has been any serious or fraudulent omission or interpolation, or that any one doctrine has been added or subtracted, cannot be shown by any enemy of revelation, and need not be apprehended by any humble-minded or unlettered Christian.

As it respects the Old Testament Scriptures, it is a well-established fact that the Jews were their faithful guardians. They were often employed, indeed, in the act of transcribing them, but so strict were they in comparing the copies with the originals, that they numbered both the words and letters. That the Jews never altered their sacred Books is triumphantly proved by the fact that neither their own prophets nor Jesus Christ, though they laid many a heavy charge at their door, ever once intimated that they were guilty of such mutilation. The Great Teacher, indeed, told them, with the utmost fidelity, that they had made void "The commandment of God by their traditions," but he never insinuates that they had corrupted the Sacred Books. "It is one of the wonders of providence, that God, for the preservation of these books, should make use of that scrupulous, and I might say, almost superstitious, care that was among those Jews whose office it was to keep the Books of the Old Testament."* Among the one thousand one hundred and fifty manuscripts and versions of the Old Testament which are still extant, there is an essential agreement, an agreement most wonderful and striking, showing, beyond all conjecture or doubt, the uncorrupted preservation of these precious records.

Nor is the protection less manifest which has been spread over the books of the New Testament. The early multiplication of copies, together with the several translations into foreign tongues, rendered any serious deviation from the original manuscripts utterly impossible. Besides, in the course of one century from the period of Christ's resurrection, the gospel was spread over the greater part of the Lesser Asia, and over many portions of Africa and Europe; so that if any of the early Christians, in any particular district of the world, had attempted to alter or mutilate the sacred books, it would have been impossible that they should have escaped detection among the many disciples of Christ spread over other sections of the globe.

The early heresis, too, which sprung up among the professed followers of Jesus, rendered the corruption of the sacred books next to an impossibility. "That passage of the apostle," observes the immortal Howe, "is not greatly enough pondered according to the weightiness of the expression, that there must be heresies. This great use that hath been of the divisions in Christian churches, is not, it may be, considered as it should be by many. But nothing can carry a clearer evidence and demonstration with it than that, because of those divisions, any depravation of the said records (that is, any material, general, successful, continued depravation) is alto-

* See John Howe's Lectures on the oracles of God. Works, one vol. imperial octavo, just published, p. 1075. The whole passage referred to is as follows: "It was known they used to count all the letters of the Old Testament, that they might be sure never to miss a letter. Again, in transcribing copies, (which was frequent,) every copy was always examined by an appointed number of their wise men, as they termed them. Further, if any copy should have been found, upon examination, to have four or five faults in it, in one copy of the whole Old Testament, that book was presently adjudged to be buried in the grave of one or other of their wise men. And, lastly, for those books that, upon examination, were found to be punctually true, it was very plain from the history of those times, that there was the greatest reverence paid to them imaginable. They never used to touch those perfect copies (taking them into their hands) without kissing them solemnly, nor to lay them down again without solemn kissing of them. They were never used to sit upon the place where one of those books were wont to be laid. If one of them by casualty fell to the ground, they appointed a solemn fast to be kept for it, as an ill-boding thing, that such a thing should happen. So that it is most plain that these keepers of the Books of the Old Testament could never have it in design to corrupt any of them; but it was that which they did abhor above all things. And it was a principle (as Philo tells us, and Josephus much to the same purpose) instilled into the youth of that nation, and even those of the best quality, that they should run the utmost hazard, and incur a thousand deaths, rather than they should suffer any alteration or diminution of those books, or that any of them should be lost in any other way. And then, besides all this scrupulous care of the keepers of the books of the Old Testament (with which a design of corrupting would no way consist), we may add, that the thing itself was afterwards impossible. If they would before, when it was in their own hands, they could; but afterwards, if they would, they could not; because that in Christ and his apostles' days, a great number of them were converted to the Christian faith, who knew all the Books of the Old Testament as well as themselves. Therefore, it was impossible now for the Infidel Jews, those that were not converted, to make any alteration but it must be presently spied and exclaimed against; therefore it was a vain thing for any to attempt it, after so many were converted to the Christian religion. And thereupon we may further add, that the testimonies that were contained in these books against themselves, and with which contained in them they are transmitted to us, do show that they never went about to corrupt them. The many testimonies against idolatry contained in these books, whereby their forefathers from age to age, for many ages, were witnessed against, would have induced them to expunge all things that were therein contained against idolatry (so tender were they of their reputation), if there had not been a great awe upon their minds never to attempt the corrupting or the alteration of any thing in those books. The wickedness of their forefathers was, in these books, so highly remonstrated against, in respect of the testimonies they so often gave against their idolatry, and yet these books we find in their own hands, with these testimonies in them, against the Jews and their forefathers, for many foregoing ages, through sundry times and divers intervals, though we do not find after the second temple that people relapsed into that crime. And then there is the fullest testimony against their infidelity in these books that can be. Who would not wonder that these books should come out of the hands of the Jews, with these testimonies, in the great controversy between the Christians and them? that is, of Christ being the Messiah, in which you have so punctual assertions against them that nothing can be more. Those many testimonies that do concern the Messiah, particularly that famous prophecy, that the sceptre should not depart from Judah till Shilo should come, and those numerous presages in many of the latter prophets, (Isaiah especially, and sundry others,) make it one of the greatest wonders of Providence that such a book should come, with these things in it, out of men's hands, against whom they are a continual remonstrance. But, however, this proves that they did never design any alteration; either they saw it impossible for one while, and before that, they had no inclination or inducement that would be prevailing with them to go about it, that is, that there should be an alteration with design."

gether impossible; because the one party would be continually declaiming and crying out against the other; and then how would it be espied?"*

Indeed, it may be safely affirmed, that the Christians were never charged by their bitterest enemies with the crime of mutilating their Scriptures, and that these sacred records have suffered less from transcribers, copyists, and translators, than any other documents of a remote antiquity.

"It is true, that in translations, persons have laboured to serve their own purposes, by translating this way and that, as they thought fit. But for alteration of copies, that is what never entered into the mind of any body to attempt; which is a thing so easily spied out, that nothing is more so; and so must needs blast and dissever the cause and interest of that party it was designed to serve, and therefore could never be. And the impossibility of any such alteration it is easy for any man that useth his understanding to apprehend from a similar instance. And thus, do but take any one people that are under the same government, and that have their laws, by which they are governed, digested into some system or other; as, for instance, our statute book; why, suppose very ill-minded men in the nation should have a design to corrupt and alter the statute-book, every one would see it to be impossible. Which way would they go to work to impose a false statute book upon a nation, wherein every man's right and property is concerned? And if any such should have such a design, they would soon give it up, as finding it impossible, and a thing not to be done, and therefore a vain thing to attempt. But the difficulty is a thousand times greater of making designed alteration of those sacred books and records that are spread so unspeakably further than a nation, and wherein the concernments of all that have them in their hands are recorded, not temporal only, but eternal. Here is their all for eternity, another world! So that it must be altogether impossible that there could have been such a thing effected; and therefore it is the most unlikely thing that such a matter should ever be attempted. And then, I say, if there be that plain evidence, that for that reason these books must be the same, that they cannot have been altered with design, and consequently not materially, then it were the most unreasonable thing in all the world to expect that God could confirm it to us otherwise than he hath done, or that the nature of the thing doth admit of it; because, otherwise there must have been miracles wrought for every one to see and take notice of, nay, that would altogether loose the usefulness and significancy of miracles themselves, because it would make miracles so common in such a case. If every man must have a miracle to prove to him this is God's word, it would take off that particular thing for which they are only significant with men, that is, because they are rare and extraordinary things, and then they would cease to be so. It might as well be expected that every man should have a Bible reached him down by an invisible hand from heaven, as that there should be a miracle wrought to prove to him that this was the same book that was so and so confirmed and sealed in our Saviour's and his apostles' time.—And therefore I reckon that, upon the grounds that have been laid, it is very plain both that these books that were extant under the name of Scriptures in our Saviour's and his apostles' time, were of divine authority, and that the books that we now have in our hands, are the same with those books, and therefore are of divine authority."†

It is, then, a most animating consideration, that, by a variety of striking providences, it hath pleased Almighty God to preserve to us unmutilated and uncorrupted the very records which the first Christians held to be divine, and upon the doctrines and principles of which they were ready, in the midst, of the greatest dangers, to repose their eternal all. It is highly consolatory to those who have but little time and few advantages for research to be informed, upon the most indubitable evidence, that in their English Bibles they have the same precious document which was read in the first assemblies of the Christian church; and that, in the multiplication of manuscripts and translations, no serious or important alteration has been obtruded into the sacred text. For this fact let the humble and devout Christian bless God; and, in the contemplation of it, let the rejecter of Revelation pause and tremble, lest peradventure he should be found fighting against God.

Let this chapter be fairly weighed in connexion with what has been previously advanced on the subject of the evidences of our holy faith, and let him who still doubts say within himself—"Wherefore do I doubt?" To such a solemn interrogatory, conscience may perhaps supply the ready and faithful response,—"How can you but doubt, while sin is blinding your perceptions and hardening your heart?"

CHAPTER V.

On the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures.

Having glanced at the evidence which supports the conclusion that the Bible is a Revelation from God, and having, moreover, ascertained that the books of Scripture have been transmitted to us in a pure and unadulterated form, it may now be proper to inquire into the true nature of inspiration, and to endeavour to determine to what extent the sacred volume is entitled to the high and distinctive appellation of—"THE WORD OF GOD."

The importance of this question is very great, for upon its answer must depend the degree of deference which is due to the Scriptures as an authoritative communication from Heaven. It is a question which cannot be decided, I presume, by any arguments a priori, but by a direct appeal to the testimony of the infallible word. The real nature of inspiration, as belonging to the writers of Scripture, is a doctrine purely of Revelation; and the only duty of a sincere inquirer in reference to it must be simply this, to ascertain for himself what is predicated or announced concerning it in the word of God.

With this conviction on my mind, I shall not trouble my readers with any lengthened details of what others have advanced on the subject of inspiration, but shall come almost immediately to the point in hand, viz., the doctrine of Scripture, as to the manner in which it was imparted.

I must just be allowed, however, to premise, that writers of the Socinian creed have so relaxed their notions of inspiration as to talk even of the inconclusive reasonings of apostles; and that others, not of this pernicious creed, have spoken and written about degrees and kinds of inspiration until they have inadvertently weakened, on their own minds, and on the minds of others, the authority of God in the Scriptures. I would have all such writers remember, that these modified views of inspiration are of modern date, and that for full sixteen hundred years they were unknown in the church of Christ. "Many considerable writers on the evidences of Christianity, of late, have satisfied themselves with proving its divine authority generally, but have tacitly, and most inconsistently, given up or denied the infallibility of the books in which it is recorded. They speak of authenticity, veracity, credibility; but not inspiration. Some have limited the assistance of the Spirit to the prophetical parts. Others have extended it to the doctrinal, but excluded the historical. Whilst many have lowered the whole notion of inspiration to a mere aid occasionally afforded to the sacred penmen. Thus the impression left on the minds of their readers has been, that the Bible is authentic indeed, and credible, and contains a revelation from God; but that it was indited by good and pious men only, with little more of accuracy than would belong to them as faithful historians. An intermixture of human infirmity and error is thus by no means excluded; and the scriptures are considered as the work of fallible writers, doing their best, and entitled in all their main statements to full belief, but not under that immediate and plenary influence of the Holy Spirit, which renders all they say concerning religion, the unerring word of God."*

Most ruinous to the souls of men must be such views of the blessed word of God, and most derogatory are they to that Spirit, who has not given so much as a shadow of countenance, in the sacred books, to such vague and sceptical notions. We ought to be jealous, not only of such latitudinarian views of inspiration, but also of every approach to them. For my own part, after much deliberation, and I trust careful and unprejudiced examination of the arguments of opponents, I have come to the conclusion, not only that the ideas contained in scripture were conveyed by the Spirit to the minds of inspired men, but that they were supernaturally guided in their diction and in their writings. I shall not, however, bring this theory to the word of God, to seek countenance for it there; but shall rather call the attention of my readers to the word of God itself, that they may thence gather the true notion of inspiration.

I begin, then, with that part of scripture which was included in the Jewish canon, and which is known by the name of the Old Testament. And if it can be shown that the infallible Teacher, whose divine mission has already been clearly established, fully accredits the divine authority, and the infallible character of that document, considered as a whole, and without a single recognised exception, an important step will have been gained towards ascertaining the perfection of the Jewish canon, and also the real nature and extent of inspiration.

At an early stage in his public ministry, the Messiah announced, to an immense assembly of his countrymen, his views and determinations respecting their ancient Scriptures: "Think not," said he, "that I am come to destroy the Law and the Prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." Every attentive reader of the New Testament must have discovered that the phrase "the law and the prophets" denotes the sacred books of the Jews; and every unprejudiced reader must perceive that the Saviour in this declaration recognises them as an infallible standard, by which he was willing that his own pretensions should be rigidly tried.

On another occasion he charges those who reject him with not having the word of God abiding in them, because they believed not in him whom God the Father had sent to them; and then he immediately adds—"Search the Scriptures; for in them ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me." "Do not think that I will accuse you to the Father: there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me: for he wrote of me." Here are several things to be noticed. In the first place, the Scriptures of the Jews, which did not abide in them through their unbelief, are distinctly recognised as the word of God. In the second place, they are appealed to as a testimony from God concerning Christ, rendering all those Jews inexcusable who rejected him. And, in the third place, they are spoken of emphatically as the writings, evidently including them all, and leaving no room to dispute the divine origin of their diction any more than the doctrines they contained.

On many occasions, Jesus spake of the sacred books of the Jews as divinely authoritative writings. "He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." "If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came, and the Scripture cannot be broken; say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified, and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God." "Jesus saith unto them, did ye never read in the Scriptures, the stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner: this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes?" "Jesus answered and said unto them, ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures." "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? But how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?" "I was daily with you in the temple teaching, and ye took me not: but the Scriptures must be fulfilled." Now what are we to gather from this species of reference? Why, two things—first, that there is not the shadow of a doubt upon the inspiration of any part of a document to which the infallible Teacher made such implicit and authoritative allusion; and, second, that simply considered as writings, the books thus referred to are the product of God's immediate inspiration. Where is there any thing like a surmise that there is not as much authority in the writings as in the thoughts and ideas which they convey?

To the testimony of our Lord may be added that of his Apostles, who bore his commission, and who wrought stupendous miracles in his name. "All Scripture," said Paul to Timothy, "is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, &c." Now, granting that the rendering of Grotius, "all divinely inspired Scripture is even profitable, &c." is the correct one, it is perfectly clear that the context mainly, if not exclusively, restricts the Apostle's declaration to the Old Testament Scriptures,—those sacred writings which Timothy had known from his infancy. The whole Scripture, in the knowledge of which this young evangelist had been trained, is here said to be given by inspiration of God; that is, breathed by him into the minds of those holy men who were divinely and infallibly gifted to hand it forth to the church.

The Apostle Peter, when speaking of the office and end of prophecy, as "a light that shineth in a dark place," asserts, that "no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." I cannot help thinking that an unprejudiced expositor would regard this as a distinct affirmation of the inspiration of the prophecies, both as it respects their matter and manner. As to their matter, they were not the result of any private impulse;* and as to their manner, "holy men spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." The prophets are also represented, by the same Apostle, as "searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, did signify, when it testified before-hand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow." From this passage it is plain that the prophets did not always, nor even frequently, understand the import of their own predictions; from which it may be inferred, with indubitable certainty, that the words in which they were couched, no less than the thoughts which they contained, were imparted by the Spirit of God; for surely they could not have been trusted with the diction and verbiage of a communication which confessedly they did not understand.

It is upon this same principle that we find the Old Testament Scriptures styled "the Oracles of God," and "the lively oracles;" to indicate, doubtless, that they were given forth by God himself. Hence the following expressions—"Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord, by the prophet." "How then doth David, in spirit, call him Lord?" "For David himself saith by the Holy Ghost." "As he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began." "Which the Holy Ghost spake by the mouth of David." "He saith (that is God) also in another Psalm, thou shalt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." "Well spake the Holy Ghost, by Esaias the prophet, unto our fathers." "Wherefore, as the Holy Ghost saith, to-day if you will hear his voice."

Now all this corresponds with what we find in the Old Testament Scriptures themselves. Take the case of Moses, the great prophet and lawgiver of Israel, and the inspired author of the Pentateuch. When he was commanded to go to Pharaoh, and to lead forth the people of Israel, he entreated that he might be excused from the performance of a task for which he deemed himself so utterly unqualified. His sense of weakness was, in a high degree, proper; but his refusal to go, when God had assured him that he would be "with him," evinced great want of faith. God reproved him for his sinful timidity, and said to him, "Who hath made man's mouth? or who maketh the dumb, or deaf, or the seeing, or the blind? have not I the Lord? Now, therefore, go, and I will be with thy mouth, and teach thee what thou shalt say." The leader of Israel again repeats his difficulty, and again receives a similar reply. At last his scruples are overcome by the feeling of supernatural aid, and ever after his addresses to the chosen tribes are couched in terms indicative of their immediate divine origin—"Thus saith the Lord,"—"These are the words which the Lord hath commanded, that ye should do them." Had he not been conscious that the inspiration under which he wrote extended to his words as well as thoughts, would he have adopted the phraseology attributed to him in the following passages?—"Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it, that ye may keep these commandments of the Lord your God which I command you." "And these words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart, and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children." "Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in you soul, and bind them for a sign upon your head that they may be as frontlets between your eyes. And ye shall teach them to your children, speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt write them upon the door posts of thine house, and upon thy gates."

* Dr. Doddridge's paraphrase is as follows:—"Knowing this first, as a matter of chief importance, that no prophecy of Scripture is of private impulse," or original: "For prophecy was not brought of old to the minds of those that uttered it by the will of man; they could not work themselves up to the attainment of this extraordinary gift, nor divinely foretell what they themselves desired, and whenever they pleased; but holy men of God, whom he honoured with that important work, spake [as they were] borne on by the Holy Spirit; and they were only his organs in declaring to the people what he was disposed to suggest to them."

In like manner all the prophets represent their entire communications as from God; they all address themselves to the people, "Thus saith the Lord," and some of them, as in the case of Elijah to Ahab, personate the Diety, and utter his threatenings as if they were their own: "Behold I will bring evil upon thee, and will take away thy posterity;" this was the voice, indeed, of Elijah, but the speaker was God. Hence the word of the Lord is said again and again to come to the prophets, and the sweet Psalmist of Israel says, "The spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue."

It may, indeed, be said that, though in the prophetical and doctrinal parts of the Old Testament Scriptures the sacred writers were under the influence of a full and verbal inspiration, this could not be necessary in furnishing the historical parts of the word of God. Now, this is a distinction which is never once made, to the best of my recollection, in the inspired volume itself; and when the vast importance of the chronological and historical details of Scripture is taken into account, in the relations which they bear to the transcendent scheme of human redemption, I think it will be regarded as futile and dangerous. Upon the whole, I am satisfied that there is no solid foundation for any theory of the inspiration of the Old Testament Scriptures which does not consider all their several parts as written under the immediate teaching of the Holy Ghost, both as to sentiment and diction.

Nor is the complete inspiration of the apostles and writers of the New Testament less satisfactorily demonstrated than is that of Moses and the prophets. Such full inspiration they eminently needed, in order to the faithful execution of their responsible task. They were to be employed in raising up disciples to their risen Lord, and as the historians of his life and death; and as the authoritative counsellors of his church in all ages, they needed "an unction from the Holy One." We find accordingly that such unction and such infallible guidance as were necessary were distinctly promised to them. Twelve men were selected as the heralds of his kingdom, who enjoyed his familiar intercourse, and were in every way qualified for bearing witness to his doctrine, miracles, sufferings, death, and resurrection. "Go ye," said Christ to his chosen band, "and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." When, during his own personal ministry, he sent them forth to visit the cities of Israel, he gave them this miraculous assurance,—"But when they deliver you up take no thought how or what ye shall speak; for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you." And when our blessed Lord was about to ascend up on high and to leave his apostles and disciples, he delivered to them the following animating promises:—"And I will pray the Father, and he will give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of Truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him. But ye know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you. I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit, when He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear that shall he speak; and he will show you things to come." "Here," observes an eminent writer, "are all the degrees of inspiration which we have seen to be necessary for the apostles; the Spirit was to bring to their remembrance what they had heard; to guide them into the truth, which they were not then able to bear; and to show them things to come; and all this they were to derive, not from occasional illapses, but from the perpetual inhabitation of the Spirit."*

Hence we find that the apostles laid claim to that inspiration which their divine Master had so distinctly promised. "We shall not find," as the above writer well observes, "that claim formally advanced in the gospels. This omission has sometimes been regarded by those superficial critics, whose prejudices seem to account for their haste, as an objection against the existence of inspiration. But if you attend to the reason of the omission, you will perceive that it is only an instance of that delicate propriety which pervades all the New Testament. The gospels are the record of the great facts which vouch the truth of Christianity. These facts are to be received upon the testimony of men who had been eye-witnesses of them. The foundation of the Christian faith being laid in an assent to these facts, it would have been preposterous to have introduced in support of them that influence of the Spirit which preserved the minds of the apostles from error. For there can be no proof of the inspiration of the apostles unless the truth of the facts be previously admitted. The apostles, therefore, bring forward the evidence of Christianity in its natural order when they speak in the gospels as the companions and eye-witnesses of Jesus, claiming that credit which is due to honest men who had the best opportunities of knowing what they declared. This is the language of St. John; "Many other signs did Jesus in the presence of his disciples. But these are written that ye may believe; and this is the disciple which testifieth these things."*

When the following circumstances, then, are taken into account, the absence of any formal announcement of inspiration in the gospels is no barrier in the way of admitting their full claim to this high distinction. In the first place, there was an assistance promised by our Lord, ere he left his disciples, which, from its very form, must have been partly at least intended to qualify his disciples for the task of recording the history of his earthly sojourn. By that assistance they were to have "all things whatsoever the Lord said to them brought to their remembrance;" they were to be conducted "into all truth;" they were to be shown the "things to come;" and Christ was to be with them always.

In the second place, we find that no distinction whatever is made, by Christ, between the authority of those whom he accredited and his own. "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me; and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me." This is the language which equally accredits the gospels† and the epistles, and which renders it a high affront to the Son of God to cavil at any thing contained in the one or the other.

In the third place, we find the apostles placing their own communications on a level with those of prophets and inspired men of old. "That ye may be mindful," said the apostle Peter, "of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandments of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour." Hence the language of the great apostle of the Gentiles: "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will" or "commandment of God:" "Paul, an apostle, not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead. I neither received the gospel of man, neither was I taught it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ. When it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace to reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen, immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood, neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before, but I went into Arabia."‡

In the most unequivocal forms that can be adopted, the apostles assert their inspiration in their epistolary correspondence. "Now," said Paul, "we have received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things which are freely given us of God, which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth." "If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord." "For this cause, also, thank we God without ceasing, because when ye received the word of God which ye

† It may be said, indeed, that Mark and Luke were not apostles, and that, therefore, the infallible assistance promised to such distinguished servants of the church did not belong to them. In reply to this, it may be stated, that early general tradition places Mark among those seventy disciples whom Christ sent out through the land of Israel with miraculous endowments and a promise of supernatural aid; and awards to his gospel a place among the canonical books of the New Testament; and that Luke, who appears to have written his gospel first, (though several uninspired accounts of the history of Christ obtained before, Luke i. 1,) was the contemporary and intimate companion of Paul, (Col. iv. 14,) who, it is universally conceded, examined and approved his gospel, stamping it with apostolic authority, and thereby ushering it into the church of Christ with the full credentials of canonical and inspired scripture.

heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but, as it is in truth, the word of God." "We are of God," said the apostle John; "he that knoweth God, heareth us: he that is not of God, heareth not us." And, speaking of the New Testament Church, Paul declares that it is "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner stone." Such a form of expression must have been blasphemous in the extreme, if the writings and the authority of the apostles did not stand upon an equal footing with the writings and the authority of the prophets. In all the passages which demonstrate the inspiration of the word of God, there is not one, as far as I remember, that limits the divine afflatus to the sentiments conveyed; and, on the other hand, there are several texts which extend it, beyond all reasonable doubt, to the words which the speakers employ:* the conclusion I draw from this is, that the distinction between mental and verbal inspiration is altogether of man's devising, and that the only safe way of receiving the entire Scriptures is to regard both their sentiment and their language as "THE WORD OF GOD."

There may be difficulties to some minds in this view. But what view of truth is without difficulty? If we believe nothing till we get rid of all difficulty, we shall verily soon be in the condition of believing nothing.

Some have said, if inspiration be plenary and verbal, how can the difference of style among the several writers of Scripture be accounted for? My reply is, that the Spirit of God was as capable of influencing the mind of a prophet or an apostle in coincidence with his own taste, predilections, and education, as in opposition to them. If the inspiration is admitted at all, there need, therefore, be no doubt or perplexity here. I may just add, however, and though there is a striking variety in the diction of the inspired writers, there is, at the same time, an inexpressible peculiarity attaching to the books of Scripture at large, which distinguishes them from all apocryphal and uninspired productions in the several ages to which they belong. The individuality of the writers is indeed preserved; but the individuality of the divine agency is not less conspicuous. "Is it not evident," observes an eminent divine, "that God may exercise a perfect superintendency over inspired writers as to the language they shall use, and yet that each one of them shall write in his own style, and in all respects according to his own taste? May not God give such aid to his servants, that, while using their own style, they will certainly be secured against all mistakes, and exhibit the truth with perfect propriety? It is unquestionable that Isaiah, and St. Paul, and St. John might be under the entire direction of the Holy Spirit, even as to language; and, at the same time, that each one of them might write in his own manner; and that the peculiar manner of each might be adapted to answer an important end; and that the variety of style thus introduced into the sacred volume might be suited to excite a livelier interest in the minds of men, and to secure to them a far greater amount of good than could ever have been derived from any one mode of writing.

"If we should admit that the divine superintendence and guidance afforded to the inspired writers had had no relation at all to the manner in which they exhibited either doctrines or facts, how easily might we be disturbed with doubts in regard to the propriety of some of their representations? We should most certainly consider them as liable to all the inadvertencies and mistakes to which uninspired men are commonly liable; and we should think ourselves perfectly justified in undertaking to charge them with real errors and faults as to style, and to show how their language might have been improved; and, in short, to treat their writings just as we treat the writings of Shakspeare and Addison. 'Here,' we might say, 'Paul was unfortunate in the choice of words; and here his language does not express the ideas which he must have intended to convey.' 'Here the style of St. John was inadvertent; and here it was faulty; and here it would have been more agreeable to the nature of the subject, and would have more accurately expressed the truth, had it been altered thus.' If the language of the sacred writers did not in any way come under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and if they were left, just as other writers are, to their own unaided faculties in regard to every thing which pertained to the manner of writing, then, evidently, we might use the same freedom in animadverting upon their style as upon the style of other writers. But who could treat the volume of inspiration in this manner without impiety and profaneness? And rather than make any approach to this, who would not choose to go to an excess, if there could be an excess, in reverence for the word of God."*

To these excellent remarks I would add, that he who objects to the doctrine of verbal inspiration on account of the variety of style which obtains among the sacred writers, might, on the same principle, object to mental inspiration on account of the variety of thought by which they are equally distinguished.

It is in receiving "all Scripture as given by inspiration of God" that the mind finds repose from those endless suspicions which must assail those who regard the Bible as the word of God as to doctrine, but the word of man as to the channel of conveyance.

CHAPTER VI.

Some popular objections to the full inspiration of the Holy Scriptures.†

1. It has been objected, that if the inspiration of the Scriptures be plenary and verbal, it will then follow, that the improper and wicked sayings of bad men, and even devils, which are introduced in Scripture, must lay claim to an immediate inspiration. The answer to this very flimsy difficulty is simply this,—that though, in such cases, the Holy Spirit dictated to inspired men the very words which were uttered by the sinful agents referred to, he dictated them not as his, but theirs.

2. It has been objected, that, as the inspired writers were thoroughly acquainted with many things of which they wrote, they could not in such matters require any immediate afflatus from the Holy Spirit, and that therefore such a redundant influence would not have been vouchsafed by that infinitely wise Being who never lavishes his supernatural bestowments. To this I reply, that the authority of a messenger must cease when he acts merely in his own name, and gives forth that only which comes within the range of his own personal knowledge, without reference to the express dictation of the power by which he is delegated. On this principle, a writer of Scripture recording that which was simply the result of his own knowledge, is a contradiction in terms; inasmuch as he must cease to be the medium of an infallible record the moment that he is thrown, in a single instance, on his own unaided resources:—that is not Holy Scripture which is not given by inspiration of God.

3. To the full view of inspiration here contended for, it has been objected, that some things are introduced by the inspired writers of too trifling a nature to be the subject of a direct communication from God. As, for instance, when Paul says to his son Timothy—"Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake, and thine often infirmities;" or as elsewhere, when the same apostle says—"The cloak that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments." It is assumed, by objectors to the full inspiration of such texts, that they are below the standard of a divine communication, and that therefore they were the simple unaided dictates of the apostle's own mind. Could we see no design couched in them worthy of God, this would be a most irreverent way of dealing with any part of a book which gives no countenance to the idea of one part being more inspired than another. "The question is not at all whether the Apostle Paul needed inspiration to enable him to give such directions, but whether it was without inspiration that these doctrines form a part of a book, all of which comes to us as the word of God, and inspired by him. There are many parts of Scripture that might have been written without inspiration; but the question is, were the sacred writers left without inspiration to select what they would put into this book, and what they would keep out of it? If so, then the book is theirs, not God's. Besides, if it be thought absurd to suppose that there is any inspiration in the direction which the apostle gave about his cloak and his books, it may very naturally be thought that as little inspiration was necessary to tell us how often he had received forty stripes save one; that he had fought with wild beasts at Ephesus; that he had undergone an endless variety of perils; that he had been let down over the wall of Damascus in a basket, and put into the stocks at Philippi. Of all these, and many other similar instances, it may be said, that these are cases in which, as it would be absurd to suppose any inspiration, so it was unnecessary to disavow it. We shall thus get quit of the whole account of the sufferings of the apostles. The apostle says, that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable," &c. If there be many passages, or any passages, in which it would be absurd to suppose any inspiration, or which is not profitable, then he is guilty of stating what is not true."*

* Dr. Woods, on Inspiration.

† I cannot but strongly recommend to my readers a work which I have found of great use to myself on this subject, by Robert Haldane, Esq., entitled, "The Books of the Old and New Testaments proved to be canonical, and their verbal inspiration maintained and established, &c." 12mo.

Besides this general defence of the full inspiration of the passages in question, they admit of a more specific support. Take the first of them, viz:—Paul's counsel to Timothy respecting the use of wine. Does not the exhortation in question stand in the midst of a group of precepts, the most solemn and weighty that can be conceived of? Who, then, can prove to me, that the apostle was under inspiration in delivering them, if not in delivering it? And was it altogether unworthy of the Holy Spirit to dictate to Paul such an injunction for the use of Timothy, when the preservation of his health, and his continued labours and usefulness in the church might depend upon it? Besides, does not the very permission to Timothy of a "little wine" inculcate the doctrine of temperance, especially upon all the ministers of Jesus Christ?

As to the second passage, we may fairly assume, with Grotius and Erasmus, the poverty of Paul, but not surely the absence of inspiration. "See," said Grotius, "the poverty of so great an apostle, who considered so small a matter, left at such a distance, to be a loss to him!" "Behold," said Erasmus, "the apostle's household furniture, a cloak to defend him from the rain, and a few books!" With regard to the "books or parchments," unless we knew what they were, it would be the height of presumption to affirm that the request which relates to them was uninspired.

4. I shall only notice one supposition more, viz., that the writers of Scripture sometimes intimate themselves that they are not speaking by inspiration of God. Now, before referring to the instances in question, I would here take leave to observe, that should it even appear, in certain given cases, that inspired men do disavow the immediate dictation of the Holy Spirit, all that can be fairly gathered from this fact will be, that on all other occasions, not thus limited, they spake under his immediate guidance. In reference to certain delicacies belonging to the marriage compact, the apostle thus expresses himself in his first Epistle to the Corinthians:—"I speak this by permission, and not of command." Now who permitted Paul to lay down the rules referred to? Why, unquestionably, the Spirit of God. What is meant, then? That Paul spake by inspiration, but that there was no express command from the Lord on the subject. As at the 10th verse of the same chapter:—"Unto the married," said Paul, "I command, yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband." The meaning is, that upon this particular Christ had issued his own mandate; nevertheless Paul gave command by the Spirit of Christ. "To the rest," said he, "speak I, not the Lord." That is, the remaining counsels of the apostle were such as the great master had left no express injunction about, but which were nevertheless entrusted to him by the Spirit. At the 25th verse of the same chapter the apostle has the following expression: "Now, concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord; yet I give my judgment as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful." The thought is the same here as in the former instances. Though no express command had been given by Christ, on the subject treated of, yet the apostle, as one of his inspired servants, had received that grace which qualified him for a full development of the divine will, in all those things to which the personal ministry of Christ had not been directed.

In the last verse of the chapter the apostle adds—"And I think, also, that I have the mind of Christ;" an expression which some of the most eminent critics have shown not to indicate an uncertain opinion, but full conviction and unhesitating knowledge, as in John v. 39.

But supposing all the above passages, and some others which might be quoted, to be instances in which the apostle spake without the immediate guidance of inspiration,—a thing which I cannot admit for a moment,—it is clear that he must have acted under inspiration in apprising the church that the Spirit did not influence him in such communications; so that nothing can be derived from the objection against the immediate and full inspiration of other parts of the word of God; but on the contrary, it would rather go to the conclusion, that nothing short of an apostolic denial of such inspiration can justify any man in hesitating about the immediate divine authority of a single portion of the word of God.

* Mr. Carew, as quoted by Mr. Haldane.

CONCLUSION.

From the whole of the preceding remarks, we may infer the paramount duty of entire and unreserved submission to the authority of God in the written word. Our reason, our conscience, our affections, are all called to surrender themselves to the heavenly vision. In this inestimable volume God speaks to us upon subjects of the highest interest; and, refusing to listen to his voice, we seal our own unhappy doom. "Hear ye the word of the Lord," is the message addressed to all who possess the sacred boon; and he who by prejudice or sin excludes himself from the benefits of this message, which reveals the only method of salvation, is chargeable with a degree of rashness and folly which eternity itself will but fully disclose. Let the prayer of each one who reads this little treatise be—"Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wonderful things contained in thy law!"

OF

MISS MARY JANE GRAHAM,

LATE OF STOKE FLEMING, DEVON.

BY

THE REV. CHARLES BRIDGES, M. A.

VICAR OF OLD NEWTON, SUFFOLK.

CHAPTER I.

Her Early Life.

"The works of the Lord are great; sought out of all them that have pleasure therein." Elevated, indeed, is the Christian's pleasure in "seeking out the great works" of creation. But it is the work of "Redemption," which mainly attracts his delighted contemplation; as the mirror in which the glory of his God and Saviour is most fully unveiled before him. The "new creation" on the heart of man is one grand division of this perfect work of God; and often does its display of "the beauties of holiness" constrain the world to a reluctant acknowledgment, and excite the Church to joyful adoration—"What hath God wrought!" For not only will the Redeemer's glory be manifested in his saints at the blissful era of his coming; not only will they then be seen as the "jewels" of his everlasting crown; but even now are they "the glory of his inheritance," set forth for the conviction of the world, "that they may see, and know, and consider, and understand together, that the hand of the Lord hath done this, and that the Holy One of Israel has created it." It is the object of the following sketch to bring forth to view one of these striking manifestations of Divine power and grace, and to illustrate, in connexion with this memorial, some of those edifying and instructive lessons which it will be seen to present before us.

Mary Jane Graham was born in London, April 11, 1803. Her father was engaged in a respectable business, from which he retired a few years before his daughter's death (and chiefly from regard to her delicate health,) to the village of Stoke Fleming, near Dartmouth, Devon. She appears to have been the subject of early religious convictions. At the age of seven she had acquired those habits of secret prayer, which may be considered a favourable mark of Divine influence upon her soul. But we will give the history of this era of her life in her own words. To a friend, who had evinced some incredulity of the genuineness or permanency of early impressions of religion, she thus writes:

March 20, 1827.

'You appear, my dear friend, to think very early piety too wonderful a thing to be true. It is wonderful, so wonderful that, when David was contemplating the starry firmament, he was drawn for a moment from his meditation on the wonders he there beheld, by the still greater wonder of "God's ordaining strength out of the mouths of babes and sucklings." But David's wonder and yours were of a very different nature; he wondered and adored. Jesus, too, that "man of sorrows," once "rejoiced in spirit," because God "had hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for it seemed good in thy sight." 'Even so, Lord Jesus; in thy rejoicing will I too rejoice; let the world think me a fool or an enthusiast, or beside myself, as they thought Thee.' The story of 'Little Henry and his Bearer,' to which I believe you allude, I have been assured by Miss ——, is every word of it true. Do not then bring upon yourself the dreadful sin of limiting the power of the Holy One of Israel. Jesus has said, "Suffer little children to come;" and they will come, if He calls them. As facts are the strongest of all proofs, bear with me a little longer, while I tell you briefly the history of a child, for the truth of which I can vouch. I knew a little girl, about sixteen years and a half ago. She was much like other children, as full of sin and vanity as ever she could hold; and her parents had not as yet taken much pains to talk to her about religion. So she went on in the way of her own evil heart, and thought herself a very good little girl, because she said her prayers every night and morning, and was not more passionate, wilful, and perverse, than most of her young companions. The God of love did not think this sinful child too young to learn of Jesus. He so ordered it about the time I am speaking of, when she was just seven years old, that she was led by a pious servant into some almshouses belonging to Rowland Hill, who had just been preaching at them. The servant and an aged woman entered into a long conversation together, to which the little girl listened, and wondered what could make them like to talk about such things. But at the close of it, the old woman took the child affectionately by the hand, and said to her, 'My dear child, make the Lord Jesus your friend now that you are so young; and when you come to be as old as I am, He'll never leave you nor forsake you.' God the Spirit sent these simple words to the poor sinful child's heart. She walked home in silence by her nurse's side, thinking how she could get Jesus to be her friend. Then she remembered how often she had slighted this dear Saviour; how she had read of Him in the Bible, and been wearied of the subject: how she had heard the minister preach Jesus, and wished the long dry sermon over; how she had said prayers to Him without minding what she said; how she had passed days, weeks, and months, without thinking of Him; how she had loved her play, her books, and her toys, and her play-fellows—all, all better than Jesus. Then the Holy Spirit convinced her of sin. She saw that no one good thing dwelt in her, and that she deserved to be cast away from God for ever. Would Jesus love her now? Would he ever forgive her? She feared not; but she would try. She would make herself very good, and then, perhaps, Jesus would be her friend. But the more this little girl tried to be good, the more her naughty heart got the better of her; for she was trying in her own strength. She was led to give up trying in that way; and many long nights did she spend in praying "with strong crying and tears" to Jesus, that He would teach her how to get her sins pardoned, and make her fit to have Him for her friend. Let me mention it for the encouragement of those who seek Jesus, that He did not disdain to listen to the prayers of this little child. He put it into her heart to read the Bible, of which, though she understood not all, yet she gathered enough to give her some comfort. One day her attention was fixed on these words, "The Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Now something that could take away sin was just what this little girl wanted; and she asked her father to tell her who this Lamb of God was. He explained the precious verse. But who can describe the raptures which filled the bosom of this little child, when made to comprehend that the "blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin." Now she fled to Jesus indeed. Now she knew that He had loved her, and given himself for her; now the Spirit of God, who often "chooseth the weak and foolish things of the world, to confound the wise and mighty," "shed abroad the love of God in the heart" of a weak and foolish child, and "filled her with peace and joy in believing." She had no one to whom she could talk to of these things. But she held sweet converse with her reconciled God and Father; and gladly would she have quitted this life to go and dwell with Jesus. Since then she has spent nearly seventeen years of mingled happiness and pain. But she has had Jesus for her friend; and He never has, and never will, forsake her. She has forsaken Him more than once for a season, and turned to follow the vain things of the world. But her Shepherd's eye has been over her in her wanderings, and He has never suffered her quite to depart from Him. To this day her vain and treacherous heart is continually leading her to provoke her heavenly Friend. He "visits her transgressions with the rod, and her iniquity with stripes;" but He has sworn never to "take His loving-kindness from her, nor to suffer His faithfulness to fail." She is constrained to acknowledge, that during all this time she has never done one thing that could merit God's favour. Free-grace, free-mercy, are all her song: "It is of the Lord's mercy she has not long ago been consumed." She is quite sure she could never have changed her own heart. No; God has begun the good work in her, and he must carry it on; and from first to last, let glory be ascribed to Him, and let her take shame and confusion to herself. At this moment she desires to live, if she may be made the means of converting one sinner to Jesus; but if not, she would rather "depart and be with Christ, which is far better." She is far from despising earthly blessings. Every morsel she puts into her mouth, the very air she breathes, is made sweet and refreshing by the loving hand that sends it. Once there was a curse on all her earthly blessings. But now "Christ hath redeemed her from the curse of the law, being made a curse for her." She would give it as her living experience, and leave it when she goes hence as her dying testimony, that there is nothing worth living for except to know Him, and see others come to Him, and wash their guilty souls in the blood of the Lamb. God has given her the blessing of seeing a happy change take place in some of the dear companions of her childhood and youth. She waits upon Him for the salvation of the rest; and there is no one whom she longs after more ardently in the Lord, than that dear and valued friend of her earliest days, to whom this letter is addressed; and to whom she wishes every spiritual blessing, that God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, can bestow now and for evermore! Amen and Amen!'

Some apparent discrepancy may be observed between this exquisitely beautiful and natural letter, and her published account of this important crisis.* Her apprehensions of Divine truth, as expressed in her letter, were indeed clear and enlivening far beyond the average spiritual capacity of children. Yet her 'view of many of the doctrines of Christianity,' which she afterwards so fully developed and so richly enjoyed, were at this time 'very indistinct.' Doubtless also much of natural feeling and excitement was mingled with these early impressions of religion; while what was of a spiritual character, as she afterwards discovered, was not sufficiently grounded upon that sense of universal guilt and helplessness which prostrates the sinner at the foot of the cross, simply dependant upon a free salvation. This superficial cast of impression, without invalidating the reality of a Divine change, will account for the instability which marked her early course in the ways of God. From her own history we learn that she 'was enabled to walk with God in sincerity and without any considerable declension during the greater part of her childhood, and the commencement of a riper age.' After this period, however, 'more than once,' as her letter informs us, she 'forsook' her Heavenly Friend, 'turned to follow the vain things of the world,' and "went on frowardly in the way of her own heart"—"leaning to her own understanding," and led captive in her own folly.

Of this period future notice will be given. Meanwhile we revert to her early years as spent under the roof of her parents or at school. Her parents considered her virtues as those of every day, and not merely called forth on particular occasions. She was a most amiable, affectionate, and dutiful child, seldom needing correction, tender-hearted when told of her faults, and by her general kindness of disposition attaching all the members of the household to herself. She was remarkably free from selfishness; always ready to yield to her companions, even to deprive herself of what she valued. Her little pocket money was generally reserved for some object of distress, or for some token of affection to a friend.

Her quickness of mind was a subject of early observation. Her reading was chiefly obtained by attending to the lessons which were given to her brother, then preparing for school. She was seldom seen without a book in hand, and seemed never so happy as when employing herself in the improvement of her mind. Yet this thoughtful cast of character was by no means tinged with unnatural gloom. In all the harmless games of childhood none of her companions excelled her in playful activity;* while in the midst of her cheerful temperament, it was abundantly evident that the main concern of religion was uppermost in her mind. 'I recollect,' her cousin writes, 'that when we were quite little children, she made some attempt to talk to me about religion; once especially, when we were sitting behind the curtain in the drawing-room at ——. I did not like the subject, and therefore walked away and joined my more worldly-minded companions.'

Her school career commenced soon after she was seven years old. She was however shortly removed, from ill health, and again, about the age of ten, sent to a school of a different kind. Many of her companions who survived her will probably long preserve the remembrance of her peculiar kindness and gentleness of spirit, combined with her superior powers. One of them remarks her great carefulness to screen, as far as it was lawful to do so, the faults of her fellows, and her anxiety to plead for them when in disgrace: and so powerful was her advocacy, that her preceptress was constrained to remove out of her way, when her judgment compelled her to persevere in her discipline. In all the school difficulties, she was the constant resource, ever ready and willing to assist, without any assumption upon the ground of her acknowledged superiority. One trait of peculiar loveliness was here exhibited, (the spirit of which was marked on various occasions in after life,) in her consideration of any of her companions who from any unfavourable causes might appear to be neglected. Those were the objects of her particular notice, and with them she shared all her little indulgences.

Her religious impressions appear to have been cherished by the familiar exhortations of the husband of her perceptress, and by devotional exercises with those of her companions who were living under the practical influence of their Christian instructions. To one of them she proposed to learn every day a portion of Scripture in private, and to repeat it to each other when they retired to rest. At this time she committed to memory the whole of the Prophecy of Isaiah, besides other portions of the sacred Volume.

At the age of twelve her delicate health again occasioned her removal from school. Her illness lasted for about two months, during which time, when confined upon the sofa, she committed to memory the whole Book of Psalms. Indeed her powers of memory were of an extraordinary order. She was much delighted with Milton's Paradise Lost, and had learnt the greater part, if not the whole, of that magnificent poem. For many successive mornings she repeated to her father most correctly upwards of three hundred lines each morning. Upon her recovery from illness she passed several months with a careful servant by the seaside. So instinctive were her habits of active usefulness, that she employed herself, though only in her thirteenth year, in collecting a few children for the purpose of instruction, and in distributing tracts. In returning home to her parents, she enjoyed with them the rich and responsible privilege of the ministry of the late Rev. Samuel Crowther, Vicar of Christ Church, Newgate Street; an eminent "watchman of Ephraim, now with his God." Under his faithful and affectionate instruction she was brought to the ordinance of Confirmation about the age of sixteen, and publicly "joined herself to the Lord in a perpetual covenant never to be forgotten."

These interesting materials of Miss Graham's early life may suggest a few profitable remarks.

Let Christian parents be excited to an immediate and persevering discharge of their anxious responsibilities. Early impressions are of the highest moment in reference to the future course of their children. Let them be prayed for, expected, cherished. They cannot be too early or too urgent in presenting (after the example of the believing parents of old) the petition of the Angel of the covenant; "How shall we order the child, and how shall we do unto him?" They can scarcely fix the precious seed too soon into the fresh soil. The pure simplicity of the rudiments of the Gospel is specially suited to the dawn of infant intelligence; and well would it be, if our children should never be able to recur in after life to the time when these vital truths were first presented to their minds. The child's intellect opens faster than is commonly considered. The first impressions often retain a firm and permanent grasp through life. And abundantly has the experience of the Church testified, that early piety is eminent piety.*

It may appear suspicious, that so little shade is discoverable upon the records of Miss Graham's childhood. But defects cannot be noticed, where they were not observed. Probably our own sphere of observation, if not our immediate circle, is not wholly unfurnished with similar cases, sufficient to preclude an unwarranted incredulity. And indeed these instances often afford the most striking illustrations of the total depravity of the fall. For while Miss Graham was in the estimation of her parents all that their fond hearts could wish, what was she in the sight of God? Self-knowledge under Divine teaching soon discovered to her, that under this attractive garb was hid the mighty principle of alienation of heart from God. There was no natural preparation for heavenly influence. It was only a more lovely appearance of the death that reigned within. Her subsequent expressions therefore of self-abhorrence were not the ebullitions of a false humility, or of misguided fanaticism, but the genuine conviction of the Spirit of God upon her heart.

The subject of our history suggests also the importance of an early excitement of the principles of active usefulness. No doubt Miss Graham's habits of early activity had an important influence in maturing her character for the high privilege of devoting herself to the interests of her fellow creatures. It was Cotton Mather's practice to endeavour to enlarge the minds of his children, by engaging them daily in some 'Essay to do good.' He encouraged and commended them, when he saw them take pleasure in it, and never failed to show them that a backwardness would subject them to his displeasure. This example cannot be too strongly inculcated. To give to children an object beyond themselves, would tend much to counteract the natural principle of selfishness, so baneful to their personal happiness, and to their intellectual, moral and spiritual improvement.

* 'Barker's Parent's Monitor' gives an useful digest of information, well calculated to guide the instructor, and to encourage the diligence and patient perseverance of parental faith. The principles of Christian Education are brought out with much simplicity and practical detail in the valuable and well-known works of Mrs. Hoare and Mr. Babington, which cannot be too highly recommended. Perhaps the most full and interesting illustration of these principles will be found in the Biographies of the Henry Family, (Life of P. & M. Henry, and Mrs. Savage) by Mr. Williams, of Shrewsbury.

CHAPTER II.

Her Relapse into Infidelity.

About the age of seventeen, Miss Graham's mind underwent a most extraordinary revolution. She fell, for a few months, from the heavenly atmosphere of communion with God, into the dark and dreary regions of infidelity. Allusion has already been made to this afflicting circumstance, in her letter. But for a most interesting and graphic detail, the reader must be referred to her own published account; some digest of which will here be given, in order to connect the thread of her history, and to exhibit a clear view of one of the most important eras in her life.

Miss Graham's mind opened in a metaphysical form, unfavourable to a simple reception of truth. And this, connected with a defective apprehension of her lost estate, induced a spirit of self-dependence, one of the most subtle and successful hindrances to the Christian life.* Thus was the way opened to a secret habit of backsliding from God. The foolish vanities of the world for a while captivated her heart; and her manners were remarked to be like any other thoughtless girls of her own age. From frivolity she sought refuge in her more solid intellectual pursuits. All sources of self-gratification within her power were resorted to with the fruitless attempt of obtaining peace in a course of departure from God. Wearied at length with disappointment, this prodigal child "began to be in want;" and many a wishful eye did she cast towards the rich provision of her father's forsaken house. In turning, however, to religion for comfort, she found, to use her own words; 'Alas! I had no religion: I had refused to give glory to the Lord my God; now my feet were left to stumble upon the dark mountains.'

The doctrine of the Divinity of Christ had often been to her (as to many other minds cast in the same mould), an occasion of perplexity. Now it was "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence." Though repeated examination had fully satisfied her that it was the truth of the Bible, yet so repulsive was it to her proud heart, that she was led from thence to question the truth of the Bible itself. 'I suspected,' said she, 'that a system of religion, which involved such apparent absurdities, could not possibly come from God. Determined to sift the matter to the utmost, I eagerly acquainted myself with the arguments for and against Christianity. My understanding was convinced that the Scriptures were divine. But my heart refused to receive the conviction. The more my reason was compelled to assent to their truth, the more I secretly disliked the doctrines of the Bible.'

Continued resistance to convictions was the natural and melancholy result of this inquiry. She determined to lay the subject aside for a while, still 'persuading herself that there must be flaws in the evidence of so strange a history,' which only her want of maturity of judgment, prevented her from discovering. Those early religious impressions, that usually form a bulwark against infidelity, in her case proved a stumbling-block to her faith. Ignorant of the native bias of her heart against the Gospel, she considered them as the effect of prejudice, before her mind had been intelligibly informed or exercised. She now, therefore, determined to burst her chains, and to think and examine for herself.

Hitherto she had confined her perplexities within her own bosom; partly dreading the influence of external bias, and partly fearing to infuse into another's mind doubts concerning a book, which, she could not conceal from herself, might after all be true. She endeavoured now to strengthen her mind by pursuing a course of intellectual study, with the direct design of preserving herself from becoming a dupe to "cunningly devised fables." And here she did not fail subsequently to acknowledge the special forbearance and wisdom of her heavenly Father. Justly might he have deprived her of that reason, which she had so presumptuously set up in his own place. Yet was he pleased to overrule this waywardness of his child as an ultimate means of her restoration, in applying her course of mental discipline to the effectual discovery of the fallacies with which she was now deluded.

The immediate effect however of these studies was decidedly injurious. Their absorbing interest diverted her mind from the main subject of inquiry; while they proved also a temporary refuge against the uneasy disturbance of her conscience. Even her intervals of reflection were too easily soothed by the indefinite postponement of the great concern to "a more convenient season." Occasional convictions were indeed felt, but without any permanent or practical influence.

* She alludes to an injury, which her own mind, in common (as she conceives) with many others, had received from adopting Doddridge's form of covenanting with God. (Rise and Progress, chapter xvii.) This was in her thirteenth year. Let it however be remembered, that, though this mode of dedication may have frequently ministered to a legal spirit, yet it by no means necessarily partakes of an unevangelical character. This "subscribing of the hand unto the Lord," has been found by many eminent Christians, (as, for example, in Philip Henry's family) to be a cord of love, not a yoke of bondage. Allusion is probably made to it as an acceptable ordinance in the service of the Gospel.—Isaiah xliv. 3—5.

Through the Divine mercy this state of infatuation did not prove of long duration. After a few months' captivity, she was brought, though not without severe conflict of mind, to the full light and liberty of scriptural truth.* The conviction of the being of a God, in her darkest moments had never wholly forsaken her. A few hours' contemplation of the starry heavens darted into her mind a piercing reflection upon her stupidity and ingratitude, in what she justly called an 'unnatural and parricidal attempt to banish God from his own creation, to depose him from his natural supremacy over her heart.' Her whole life now appeared to her (what indeed the Scriptures declare it to be) one continued act of sin and folly. Her convictions however of sin, being wholly unconnected with any discovery of the way of forgiveness, naturally tended to despondency. Every fresh sense of the corruption of her heart and of the unsullied purity of the Divine character, brought with it a corresponding sense of guilt. She could expect therefore nothing but punishment proportioned to the infinite sinfulness of her offence. She could not conceive the consistency of her forgiveness with the claim of Divine justice; and the alternative of her eternal punishment seemed even less dreadful than the supposition of any inconsistency in Him, who, in her view, was the Perfection of Holiness. 'I had acquired,' she remarked, 'such a perception of the beauty of holiness, that the thought of an unholy God was worse than hell to me. I felt that I had rather God should pour out on me all the vials of his wrath, than that, carried away by an unworthy softness and weakness, he should forgive, and thereby encourage sin. To undergo eternal punishment was horrible. To acknowledge an unholy God was more horrible.'

As her last expedient, her despised Bible was brought to mind. And 'how different'—she observes—'was the temper of mind, in which I now addressed myself to its perusal, from that in which I had read it in the commencement of my disbelief of Christianity! I was no longer a proud sophist, triumphing in the strength and penetration of human reason, and in the comprehensiveness of human knowledge. The contemplation of my own ignorance, weakness, and wickedness, had laid my pride in the dust. My eyes were opened to view myself as I really was—depraved and blinded in my reason, judgment, and understanding. And this is the process, which must take place in the soul of every man, before he can pursue the search after truth in a right spirit.

Her interest was early directed to the promises of Divine teaching to the sincere inquirer after truth. Their suitableness fixed her attention. Their freeness encouraged her heart. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find. He giveth his Holy Spirit to them that ask him"—especially arrested her. She determined to make trial of them, conceiving that their fulfilment in her own case would be a 'Test of the Truth' of the book, which held them forth for her acceptance. Though hindered at first by a sense of unworthiness, she ventured to apply; justly considering, that whatever might be her apprehensions of her own demerit, yet a state of submission and desire could not be so displeasing to God, as one of carelessness and rebellion. But the description of this anxious crisis must be given in her own striking words. 'Impelled by these reflections—fearful and uncertain, but with uncontrolable, unutterable longings, I directed my applications 'To the unknown God.' O my Redeemer! the first breathings of my soul were not uttered in thy name! I rushed into the presence of my Judge without a mediator. But doubtless even then Thy comeliness was thrown over the deformity of my soul; and the eye of my Father beheld me with pity, for thy dear name's sake. My prayer ascended up to heaven, fragrant with the incense of thy merits; though the poor wretch who offered it thought to please God by leaving thee out of it.

In this prostration of soul, she continued "watching daily at her Lord's gates, waiting at the posts of his doors." It need scarcely be added, she did not seek in vain. The Divine character now appeared before her, not, as before, in its consuming holiness; but in the combined glory of holiness and love. Her apprehensions of sin, of Christ, and of the whole system of Christian truth, were now irradiated with heavenly light; and with simplicity, and godly sincerity" of "heart," she was enabled to "believe unto righteousness." The character of Christ, as a proof of the credibility of the Christian revelation, arrested her particular attention. A minute scrutiny of His spotless life was most satisfactory in its result.* 'The more,' said she, 'I studied this Divine character, the more I grew up as it were into its simplicity and holiness, the more my understanding was enabled to shake off those slavish and sinful prejudices, which had hindered me from appreciating its excellence. Truly his words were dearer to me "than my necessary food." He was my "All in all." I did not want to have any knowledge, goodness, or strength, independently of him. I had rather be "accepted in the Beloved," than received (had that been possible) upon the score my own merits. I had rather walk, leaning upon his arm, than have a stock of strength given me to perform the journey alone. To learn, as a fool, of Christ; this was better to me than to have the knowledge of an angel to find out things for myself.'

After her recovery from this fearful snare of Satan, she was mercifully preserved from "turning again to folly," and led forth in "the path of the just," with increasing light, strength, and establishment. 'From that moment,' she adds, 'I ceased to stumble at the doctrines of the cross. The doctrines of Scripture, which had before appeared to me an inexplicable mass of confusion and contradictions, were now written on my understanding with the clearness of a sunbeam. Above all, that once abhorred doctrine of the Divinity of Christ was becoming exceeding precious to me. The external evidences of Christianity, though I now perceived all their force, were no longer necessary to my conviction. From that time,' she concludes, 'I have continued to "sit at the feet of Jesus, and to hear his word;" taking him for my Teacher and Guide in things temporal as well as spiritual. He has found in me a disciple so slow of comprehension, so prone to forget his lessons and to act in opposition to his commands, that were he not infinitely "meek and lowly in heart," he would long ago have cast me off in anger. But he still continues to bear with me, and to give me "line upon line, and precept upon precept." And I am certain, that he "will never leave me, nor forsake me;" for, though I am variable and inconstant, "with him there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."'†

The Writer cannot but hope, that at this awful crisis, when a moral pestilence (far more dreadful than the late providential visitation) is stalking through the land, the preceding narrative may suggest seasonable caution, conviction, and encouragement to some, especially of his young readers. Let them mark the connexion of the first principles of infidelity, with the exercise of the understanding, and with the state of the heart.

Pride of intellect in Miss Graham's case, was evidently one main cause of her departure from God. When her mind left the strong-hold of faith, her scriptural light, which could only be apprehended through spiritual optics, became obscured, until she was gradually left to the Egyptian darkness of her own understanding. And this we apprehend to be a very usual commencement of an infidel course, upon principles equally opposed to reason and to revelation. Man, in his prurient desire to pass the bounds of revelation, forgets that while "the things that are revealed belong to us and to our children," the "secret things" are no less the property of God. As he has, therefore, reserved them for himself, this

* It may be remarked, that severe providential afflictions about this period concurred with the exercises of her own mind, to awaken her mind to this self-abasing recollection of her fearful departure from God.

* This is not a solitary instance of impression from the contemplation of the character of Christ. Even Mr. Chubb must have felt some conviction, when he describes his life 'as a beautiful picture of human nature in its native purity and simplicity; and showing at once what excellent creatures men would be, when under the influence and power of that gospel which he preached unto them.' (True Gospel, p. 56.) Rousseau's exquisite contrast between Socrates and Christ is well known, concluding with the remarkable acknowledgment respecting the latter:—'The inventor of such a personage would be a more astonishing character than the hero.' Yet could this man's heart resist the clear conviction of his judgment—'I cannot'—he subjoins—'believe the Gospel.' His Confessions, however, clearly trace his unbelief to its proper cause—the love of sin. See John iii. 19, 20,—a text which throws more light upon the secret springs of infidelity, than whole volumes that have been written upon the subject.

† Test of Truth, pp. 112—117. The extracts given from this interesting little work, will be sufficient to commend it to the reader's attention, as the production of an author of no common power, and deeply imbued with the glowing principles of the Gospel. It will remind the reader of some of Mr. Scott's painful exercises of mind described in his 'Force of Truth' and of the argument so successfully handled by Bishop Burnet in his disputations with Lord Rochester.

"intrusion into the things which we have not seen," and cannot see, is the unhallowed indulgence of a "fleshly mind." The extent and precise boundaries of revelation are determined by infinite wisdom; and could we discern them with a single eye, they would be found equally illustrative of a high regard to the happiness of man. A more expanded view under present circumstances would only increase instead of clearing up our difficulties. The eye would wander over the field of infinite space with a disproportioned power of perception. The objects, therefore, would be less distinctly apprehended; and the result would leave us more restless and dissatisfied, while the happy influence of humility, simplicity, and faith had been wholly disregarded. If we have not the whole view before us, let it suffice, that we have all that is needful for our happiness and present duty. The attempt to supply what we conceive to be wanting by the conjectural effort of reason, would be to subject "vain man" to his Maker's merited rebuke—"Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?" Every step of advance beyond the Divine record is fraught with danger and uncertainty. "In God's light" alone "can we see light." The intellectual "light that is in us," when applied by the pride of man to the contents of revelation—"is darkness; and how great is that darkness!" Simple faith, therefore, however mistaken or despised, may justly be deemed the highest act of reason; while rational religion, 'falsely so called,' may easily be proved to be of all schemes the most irrational.*

We would add a few words upon the connexion of infidelity with the state of the heart. We are not exclusively intellectual beings. The affections so materially influence the judgment, as often to incapacitate it for the accurate discernment of truth. The natural bias of the heart is to sin, and consequently to infidelity, the excuse and covering for sin. The point at issue is, whether men shall remain the servants of sin, or become the servants of God; whether they shall be degraded as sensual beings, or raised to the elevation of intelligent or spiritual existence. Now, as the Gospel stands in the way of natural indulgence, it must be removed. So that if a course of infidel reading, or intercourse with scoffers, has not furnished the necessary arguments, they must be invented from the man's own heart. The danger of infidelity is not, therefore, confined to the ungodly and profane. Every unconverted man must secretly wish the Bible to be untrue; and under this bias he will (except restrained by an Almighty power) endeavour to prove it untrue. A wrong state of heart, as with Miss Graham, gives the power and advantage to this active and malignant principle. In her early state of child-like simplicity she would have been safe. But the "fulfilment of the desires of the mind," probably more than of "the flesh," combined with ignorance "of Satan's devices," brought her into his snare; and she was "taken captive by him at his will." Depending upon the teaching of the Spirit of God, our "path" in Divine knowledge will be "as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." And 'whenever' (as an original and powerful writer remarks) 'he opens the Scriptures, that same light that discovers the meaning, will not fail to affect and make our hearts burn within us with the sense of Divine light, authority, and power. Of this the experience of the people of God, as they grow in knowledge, furnishes them daily with new instances; and therefore they do not stumble at the want of the present sense of that light, but are quickened to diligence, excited to frequent cries for opening of their eyes, that they may understand the wonders, that by the knowledge of other parts of the Word, they are induced to believe couched in those parts, which yet they knew not.'

One further remark suggests itself from this interesting record to avoid unnecessary distress and misconception. Let not Miss Graham's vivid portraiture of her own feelings and views be considered as a general standard, as if the same intensity of mental exercise, and clearness of spiritual perception were the exclusive evidences of a sound conversion of heart to God. Self-renunciation, diligent investigation of Divine truth, and a conscientious improvement of the light vouchsafed, are indeed indispensable marks of Christian sincerity. Yet while the enjoyment of our high privileges will vary in proportion to the energy of these holy principles, the measure of their influence is almost indefinitely diversified within the precincts of the true church of God. It may also be important to observe, that many of Miss Graham's most painful trials (such as her intellectual pride) arose out of the peculiar form of her natural character. No sympathy therefore can be expected or need be desired in minds cast in a different mould; and any effort to excite or encourage it, for the purpose of establishing an ideal connexion with this object of attraction, (which would probably be unaccompanied with a desire to imitate the spiritual excellences of the proposed model) can only originate in deceit, and tend to self-delusion.

CHAPTER III.

General sketch of Miss Graham's life; her views of study; extensive attainments; and active devotedness to God.

Miss Graham continued to reside in London for some time after her deliverance from that awful delusion, into which she had been permitted to fall. The remembrance, however, of this temporary apostacy was "ever before her" with all that holy shame and self-abasement, which attaches to the "purified" conscience of the pardoned sinner; humbling her in the dust, while yet faith, hope, love, peace, and joy, were the dominant principles in her soul. Deeply also did she feel the constraint of the command given by anticipation to a backsliding apostle; "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren." It was the great object of her 'Test of Truth,' to set forth her own case as a beacon of warning, an example of encouragement, and a monument of Divine grace, for the special use of those who might be brought into the same seductive atmosphere of temptation. There is reason to believe, that her work in its original form produced its measure of conviction upon her principal correspondent; and we may confidently expect, that, in a wider circulation, an answer to her prayers for a Divine blessing upon it will be abundantly manifested. During her residence in London, the ministry of the Rev. Watts Wilkinson, and a deep study of the sacred volume, were the ordained means of advancing her knowledge and experience of Scriptural truth. Her intellectual habits were a source of much gratification to her; and mainly contributed, under the blessing of God, to form her character into a mould of solid and permanent usefulness. It is however delightful to observe her Christian simplicity and watchfulness, to subordinate these valuable enjoyments to the primary object of the glory of God. Of this the following prayer, found among her papers, will furnish an interesting and edifying illustration.

'Before study of any kind, remember that it is but lost labour, except the Lord bless it.

Summary of things to be sought of God before study.

'I desire to thank Thee, my God and Father in Christ Jesus, for this and every other opportunity of improvement Thou hast given me. May the opportunity Thou hast given

* The writer cannot forbear to add some admirable remarks from an unpublished manuscript of Miss Graham's shortly to be noticed. 'It is true that faith compels our assent to many things beyond the reach of reason, even of the renewed reason. But this implicit credence is itself the highest and noblest exercise of the understanding. It is a reasonable assent to the testimony of One, in whom we repose unlimited confidence, because we have reasonable grounds for concluding Him to be infinitely wiser than ourselves. An exercise of the reason is presupposed, whereby we are assured that the Bible is God's testimony; and an act of the Understanding, whereby, having obtained this assurance, we infer, that every word of the Bible must be true. The Divine philosophy of faith, then, sets out upon these two propositions. The first—an assurance, founded in reason, that the Bible is the revelation of God. The second—an inference, equally founded in reason, that every word of the Bible is true; and must therefore be taken in preference to all the deductions of our own reason, which may or may not be true. Neither of these propositions is shaken by the fact, that the Bible contains many things which we do not understand; or in other words, that God may know many things which we do not know; that many things may appear to his infinitely holy and unclouded understanding, in a very different light, from that in which they are viewed by our narrow and prejudiced minds. When the first proposition is once proved to the entire satisfaction of the mind, the second must follow of course. Then faith, an implicit, childlike faith, becomes the only rational mode of proceeding. Every departure from this faith is a departure from reason; an insult to the understanding; a violation of common sense. And that we do make such departures, only tends to prove, that while the renewed understanding "consents to the law of God that it is holy, just, and good;" "the law of sin," which is yet working "in our members," occasionally beclouds and perverts it.

me be blest of Thee! Enable me to receive it with thanksgiving, and sanctify it to me by the Word of God and prayer. O let me know nothing but Jesus Christ and Him crucified; and other things just so far as may be for my good and thy glory, and no further. I would mourn before Thee the base ingratitude with which I have hitherto abused my time and talents, by loving thy gifts more than Thee, and seeking myself, not Thee, in them. Now I bring all my things to Thee; for they are not mine, but thine own. Take that accursed thing, self, out of them all, and condescend to use them for thy glory. I thank Thee, that the meanest employment is acceptable in thy sight, when done in the name of the Lord Jesus. May I set about this, in His name, and in His strength, and to His glory! May I not once seek my own things in it, but the things that are Jesus Christ's! Let me no longer lean to my own understanding; but may I so acknowledge Thee in all my ways, that Thou mayest establish my thoughts, and direct my paths! Suffer me not to be wise in my own conceit, nor vainly puffed up in my fleshly mind. Make me to lean from mine own wisdom. Be Thou my wisdom. Holy Lord God the Spirit! who dividest unto every man severally as Thou wilt, bless such of my studies, and in such a degree as may be most to thy glory. If it be thy will, prepare me by them for the work to which I desire thou wouldst call and separate me.* I commit this work, to which I would devote myself, into thy hands. Prosper it or not as Thou seest good. Thy will be done respecting it, only take all self-seeking out of it; get thyself glory, Lord, in all that I do; and keep me from ever wishing to rob Thee of thy glory. Lord, if thou wilt bless me abundantly, grant that in whatever Thou givest me, I may remember I have received it, and not glory as if I had not received it. I set myself to this employment in the name of Jesus: may I have fellowship with Him in it! Let it not become a snare to me; but may the Lord who is my confidence, preserve my foot from being taken in this net, which has so often entangled me!

'O Thou Glorifier of Jesus! take of the things that are His, and show them unto me, and unto all Thy people, with such light and power, that our wills, desires, and affections may be quite swallowed up in His love. Let us have no will but Thy most holy will. Convince us that all things else are mere dross and dung, in comparison with that most excellent knowledge of our dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, which do thou give us every day more abundantly, making us to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge. Even so, Holy Spirit, for the sake of thy great mercies in Christ Jesus, to whom with Thee and the Father, be all the honour, all the praise, and all the glory, now and for ever. Amen.'

In the same spirit, an extract from a letter to a young friend engaged in the work of tuition, gives the following sensible advice, with a modest reference to her own case.

March 22, 1827.

'You ask me whether I think study is wrong. I think, on the contrary, if we study with a view to the glory of God, it becomes a duty to do so. If we study merely to please ourselves, I think it is wrong. Your situation seems to render study necessary; and when we reflect, how few of those who are engaged in teaching are truly pious, it ought to stir us up to the best improvement of our time and talents. The love of study and mental amusements has been my great snare, and has so very often led me astray, that I have been tempted to give it up altogether. I feel thankful to God, that whenever I have begun to make some progress in my favourite study, he has thwarted my attempt to excel by some seasonable interruption, a fit of illness or some domestic trial. But when I think how very useful a moderate degree of mental cultivation may make me, and particularly that it seems the way of usefulness most suitable to me, if I should recover my strength, I mean to resume it as soon as I can; and I hope in Christ, through whose goodness every opportunity of improvement is given, that he will not suffer these opportunities to become hindrances to my advancement in the knowledge of him. Let us pray to be taught to feel, that all earthly knowledge is mere dross and dung, in comparison with the most excellent knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and then I trust we may pursue, without abusing it, only taking care never to neglect any present duty, or any spiritual duty for it.'

* This was a plan, which lay very near her heart, for the gratuitous instruction of the children of Missionaries, and of Christians in reduced circumstances, with a view to qualify them for the situation of teachers.

But we will here give some large extracts from an unpublished Treatise 'On the Intellectual, Moral, and Religious uses of Mathematical Science,' as conveying her full and matured views upon this important subject.*

Speaking of study generally, she marks with accurate discrimination the different principles of the worldly and the Christian student.

'Many and varied are the motives by which the worldly student is actuated. But his views all centre in some way or other in his own person. Self-gratification, self-advancement, self-interest, are mingled with them all. The Christian student is also variously influenced. But he has learned to transfer all his actions to another centre. The glory of his reconciled God is the point on which they all turn, the compass by which they are all directed. The outward conduct of the two characters may present many points of similarity. Their inward intentions are totally and irreconcilably different. The intrinsic excellence of science, its ennobling influence upon the mind, the delights that are to be enjoyed in the pursuit of it, and the benefits that are to be reaped in its attainment;—these are objects common to the man of the world, and to the religious man. But mark wherein the difference consists. With the former they are primary objects of consideration; the latter beholds them only in a secondary point of view. The Christian student is far from despising the advantages of study. He has felt what it is to thirst after knowledge, and possesses a keen relish for the pleasures of intellect. But he puts all these considerations away from him, till he has answered a question of higher importance. His first inquiry is—'How shall I study for God? How shall I render my acquirements subservient to his glory?' If he cannot answer the question to his complete satisfaction, the uneasy recurrence of it will prove a continual drawback to the spirited and successful prosecution of his studies.'

Upon a very prevalent misconception upon this subject, she gives the following just remarks,—

'It has been too much the practice with a well-meaning but injudicious portion of the religious world, to decry human learning, as if it were a thing absolutely unchristian and pernicious. They attack it in the gross, and apply to it all that the Scripture has said concerning "the wisdom of this world." They appear to forget that these censures apply not to the use, but to the abuse, of human learning. Those who "lean to their own understanding," who are "wise in their own conceits," who set human wisdom in the place of the Holy Ghost's teaching—these are the wise and learned, of whom the Scripture affirms, that the things of the kingdom are hid from their eyes. But the description was never meant for the

* We subjoin an analysis of this manuscript, which will give some view of the extent, general accuracy, and spiritual character of Miss Graham's mind. Introduction. Chapter I. A review of the Disadvantages and Temptations to which the Religious Student is Exposed. In the Introduction she specifies the persons for whom she primarily wrote—'those who, in the ardour of their pursuit after human learning, are not unmindful of its immeasurable inferiority to "the wisdom which is from above." To them,' she remarks, 'study of every kind presents considerations of higher import than even the intellectual benefits that are reaped from it. The introduction of religion into secular matters is too often censured as impertinent and unseasonable; and many will think it wholly out of place in a work professedly on science. I can only reply,' she adds, 'by the simple confession, that I should grieve to be acquainted with that science, which might not, under God, forward in some way or other the grand object of my existence. "Thou shalt teach them diligently to thy children, and shalt talk of them, when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." (Deut. vi. 7.) These are the commands of God concerning the momentous truths of Scripture. They leave us very little time for science, independent of religion. Every believer in the Bible will endeavour to act in the spirit of these words. He will consider that time as lost, which is spent without regard to eternity; and that learning as useless, which he cannot employ in subservience to heavenly knowledge.' This valuable manuscript was written about two years before her death. She had intended, during her last illness, to have revised it for publication. But increasing weakness, and the overwhelming impression of the near prospect of eternity, compelled her to relinquish her design.

discouragement of those who pursue human study in a simple, child-like dependence upon God. It sometimes happens, that the young convert, full of religious zeal, and possessed with some vague and ill-defined notions of the worthless ensnaring nature of human learning, is led by a mistaken sense of duty either entirely to abandon it, or greatly to slacken his efforts in the attainment of it, and so to shut himself out from a wide field of future usefulness.'

Upon the lawfulness of study she draws the line with great precision and Christian simplicity.

'Does the time'—she asks—'you now devote to study, break in upon any known and immediate call of duty? If it does, your way is clearly pointed out. No prospect of future good can justify you in the neglect of present duty. Your studies must, according to circumstances, be wholly abandoned, or laid aside, till you can resume them without feeling that conscience is drawing you another way. Perhaps you are ready to exclaim, that "this is a hard saying." You cannot contentedly resign or postpone your hopes of mental improvement. Still less can you consent to hazard the loss of all that you have already acquired. Suffer me to remind you of two points of view, in which it imports you to consider this question.

'I readily admit, that the studies of worldly men may be successful, notwithstanding the evil spirit in which they are prosecuted. "They have their reward." But nothing that you do can prosper, without the divine blessing. This must be the crown of your undertakings, or you labour in vain. If you know any thing of the spirit of prayer, you make it your constant request, that all your doings may prosper, as far as they will promote the glory of God, and no further. In answer then, to your own petition, God must withhold his blessing from your most laudable employments, if they do not lie in the direct path of duty. On this account you have no rational prospect of success. If you do succeed, be assured that some root of bitterness will spring up from the very accomplishment of your purposes. To continue your studies, therefore, under existing circumstances, would be to subject yourself to certain vexation and disappointment.

'On the other hand, I would remind you, that if you simply attend to your duty, and resolutely forego the most beloved pursuits the moment they come into competition with it, there is no fear that you should lose any thing by such conduct. He who made and who preserves your intellectual faculties, can surely enable them to retain anything that will be really useful to you. Your small stock of knowledge will, with his blessing, carry you further than the acquisition of the whole circle of human science could do without it. We may affirm of intellectual gains, no less than of those which are gross and tangible, that "a little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked." We are commanded to "be careful for nothing, but in every thing to make our requests known unto God." You may therefore, in faith, commit your studies and acquirements to Him. You may freely ask, and confidently expect, that he will take care of them for you, and return them to you, whenever they shall be wanted for his service.'

The lawfulness of study being proved, its expediency, importance, and responsibility, are next considered.

'But perhaps the contrary to all this is your case. You feel that you can devote a certain portion of your time to study, without infringing upon any prior and more imperious demand of duty. If it be thus with you, your studies are undoubtedly lawful. It only remains to inquire, how far they may be expedient for you.

'Of this, you must yourself be the best judge. It must depend on a variety of circumstances, the particular bent of your talent; the opportunities of improvement which lie within your reach; your present situation, or your future prospects in life. Let us suppose that all or any of these combine in such a degree, as to give you reason to hope that your studies may open a door of usefulness. I shall endeavour to convince you, that no fancied dread of the snares and temptations attendant upon human learning ought to deter you from the pursuit of it. In your case the acquisition of knowledge is not merely a permitted employment, but a positive duty. God has made nothing in vain. He has given us nothing, which we may not use to his glory. This we admit without reluctance in reference to every minor blessing, with which his bounty has enriched us. We acknowledge, that our health, time, riches, influence, are all entrusted to us for God's service, and capable of being used to his glory. But do not they make a strange exception to this general admission, who so roundly assert the utter inefficiency of human reasoning, and of human learning? If so many things, which we possess in common with unbelievers, may yet be legitimately improved to the glory of God, why is the understanding to be excepted? Why must that best and fairest of God's common gifts be suffered to lie waste, only because it is a common one? None can deprecate more earnestly than I do the idea, that the unassisted light of human reason can ever make us wise unto salvation. But shall we therefore say, that the reason takes no part whatever in our reception of truth? Remember, that he who gives you spiritual teaching is the very same, who gave you this human understanding. He gave you not the former to supersede and overpower, but to guide and enlighten, the latter. Both are alike his gifts; and though the one is inferior to the other, and useless without its aid, yet we must neither neglect nor despise it. Nothing that he gives can be worthless. So much for reason itself. And as for those parts of human learning, which contribute to strengthen and improve this faculty, they also are given by God; means which he has adapted to the fulfilment of no ignoble purpose. We are just as much bound to use those instruments, which Providence has placed within our reach for the cultivation of our understandings, as we are bound to attend to the culture of our fields. Nay, unless we deny that our minds are better things than our fields, we are more called upon to encourage the growth of the former than of the latter. If God has given you superior faculties, and the means of improving them, there cannot be a more manifest token, that he intends they should be improved. The parable of the talents is never more fairly exemplified, than when, in the way of duty, we go and trade with the natural abilities which our Divine Master has distributed to us, till we can bring them back to him with the grateful acknowledgment, "Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds."

'If then you are possessed of superior powers of mind, remember, that the source from whence they emanate is divine. Esteem the gift very highly for the Giver's sake; and seek to bring it to that perfection, of which he has made it susceptible. Use your talents, as not abusing them. Keep them in the dependent, subordinate station which they are intended to occupy. Expect not from them more than they are capable of performing. But expect something from them. Do something with them. Cannot you find any use for them? Take them to God. He has large fields for their employment. There is ample room in his vineyard. Pray that he would send you forth to labour in some way or other in that plenteous harvest, whose labourers are so few. There is nothing so sweet as this simple committal of your way to one, who is infinitely able to guide and protect you in it. "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths." Then they become paths of usefulness indeed. The most brilliant fancy, the profoundest judgment, clearest understanding, the most extensive learning, are in themselves less than nothing. But intreat the blessing of God upon them; and you shall find they will be worth just so much as he pleases. The infidel exerts the whole force of his understanding, blinded as it is by the god of this world, in opposing the doctrine of the cross. Let yours, illumined by a beam from the fountain of light, be no less unequivocally devoted to the service of the cross. Think not the time lost that you spend in study, if you are studying in and for God. Do not say; 'I will lay aside the vanity of human learning, and trust only to the divine teaching for powers of sound argument and appropriate expression.' You might with equal justice say, 'I will abandon the superfluous toil of ploughing my lands, and confide in Providence for a plentiful crop.' It is true in both these cases that the increase cometh from God only; but it is no less true, that he will have the planting and the watering to be ours. God will not help you, if you refuse to help yourself. The trust of the slothful is an impious and a foolhardy trust. His mind, like his vineyard, shall be grown over with weeds.

'In intellectual, as well as in spiritual gifts, "the Spirit divideth unto every man severally as he will." Thus we read, that "Bezaleel was filled with the Spirit of God, in all manner of workmanship, to work all manner of work, of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer." And if these meaner talents come directly from him, how much more the nobler properties of the understanding! Are you indebted to his bounty for the possession of a piercing and commanding intellect, and strong powers of reason? I am sure he did not give them to you for nothing? Why fold that napkin round them? It is your Lord's treasure. What possible right have you to "bury it in the earth?" Do what you will with your own, if indeed you can find any thing which is your own. But beware how you trifle with what is his. He is coming, and will expect to "receive it with usury."

'Consider, had those powers of mind belonged to you as the bondman of Satan, how would you have toiled to perfect them for his service! How much mischief would you have contrived to do with them! And shall "the Lord's freeman" take no pains to improve his talents in his Redeemer's cause? Shall no good be done with them, now that they are Christ's? It is in truth a strange doctrine, that they must lie dormant, because Satan has no longer any claim upon their exertion.

'Why is it, that we have such a dread of calling in the aid of our reasoning powers? Is it not, because we look upon reason as something of our own? If we reason in faith, is it not the Spirit of our Father speaking within us, just as much as in any other mode of addressing the unconverted? If we employ human means only so far as we have the warrant of Scripture, of past experience, and of present providences; if we cultivate our faculties in the humblest and simplest dependence upon God; surely this is neither making flesh our arm, nor "leaning to our own understanding."'

Some difficulties connected with study are then discussed in interesting connexion with Christian principles.

'I cannot but attribute many of the difficulties which perplex and obstruct the Christian student, to his not studying sufficiently in faith. We do not pursue our intellectual contemplations in the same simple, child-like dependence, which we are sometimes enabled to carry into our other duties. We make study an employment too entirely secular. We are apt to consider it as something wholly apart from religion. It is one of those subjects, upon which we do not permit ourselves to converse freely with our heavenly Father. To apply to him at every step for counsel and assistance, would convey to us an idea of presumption. We are afraid to trifle with the majesty of God, by expecting that he will take an interest in the mere earthly improvement of the intellect. That he both gave us this intellect, and bestowed on us the means of its cultivation, is admitted by us beyond the possibility of a doubt. We adore the bounty which has adorned and enriched us. But we hesitate to believe in a condescension, which shall stoop to notice the petty progress of each minute portion of this intellect, and make its daily and hourly advancement the object of benevolent concern. I would not, my beloved fellow Christians, utter one single expression, which might impair your veneration for the Divine Majesty. But in this timid reserve I perceive no marks of genuine veneration. Your privilege is to draw near to God with the tender reverence, the sacred familiarity, of a beloved child. To shrink from his presence with the retiring fearfulness of a slave, is to dishonour the scripture representation of his attributes. And in which of your earthly affairs can you hope that the benevolence of your Father will be interested, if not in the cultivation of your reason? It is the gift, by which he has distinguished you from the rest of his earthly creation. It is that, which stamps you with the impress of Divinity, which tells you, you are born to immortality. The immensity of condescension by which the Most High bends his regard to any of our paltry concerns, is indeed beyond conception, as it is beyond praise. But if, where all is so unworthy, I might dare to mention one thing as less unworthy of his notice, it would be the progress of the mind. We "are fearfully and wonderfully made." But our intellectual faculties are the surpassing wonder, the crowning excellence of God's creation. The countless worlds that are scattered over the infinity of space, declare the glory of God. The magnificence which created, the strength which upholds, the wisdom which governs the mighty system, afford inexhaustible matter of wonder and adoration. But the intellect, which is able to reflect upon all this, is something far more admirable, in which the glory of God is more greatly conspicuous. The original formation of reason is not, however, more wonderful, than the improvement of which it is capable. A man of a highly cultivated understanding appears altogether a being of a different order from one wholly destitute of the advantages of education. Reason, as it is the noblest of our faculties, so it is the most capable of being conducted to a high degree of perfection. And God is glorified in the perfection of his works. When therefore you cannot confidently look for communion with God in the exercises of your understanding; when you are afraid to expect his co-operation in the use of the meanest of those human aids which he has given you for its improvement, it can only be accounted for in two ways. This hesitation proceeds either from the absence of a religious motive, or from an infirmity of faith. If you have no decidedly religious motive for your studies, I do not see how, with any colour of propriety, you can devote yourself to them at all. I am not surprised to hear, that doubts and difficulties throng your path. But if you are seeking to cultivate your understanding with a single eye to God's glory, you may so conduct each one of your literary employments as to enjoy his presence all the time you are engaged in it. You may draw near to God, even in your studious hours. He will not despise any thing that you do for him. His love accepts your worthless services with as much complacency as the princely obedience of an angel. I repeat it; to study in faith, in a humble, simple, child-like faith, removes every perplexity and temptation incident to its pursuit. Your employments will then cease to appear altogether secular. Cultivating your reason as God's gift, and assured, that he beholds not with indifference your feeble attempts to glorify him in this greatest wonder of his creative power; its commonest exercises will become in a measure sacred as the exercises of religion. Spiritual improvement, with no lingering step, will accompany your intellectual progress. "Holiness to the Lord" will be written upon the most trivial of your studies.'

The influence of a vain-glorious spirit, as the canker upon this holy principle of faith, is pointedly illustrated.

'When once the thought of what men will say of us is permitted to mingle with our studies, all spiritual comfort in them is at an end. Our faith must necessarily languish. It can no longer be a living faith, an active principle. "How can ye believe, which receive honour one of another?" was the severe rebuke of Jesus to the vain-glorious Pharisees. When I observe a Christian delighted with the homage that is paid to his eloquence, his judgment, or his taste, should he tell me, that his "love is not waxing cold," that his faith is as strong as when none but God cared for his obscure name, I should be beyond measure astonished at such a circumstance, if indeed I could credit its reality. But in truth, the assertion only proves that the man's heart must be already "hardened through the deceitfulness of sin;" or that he has never known what true faith is, for "how can he believe," so long as he is "receiving honour from men?"'

The snare of self-indulgence connected with study, is most profitably treated.

'I have all along supposed, that you are studying with a view to the benefit of others, rather than to your own gratification. Yet even in this case self-indulgence may insinuate itself into your pursuits. If you possess a talent for them, they will prove so attractive to you, that you will become attached to them for their own sake. You will be tempted to prolong your pleasing employments, and suffer them gradually to steal something from the time appointed for other duties. We have already touched upon the absorbing nature of our mathematical studies, and the intellectual disadvantages which ensue from giving way to their silent encroachments. These, however, are of small moment, when compared with their corroding influence upon our spiritual enjoyment. An excessive fondness for these abstruse meditations, a habit of indulging in them for their own sake, will be as a worm at the root of our communion with God. A lamentable declension from his ways, will be the probable consequence. By insensible degrees the thoughts of our literary pursuits will begin to mingle with our serious meditations. Then the hour of study will break in upon the hour of prayer, and perhaps in time may totally interrupt or supersede it. Who can tell the train of evils which will follow such an intermission of our spiritual watchfulness? When prayer is omitted, study is unsanctified. Every selfish motive has free permission to enter; nay, is invited, as it were, to take possession of the heart, whose sentinel has thus deserted his post. And with what impertinent excuses do we entertain conscience all the time! 'I am just now so occupied, that I am scarcely in frame for prayer. Were I to attempt it, I should find it impossible to disengage my thoughts from the busy, perplexing reflections which have taken fast hold of them. When I have followed out these investigations to some satisfactory conclusion; when I have considered this or that point a little more fully; when I have conquered this difficulty, or corrected that mistake, then my mind will be in a placid uninterrupted frame. Then shall be my hour of prayer. I shall then betake myself to my spiritual duties with tranquillity and delight; whereas now they would be a weariness, a formality.' Thus the hour of prayer is put off to "a more convenient season." Our contemplations detain us longer than we had anticipated. The evening shades thicken round us; still we are deeply engaged in our inquiry; still unsatisfied with the result. Midnight surprises us at our labours; and at last the lateness of the hour warns us to repose, before we have found time to pray. A sense of languor and drowsiness, the natural result of our intense mental exertions, either quite prevents our devotions, or compels us to insult God with a prayer from which the heart is absent. We retire to rest with the painful feeling that we have lost a day. For every Christian must be sensible, that he cannot rob God of his portion of the day, without robbing himself of the whole. Still the deceitfulness of sin will follow us with a lying consolation. 'It is but one day; to-morrow I shall awake refreshed, and my first thoughts shall be with God.' Let us not silence conscience with this deceitful plea. If I am not greatly mistaken, this one lost day is the forerunner of many more. Our foot has begun to slide, our steps to decline. To a heart prone to depart from God, this retrograde motion is natural and easy, while the effort to regain a forward progress is immensely difficult. The sin to which we have yielded to-day, will revisit us to-morrow with more urgent solicitations. Self, having obtained the indulgence of one day, will plead hard for another. To make no more than one deviation from the straight path, is infinitely more difficult than not to deviate from it at all. "The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways." Perhaps the very circumstance of having a religious motive for study, may then be used by us as a cloak to hide our defection. 'All my pursuits are designed to fit me for engaging in God's service. I cannot therefore go very much out of the way of duty, by devoting to them a little more time than prudence might otherwise have dictated. My present diligence will one day be turned to account in the cause of religion; it cannot therefore be wholly misplaced.' Thus, in the plenitude of self-indulgence, we can talk to ourselves about our zeal for the Lord Hosts. Our conduct resembles that of the priests, who "offered polluted bread upon the altar, and then said, 'Wherein have we polluted thee?'" If we would offer any acceptable service to God, it must not be thus defiled with self. "Hath the Lord as great delight in" our worthiest pursuits, "as in obeying the voice of the Lord?" We are told that "to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." Our poor worthless attempts in the cause of our Redeemer can be of no value, but as they are accepted by God through his intercession. How foolish then to imagine that we can succeed, while we neglect thus offering them to God in frequent and faithful prayers! If we will work in our own strength, we must expect to be left to such success as our own strength is able to ensure.

'Do you, upon serious reflection, perceive that you are now yielding in any way to this self-indulgent temper? Let me earnestly recommend a temporary cessation, if possible, from the employments that have ensnared you. A month, a week, in some cases even a day, rescued from your too fondly cherished occupations, and devoted to earnest prayer for future preservation and direction, may enable you to resume them without danger. But, as you value your peace and spirituality of mind, beware of returning to them, till you experience so much sweetness in heavenly things, as to make the very best of earthly things appear trifling and insipid in the comparison. The memory of Henry Martyn is sacred to every Christian student. The rule by which he regulated his literary pursuits, deserves to be called the golden rule of study. Let us carry it into all the parts of human learning. It will strip them of every excessive and ensnaring attraction. 'So deep,' says his biographer, 'was his veneration for the word of God, that when a suspicion arose in his mind, that any other book he might be studying was about to gain an undue influence over his mind, he instantly laid it aside; nor would he resume it, till he had felt and realized the paramount excellence of the Divine oracles.'

She adverts to what she had said above, as suggesting a safe-guard against some temptations of self-sufficiency and self-dependence.

'The only effectual remedy I have met with, is to consider human reason and spiritual teaching in one respect exactly in the same point of view: I mean, as both freely bestowed by God, to be increased, continued, or suspended, at his pleasure. I would consider every little improvement in my studies; the smallest extension of my intellectual powers; the least ray of light that shines in upon my natural reason, when engaged in the commonest earthly speculations; all these I would consider as coming just as directly and absolutely from the Spirit of my God, as I do those sacred influences which inform and comfort my spiritual existence. Ceasing to look upon reason as our own, we should cease to lean upon it with a misplaced confidence. What we expect from it would be expected from the God to whom it belongs, not from ourselves, who have no right in it. The only way to preclude all glorying and trusting in our own things, is, to have nothing of our own. Then, when all is God's, we can neither confide too much, nor expect too largely. Thus David acted. He said, "I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me." Did he therefore resign the use of the sword and of the bow? No: but he ascribed the strength which moved his arm in wielding them to God; "It is God that girdeth me with strength;" "He teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight." There is nothing so reasonable or so delightful as this unreserved ascription of all our intellectual powers to "God our Maker, who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven." He who thus realizes the property of God in his reasoning faculties, may without arrogance indulge in anticipation of their usefulness, which to a weaker faith, would seem the height of presumption. It is not that he esteems the instrument too highly; but that, viewing it as God's instrument, he can set no bounds to its efficiency. He does not imagine that his own arm can bring victory. But through God he knows he shall do valiantly. He enters deeply into the prophet's feelings; "I cannot speak, for I am a child." But the answer of the Lord is graven upon his memory; "Whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak." He is ready to exclaim with Moses, "Who am I, that I should go upon the Lord's errand? I am slow of speech, and of a slow tongue." But his diffidence vanishes before the firm assurance that God "will be with his mouth, and teach him what to say." To cultivate our reasoning powers with this absolute hopelessness of their single efficacy, and these large expectations from them as instruments in the hand of God, is to bring a certain blessing upon all that we do with them. Hope nothing from yourself. Think nothing too great to hope from the bounty of your God. A firm adherence to this simple rule would enable you to bring your reason to the highest degree of perfection; for God will honour those who thus honour him. "Cease then from your own wisdom." "Trust in the Lord with all your heart, and lean not to your own understanding." Sure I am that if your trust be thus in the Lord, he will teach you "excellent things in counsels and knowledge." You shall both "know the certainty of the words of truth," and be able to "answer the words of truth to them that send unto you."' Again, 'It is the perfection of intellectual enjoyment to receive reason entirely as the gift of our God, and every improvement of it, as a fresh token of his love. Every thing is good, must be good, if we view it in this light. How shall it not be good, if it comes directly from our Father's hand? How shall it not be very good, if sanctioned by our Father's blessing? You know that "a gift is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that hath it; whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth." And then, "the blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich; and he addeth no sorrow with it." The poorest trifle becomes valuable, if it be the gift of love. But reason is itself a precious stone, a costly gem. When received as a gift it becomes a charmed stone, a talisman to shield from harm, and to ensure prosperity. Only acknowledge all your earthly acquirements in this light, and you shall find, that, whichever way you turn them, success shall attend your endeavours. Regard every one of your mental faculties as given to you by creating love. Rejoice in the gift, because redeeming love has restored it to you with a seven-fold blessing. Here is a shield of love, if the shield of faith appear insufficient for your defence. For will not you earnestly guard against the abuse of a thing so given and so blessed?'

Her encouragement and advice in the resistance of self-indulgent temptations is truly excellent.

'It is encouraging to reflect, that if "you are Christ's, all things are yours." Whatever talents he has given you are yours, freely to use and improve. They are also His; therefore you may confidently expect, that he will get glory to himself out of them. And this, if I mistake not, is your wish. Your acquirements are of no value in your eyes, except as you can use them for Christ. Begin then and end all your studies with him. Seek to find communion with God in every one of them. "Do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, and to the glory of God." The curse which clings to the best of earthly things, and which once shed its baneful influence on all your intellectual faculties, is now taken away in Christ Jesus. Once perhaps your talents might have made you a splendid mischief, a brilliant pest to society. Now if you use them in faith, they shall be an instrument of healing and of blessing.'

The following closing remarks place the balance between intellectual and Christian wisdom with admirable clearness and beauty.

'On the whole, in attempting to decide upon the true merits of human learning, my readers will not acquit me of the charge of inconsistency, unless they bear in mind the two-fold principle upon which my assertions are founded, and from which I hope I shall not appear to have deviated. On the one hand, I conceive that to enlarge and strengthen, to cultivate and refine, to enrich and beautify the intellect, is of all the objects of mere earthly attainment, incomparably the most worthy. Viewing study in this light, I cannot but speak in its favour with some degree of liveliness and passion, as one who has tasted, though very slightly, of the benefits which flow from it. On the other hand, when I compare this best of earthly things with the lowest and meanest of heavenly attainments, it sinks ineffably in my esteem; no longer possessing any intrinsic worth, but valuable only from its subserviency to these higher objects. Considering it, therefore, in this point of view, I am exceedingly fearful of overrating its efficacy. I am led to speak of it with the caution due to a pursuit, which is equally capable of becoming a singular blessing, or an extraordinary snare. Thus when I weigh intellectual cultivation in any earthly balance, I cannot but adjudge to it a decided superiority. But when I place it in the balance of the sanctuary, I perceive that it has no weight at all, but what it derives from the blessing of God on accompanying circumstances. By affixing to human learning any independent value, we take from it that which it really has; for though exceedingly useful as a submissive attendant upon divine knowledge, it can do us nothing but harm, if we permit its entrance as a dominating usurper.

'We should be less apt to set our hearts upon the pleasure of intellect, if we reflected how much they partake of the evanescent nature of all earthly enjoyments. When this little moment which we call life is fled, of what use shall our studies be to us? Our enlarged faculties will then discern in an instant more than a thousand lives of intense application would now enable us to discern. Our earthly pursuits and attachments are among those "childish things, which we shall put away," when we arrive at man's estate. The very best and wisest of them are but the "summi amores puerorum, qui una cum prætextâ ponentur." While, however, we are in this fleeting state of existence, we must not despise those temporary delights and assistances, which the goodness of God has so wonderfully adapted to our imperfection; nor need we fear to avail ourselves of them with due moderation, and in a simple dependence upon God's blessing. But never let it be said of the Christian, that he is so much absorbed in "things temporal," as to neglect, for one moment, "the things which are eternal." '

The intrinsic excellence of these remarks render an apology for their introduction needless. The high and general importance of the subject, the full development of its true principles, the solid and expanded views, and, above all, the Christian wisdom, spiritual simplicity, and unction which pervade the discussion, will commend it to the profitable attention of every intelligent reader. The treatise itself (the writer here speaks from more competent judgment than his own) might probably be considered by men of science, as not formed upon the more approved system of mathematical study; and, though displaying much power and clearness of mind, is occasionally inaccurate in definition and illustration. The practical and excursive remarks (judging from the preceding extracts, and some others hereafter to be adduced) will however be generally considered to possess no common value.

The writer has been induced to extract so largely from this instructive manuscript, chiefly with a view to two important classes of persons in the present day. In this era of religious excitement the minds of a large mass are at work, inquiring, or rather speculating, in a feverish state of restlessness and perplexity. Their feelings are interested, animated, and more or less intensely occupied with the engrossing subjects now brought before the church. Yet often—among the young especially—whether from defect of education or of mental cultivation, their judgments have little power of discrimination; their principles are confined; and their profession mainly characterized by spiritual dissipation, which exposes them to the besetting snares of a disputatious temper, self-conceit, and self-delusion. To such we would strongly recommend the principles, obligations, and advantages of Christian study, which Miss Graham has so admirably laid out before them. The solid influence of these intellectual habits upon her own character, furnishes the most satisfactory illustration of their importance. So far from diverting her attention from the supreme concerns of eternity, they enabled her, through Divine teaching, the more steadily to concentrate her interest in habitual, enlivening, and practical contemplation.

To Christian professors, whose habits and pleasures are found in the field of intellect, we cannot but observe, how much they may learn from this highly-gifted saint, of that "simplicity and godly sincerity," that careful inspection of motives, that watchful subordination of natural indulgence to the supreme object of the glory of God, which can alone exclude the blast of Divine jealousy from these legitimate sources of enjoyment. All her views of science were received through a spiritual medium, and elevated her soul to the hallowed atmosphere of communion with her God. The spirit of prayer was the constant guard upon her intellectual studies. Never did she enter upon the daily course of tuition with her young cousin without earnestly imploring the blessing of her heavenly Father. We have already seen a specimen of her spirit of supplication on this interesting subject, upon which it would be well for the student to meditate, till his heart becomes deeply imbued with its simple spirituality and enlargement. How delightful again is the pattern set forth in one of her letters! Speaking of some perplexities relative to the pursuing of her studies, she adds—'I am now resolved, God helping me, to give this week to prayer, presenting each of my studies to Jesus, that he may prosper and sanctify it by his Spirit, take from it all self-love, and cause me in all my employments, even in the least, to aim at his glory, and to labour in his name. Join with me in this prayer.' Not less instructive is the practical spirit that pervaded her studies. Nothing was done for self-indulgence. Her pursuits were only valuable in proportion as they were consecrated. In every thing, to her to live was Christ. Nothing besides seemed worthy the name of life. Nothing seemed to command her interest independent of this great object. To a correspondent, who had inquired her sentiments relative to the cultivation of her mind, she writes—'I think it may be done, with a prayer however, and a resolution, that all that we do shall one day be employed in the service of Christ. I think the only thing is, never to lose sight of this great object. And to this end I know no other means than that of making it a subject of prayer. I have often been prevented from praying for success in study, because I thought it was better only to mention spiritual wants at the throne of grace. But I now think, that after having asked a blessing upon our common occupations, we are less likely to forget the end, which alone can enable us to follow them without danger.' Apart from this holy simplicity of principle, (which is the exclusive character of the Christian Student,) 'learning'—as Mr. Baxter tersely remarks,—'is but the pleasing of the fancy in the knowledge of unnecessary things.' Intellectual pleasures will be purchased at the fearful expense of the loss of heavenly communion with God. In the cultivation of this spirit, we shall be enabled to honour our God, and to receive his needful aid in literary as well as in religious pursuits. The solid advantages of study indeed will be safely enjoyed, and therefore will become a medium, by which the Divine glory will be displayed, and the presence of our God will be realized with a higher zest and a more abiding influence.

But in returning to Miss Graham, we may add, that her studies were not confined to the severer branches of knowledge. She had cultivated an acquaintance with the Roman classics with considerable success.* In the field of modern

* To one of her correspondents she recommends the study of the Latin Grammar, as the means of a clear understanding of 'that noble language,' and of 'ennobling the intellect by the reading of the poets and historians of that language.' Two other advantages she notices—that of a more distinct and enlarged acquaintance with our own 'language, in great part deduced from the Latin,' and that of forming a good style, adding—'that the English style of a person well-instructed in Latin acquires great richness and fertility from the number of classical and energetic words of which it is composed.' While however in her manuscript she points out the substantial advantages of this instructive field of intellect, she does not fail to advert to the restriction, which sound Christian judgment is constrained to impose upon an indiscriminate indulgence. 'If,' she observes, 'we cultivate classic literature with a view only to increase our fund of critical knowledge, we shall miss many of the benefits, which we might have derived from pursuing it with a more valuable and extensive design. The true ends of that fascinating study are to impart chasteness and elegance to the style, to enrich the mind with manly sentiments, beautiful images, and poetical associations.' She elsewhere recommends the cultivation of this field of literature as 'a corrective to' what she calls 'the cold and jejune expression, which marks the style of the mere mathematician. I acknowledge,' she adds, 'the Christian objections, that are urged, not without weight, against the study of the ancient authors. I am only advocating them under proper restrictions, and with due moderation. Thus guarded from abuse, let them walk hand in hand with the more abstruse sciences. They will mutually aid and correct each other. A high degree of classic elegance is consistent with strong literature and taste, she was perfectly familiar with the French, Italian, and Spanish languages. For the first two, she had proper masters. The last she learnt from a Castilian, who was introduced to her father's house, in exchange for teaching him her own language. In order to improve herself in the knowledge of the languages, she made considerable use of them in mutual correspondence with her young friends. For the same purpose she translated Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield (a work not congenial to her taste, but selected as a good specimen of English style) into French, Latin, and Spanish, and commenced an Italian version. She made a similar use of Gil Blas, to perfect herself in the Spanish language for an important object, which will shortly be noticed at length. She appears, however, to have ultimately relinquished this work for a reason equally characteristic of her good sense and Christian simplicity, 'Should I become,' she writes to her correspondent, 'perfect mistress of the pleasing and pregnant style of Gil Blas (of which I intend to write at least two volumes,) it would be almost too light for the serious subject on which I wish to write.' In the same spirit the project even of these two volumes seem to have been quickly laid aside. The next week she writes to the same correspondent: 'I told you that I had begun to write Gil Blas very diligently. But yesterday I thought of the folly of thus employing myself about a work in which I wished Christ to do all. I am therefore determined to give the remainder of this week and the following to reading the Bible with prayer.

The best English writers were familiar to her, especially the standard works connected with the philosophy of the mind. She appears to have made herself thoroughly acquainted with the principles of Locke. She speaks in one of her letters of reading his important Essay on the Conduct of the Understanding for the twentieth time with renewed interest, and recommends to her correspondent the study of this work with great earnestness, as the means of giving her an increased thirst for pursuits purely intellectual. Stewart was read with much improvement to herself. Butler's Analogy was also upon her first shelf. The following letter to her cousin gives a lively and intelligent view of her interest in these valuable writers.

Hastings, July 26, 1823.

'I am very glad that you like Butler; I found, as you do, not only that he is humble himself, but that he inspires his readers with sentiments of humility. He shows them the littleness of human reason, and how weak it is where it will not submit to the light of revelation. I will tell you the good Stewart has done me. I have long felt that all the efforts I have made to obtain true knowledge have been almost useless. Stewart has shown me the reason of this. It is because I have always allowed the greatest confusion in my ideas. I have never arranged them. He has shown me that my mind is like a large sack filled with rubbish of all kinds, and where perhaps something that is useful may be found, but all is packed together in so confused a manner, that whosoever sought for it would be seeking a needle in a bundle of hay. I am almost in despair; however I am resolved to make every effort to arrange a little better the confused mass, and I am more than ever convinced, that the only sure way of having the head filled with clear and well-defined ideas is to accustom oneself to put one's thoughts upon paper. I must tell you a resolution which I desire to execute: it is to write down from time to time all the new ideas and facts, whether original or acquired by reading or conversation, which I have gained. By doing this we should know the progress which our minds make; and we shoud not forget, as we now do, the ideas which pass through the mind without making any impression, but which might be very useful if gathered together, and reserved to a proper occasion.'

Her acquaintance with the Greek language only extended to the reading of the Greek Testament. The further progress in this department of literature was hindered by her application to other studies necessary for the superintendance of the education of her cousin. She was proposing to commence the study of Hebrew, but increasing indisposition precluded her from engaging in any new branch of study that excited her interest and exercised her habits of application.

powers of sound argumentation. The combination forms a style of reasoning as pleasing as it is convincing. The simplicity of a mathematical style is thus kept from degenerating into poverty, and its cautious correctness is not permitted to stiffen into a frozen sterility.'

Miss Graham studied the theory of music with much attention, and wrote a short but correct development of its principles* for the use of a young cousin, then preparing for the situation of governess, and whom, as we have before hinted, she had in part educated for this important sphere with anxious pains and interest. Apart from this object, she would not probably have devoted so large a portion of her valuable time to this study, as it was a matter of frequent concern to her to observe the preponderance given to this elegant and fascinating science above the more solid and useful accomplishments.

In some of her lively exercises of mind she took up the subject of Chemistry with great delight, making long extracts from the books which she had read, and going over every part till she thoroughly understood it. Without having any more definite object for this study, she felt that some absorbing occupation of this character was necessary to beguile the long and wearisome hours of sickness. For the same object Botany also attracted her attention. Thus with various and successive occupations her mind was always maintained in active, intelligent, and profitable exercise. A striking feature of her character (one which entered into her recreations equally with her studies, and which formed the basis of her high mental superiority) was a total concentration of every power of thought and feeling, in the object of pursuit immediately before her.† Indeed, as her father observes, 'she followed Solomon's advice in every thing she undertook. "Whatsoever thine hand findeth to do, do it with thy might!"'

Her peculiar singleness of aim preserved her in the midst of her intellectual employments from the baneful influence of self-indulgence, and stimulated her to apply her literary pursuits to valuable practical purposes. Her great object in the study of the Spanish language, was to obtain a medium of communication with the Spanish refugees. The discovery of a strong tincture of infidelity among them, combined, with the recollection of her own fall, to excite a compassionate, earnest, and sympathizing concern on their behalf. The second part of 'The Test of Truth' opens with an exquisitely touching view of her feelings on this painful subject. Indeed the work contains the substance of her communications with some of those interesting but unhappy men. It was sent to them, with much and earnest prayer, upon the eve of their departure from England. She had intended to have translated some of the most striking extracts from Paley and other writers upon the Evidences of Christianity, and in one of her letters she mentions having no less than eleven English volumes before her mind for this purpose. Finding, however, that Paley had been translated, she purchased the work, and sent it to her Spanish friends with her own.

The following notices will give an interesting view of the exercises of her mind and faith strongly called out towards these objects of her compassion, after she was removed from immediate intercourse with them.

Sept. 8, 1825.

'As to my Spanish, we have been so busy about the schools, that I have not been able to do much. But I find a delightful confidence that this book, having been the suggestion of Christ, and belonging to him, and not to me, will be blessed by him. I have read one part of 'Las Ruinas,'‡ and in reading it I was struck with the reflection, that the best answer would be a continual reference to the word of God. I thought therefore of placing my observations on the blank pages, and of † One of her letters gives a graphical picture of this remarkable concentration of mind.

Plymouth, May 10, 1825.

'When the fury of learning takes possession of me, I cannot think of any thing else. If I am seized with a fit for studying any particular thing, I cannot give my mind to any other studies, however much I usually delight in them. I now wish to study Spanish and Music. But I am so carried away with my ancient mania for Mathematics, that, although my head aches, and I cannot think without inconvenience of any thing, I am perpetually puzzling my brains to resolve questions which will never be of any use to me. It is said, that every thing is given for some good. I cannot imagine why I have been endued with this invincible propensity to a study, which is always diverting me from more useful and feminine occupations.' This letter, it will be remarked, was written several years before her Treatise on Mathematical Study, and before the important intellectual and moral benefit of that study, which her Treatise so fully develops, had opened to her mind.

filling the margin of the printed paper with references. I beseech you to pray, that if I be not a fit instrument for the conversion of the souls of these poor Spanish exiles, the Holy Spirit would be pleased to raise up some other.'

Miss Graham obtained a copy of the book, interleaved with blank paper for the insertion of her remarks. She did not however complete this task, thinking that the simple argument of 'The Test of Truth' was better adapted for her purpose.

April 9, 1827.

'Last week my blessed Master gave me the power of writing in his name to the poor Spaniards. I have written three sheets in English. But as I have not studied Spanish for a long time, I find myself in some difficulty, and must give this week to the language. Next week I hope to translate what I have written, and to send it to you; if you will oblige me by seeing it put into their hands. My faith in seeing them converted to God increases every day. At present, "the strong man armed keepeth his palace, and his goods are at peace." "But I have a confidence given me from heaven, that I shall see the "stronger than he," who will conquer him, and "take from him all his armour wherein he trusted." I may not perhaps see this while I am here; but I shall not rejoice the less, because I see it in heaven.'

About a month afterwards, we find her mind deeply exercised upon this work of labour and love.

May 5, 1827.

'I wrote the Spanish book in the name of Jesus, and in the belief that he would give me a spirit and a wisdom, which by nature I do not possess. I had a strong faith in the promises of God to manifest himself in his own time to his own elect. But in the way of preparing to send it, my faith vanishes, and I have now only "an evil heart of unbelief."* To say to all the bones in the church-yard at Stoke, "O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord,"—would almost seem to me easier than to say the same thing to souls dead in infidelity. However, I feel that I have courage even for this, since "Jesus is the resurrection and the life," because all the glory will be to him alone; and because he has assured me, that having confided myself to him, my expectations can never be disappointed.'

The next letter was sent some months afterwards, with 'The Test of Truth,' and 'Paley's Evidences.'

Dec. 20, 1827.

'I send you Paley, which pleases me very much, with the letter, in which, without entering upon any argument about the Evidences, &c. I have leant upon the simple proposition, that God having promised in the Scriptures to give his Spirit to whoever asks it with sincerity, must either keep his promise, or not be God; and I have endeavoured to show them, that according to their own principles they are without excuse, if they neglect to seek their Creator in this manner. But if even now it do not succeed, it has been a blessing to me; it has been the cause of many prayers, of many sweet moments of communion with Jesus. I cannot therefore but hope, that in the time and manner which please him, my prayers will be answered. I recommend these unhappy people to you. Pray for them often and fervently; possibly amongst them may be found some of those who were "chosen before the foundation of the world."'

In another letter formerly quoted, after having begged her friend to join with her in prayer for a blessing upon her studies, she added in conclusion—'And pray for me, that I may have something to say to those poor Spaniards, and that my love for them may not grow cold.'

The full result of her prayers and "trials of faith" on behalf of her Spanish friends, is among the secrets which "the day will declare." Meanwhile, what Christian can fail to be invigorated by this exhibition of prayer, faith, self-denial, and patient hope in the work of our Divine Master?

Allusion has been already made to a disinterested project which she had formed of devoting herself to the work of tuition. To her cousin, she writes as if her heart was full of it—'I think of it day and night. The opportunity of my illness appears to me excellent for preparing myself for my plan, if the ability for putting it into execution should be granted me.' Her gracious Lord however was pleased to accept her in the desire, not in the performance of her work. Protracted indisposition hindered her from giving any definite shape or execution to the plan, which only remains on record, as one among the many instances of the ceaseless activity with which her energies were employed in the service of her Redeemer, and of his Church.

It is natural to expect to see her a "fellow-worker with God," in the daily course of active devotedness. She was a constant visiter of the poor in the most miserable abodes, under circumstances trying to her delicate frame and tender spirit. For some time she took a daily and somewhat distant walk through an uninviting part of the city, to spend an hour with a dying young woman, whose case had deeply interested her, and to whom there is every reason to believe that she was found the blessed messenger of life and salvation. Her sympathy was much called out by the temporal wants of the poor. Much of her leisure time was employed in working for their benefit. A large chest of useful articles of clothing was constantly kept in her own room, while the opportunities of distribution were always improved as means of spiritual instruction to the objects of her consideration. Her Sabbaths were entirely devoted to the service of God. She became a teacher in the Christ Church Sunday School, and though she was often exhausted at the close of the day by the continued excitement of her exertions, yet she ever counted her toil in the work of Christ to be her highest privilege and delight.

Upon her removal from London, the interest of her intellectual mind continued to be called forth in the employment of a village sphere. A deep and abiding constraint of redeeming love regulated every mental effort. Though she diligently improved her retirement in adding to her already well-furnished storehouse; yet she chiefly regarded it as the means of secretly recruiting her strength for the service of God. Hers was not the mind to repose luxuriously in 'the Castle of Indolence.' Hers was not the soul that could rest even in spiritual self-indulgence, insensible to the urgent calls of active duty. Even her delicate health was not suffered to preclude her from the self-denying exercise of Christian devotedness. During the first summer of her country residence, she regularly attended at the parish workhouse at seven o'clock, to explain the scriptures to the poor previous to the commencement of their daily labour. This however, like every other "labour of love," was an exercise of her faith and conflict with the great enemy. She mentions to her cousin the repugnance, which at one time she found to this work, and her yielding to the temptation of deferring it from day to day. Yet it was not long before she found the victory of faith over inertion; and gladly did she give the praise to Him, who enabled her to make a successful effort; 'I told them of my intention' she writes 'to go every morning to pray with them, and read the word of God. My Saviour removed every difficulty out of the way, and caused the women to receive me with the greatest civility.'

The children of the parish were the objects of constant solicitude. She wrote a few simple addresses for their use. She drew out also questions upon the parables and miracles for the assistance of the Sunday School Teachers; and, when prevented by indisposition from attending the school, she assembled the children at her own house for Scriptural instruction. The young women also in the parish occupied a large share of her anxious interest; and, finding them unwilling to assemble at the same time and place with the children, she appropriated a separate evening for their instruction. She was, as might be supposed, a constant cottage visiter. The following beautiful extract from her mathematical manuscript will show the high and consecrated spirit with which she connected this humble ministration with her intellectual pleasures. Warning her Christian student of the dangerous snare of self-complacency,* she inquires of him—

* This book was 'The Test of Truth.' Her care and anxiety for them extended to their temporal as well as their spiritual distresses. As a token of affectionate sympathy, as well as some acknowledgement for valuable instruction received, she gladly appropriated the proceeds of her Musical Tract to the fund raised for their relief.

* Her remarks upon self-complacency are so just and searching, that the writer is tempted to add them in a note.

"Self-complacency is another of those temptations, to which the student is peculiarly exposed. He may so far distrust his own heart, as to abstain from 'doing any thing through strife or vain glory.' He may keep out of the way of human praise. And yet there may be an inward complacency, a proud consciousness of superiority, equally destructive to his growth in grace. He 'thinks of himself more highly than he ought to think.' He courts not the breath of applause: but he drinks in the intoxicating vapour of self-gratulation and esteem. There are some men, in whom pride stifles the impulses of vanity. If they seem to care little what others think of them, it is because they think so well of themselves. Their own opinion needs no confirmation. Their solitary plaudit is so abundantly satisfactory, that the buzz of admiring multitudes would be a superfluous

'Do you ever experience this proud internal consciousness of superior genius or learning? God has placed a ready antidote within your reach. The abode of learned leisure is seldom far from the humble dwelling of some unlettered Christian. Thither let your steps be directed. "Take sweet counsel with your poor uneducated brother." There you will find the man whom our "King delighteth to honour." His mean chamber, graced with one well-worn book, is as "the house of God, and the very gate of heaven." Observe how far the simplicity of his faith, and the fervour of his love, exceed any thing you can find in your own experience, cankered as it is with intellectual pride. God has taught him many lessons, of which all your learning has left you ignorant. Make him your instructor in spiritual things. He is a stranger to the names of your favourite poets and orators. But he is very familiar with "the sweet psalmist of Israel." He can give you rich portions of the eloquence of one, who "spake as never man spake." He can neither "tell you the number of the stars, nor call them all by their names." But he will discourse excellently concerning "the star of Bethlehem." He is unable to attempt the solution of a difficult problem. But he can enter into some of those deep things of God's law, which to an unhumbled heart, are dark and mysterious. He will not talk to you "in the words which man's wisdom teacheth;" but oh! what sweet and simple expressions of divine love are those "which the Holy Ghost has taught him!" He "knows nothing but Christ crucified;" but this is the excellent knowledge, to which all other knowledge is foolishness. He has "the fear of the Lord; that is wisdom. He departs from evil; that is understanding." When your soul is refreshed by this simple and lowly communion with one of the meanest of God's saints, return to your learned retirement. Look over your intellectual possessions. Choose out the brightest jewel in your literary cabinet. Place it by the side of "the meek and quiet spirit" of this obscure Christian. Determine which is the "ornament of greater price." Compare the boasted treasures of your mind with the spiritual riches of your illiterate brother. Run over the whole catalogue. Let not one be omitted; the depth of your understanding, the strength of your reasonings, the brilliancy of your fancy; the fire of your eloquence. Be proud of them. Glory in them. You cannot. They dwindle into insignificance. They appear to you "as a drop of a bucket, as the small dust of the balance."'

The following letter gives a beautiful illustration of the truly Christian spirit, with which she inculcated upon her friends the responsibility of persevering effort in the work of God:

Stoke, August 4, 1825.

'I think that visiting the poor is an excellent help to spirituality of mind, because it shows us our own weakness, when we lose sight for a moment of the strength of Christ. It also brings to light many secret corruptions, of which we were before ignorant. I am very anxious to hear about the Infant School. Do not be discouraged by the cold answers of ——. Rather pray for them, that more faith may be given to them, and a spirit of love for the souls that are perishing around them. Such a prayer offered in faith by one Christian for another will bring down a blessing upon both. I am very sorry that I was angry with ——, instead of praying for her. I do not think that Christians pray enough for each other. Perhaps the Lord is proving your faith and love by making you wait in this cause. If it be so, do not doubt his power to carry you through all you undertake in his name. From the mouth of the children for whom you are interested, he will cause his praises to be sounded. Do "not" then, "be weary in well-doing." If you have not already begun, let me advise you not to begin, till you have given a special time to the scriptures and to prayer. I desire all our undertakings to be "sanctified by the word of God and prayer."' Then referring to her own intention of setting apart the next week for spiritual exercises in reference to her Spanish communications—she adds—'I thought perhaps that you would give next week to these things, and that it would be delightful to me to remember, that we were both thus employed at the same time. But if you cannot do this, pray at the time fixed by us, that I may have grace and faith to pass these days in dedicating myself to this work, and that we may both of us in all that we do be delivered from a self-seeking spirit, and may take every step with our eyes fixed upon the cross of Jesus. I am afraid of annoying you by this mode of speaking of these things. But if you knew how full my heart is of tenderness, while I write, you would pardon the importunity, with which I beseech you to give yourself entirely and without reserve into the hands of Christ. He can give you from the treasures of his grace all the zeal, love, and warmth which you need. All is ours already by virtue of his blood. Let us make use of it. Let us go to him in holy boldness, and ask for all the grace which he is so ready to give.—Psalm lxxxi. 10.'

The pressure, however, of increasing illness constrained her to relinquish her own habits of personal activity for some time previous to her death. It was her appointed dispensation rather to suffer, than to do, her heavenly Father's will; while her solitary hours were cheered by the contemplation of the glorious prospects opening now upon her view—"looking for the mercy of her Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."

CHAPTER IV.

Further Extracts from her Writings and Correspondence.

It is not to be expected, that the quiet tenor of Miss Graham's habits in a retired village could furnish much variety of incident or detail. We shall, however, abundantly compensate for this deficiency by a more full exhibition of her fine, powerful and spiritual mind, as illustrated in her writings and correspondence.

But this department of our work is too large to be comprehended in one mass. We will therefore set it forth in several distinct divisions, and give her sentiments upon the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel; upon subjects of interesting theological discussion; upon some points of moment connected with Christian experience and profession; and upon miscellaneous subjects.

1. Her views of the great doctrines of the Gospel.

Her apprehensions and statements of the grand fundamentals of the Christian faith, were eminently Scriptural.

On the humbling doctrine of original sin, she justly remarks in a posthumous work:

'It is the very first lesson in the school of Christ: and it is only by being well rooted and grounded in these first principles, that we can hope to go on to perfection. The doctrine is written in Scripture as with a sun-beam. If we do not feel some conviction of it in our own hearts, it affords a sad proof that we still belong to that "generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet is not washed from their filthiness."'

After adducing some of the most convincing Scriptural evidence, she proceeds forcibly to illustrate the subject by the case of infants.

'Would we know the reason of this indelible pollution, which fallen man has transmitted to his latest descendants? let that given by Scripture suffice: "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one." But is not the new-born babe innocent? yes, from the commission of actual sin; but not from the pollution of a nature altogether sinful: for "who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?" "Death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Why then is death so often commissioned to snatch away the babe in the first hour of its existence? why, but because that babe is a sinful creature? Sin, that root of bitterness, has already shot its fibres into the inmost soul. That infant "born of the flesh, is flesh;" and "as such cannot please God"—cannot bring forth any other than the accursed fruits of the flesh. As surely as the cockatrice's egg will hatch into a viper, so surely will the babe born of unclean parents be itself unclean; so surely it will be "by nature a child of wrath, even as others." And therefore it is as the Apostle tells us, that "Death reigneth over all, even over them that have not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression." I entertain not a doubt that these little ones are redeemed by the blood of Jesus: but that they need redemption, that they are sinners, "children of wrath by nature;" of this truth I am equally well assured; and every little mound in the churchyard seems to have a voice that tells me so.'

Then, after citing our Church's recognition of this doctrine addition. Can any thing like this be found in the disciple of Jesus? Yes—for the law of sin still dwells in his members. Neither this sin, nor any other, shall be permitted to have dominion. (Rom. vi. 14.) But its assaults will sometimes vex and discompose him. He will be tempted, according to the natural bent of his character,' to seek the applause of others, or to rest in his own.

in the Ordinance of Infant Baptism, she returns to her Scriptural ground of argument.

'The Holy Ghost has instructed the Apostle to give us such a full comment upon the spiritual death we all die in Adam, that we cannot too often read and pray over the following passages, Rom. v. 12, 21. 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22, 45, 49. Eph. iv. 22, 24. Col. iii. 9, 10. There are many others, in which our nature in Adam is spoken of, in contradistinction to the new and holy nature we receive in Christ Jesus. So essential is a right understanding of this truth, that until we receive it, many of the most beautiful parts of the Church service must appear just as unintelligible to us as if they were written in an unknown language. Nay, worse than unintelligible; they must seem extremely foolish and ridiculous. How absurd (to an understanding not convinced of the original defilement of our nature) must it appear to talk of omitting an infant's sins; of causing the old Adam to be buried, and his carnal affections to die in him; while all the time the hearer thinks that the infant as yet has no sins, no carnal affections; while the very existence of the old Adam or original sin is doubted by him!'

The second records of Christian experience furnish full confirmation of her humiliating statement.

'Oh! what an unmeaning heap of words,' she exclaims, 'has been handed down to us in the law of Moses, the Psalms of David, the confessions of Ezra, Nehemiah, Job, Daniel, Jeremiah and the rest of God's saints, if that evil nature which caused them to groan did not really exist! Above all, what shall we make of Romans iii. and vii.? What shall we understand by the conflict between the flesh and the Spirit, between the old man and the new man, between the carnal and spiritual affections? Was St. Paul dreaming, when he said, "I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing?" Was he beside himself, when he declared, "that he found in himself a law, that when he would do good, evil was present with him?" that, though by Divine grace he had learnt "to delight in the law of God after the inward man, yet still he saw another law in his members, warring against the law of his mind, and bringing him into captivity to the law of sin which was in his members?" The apostle of the Gentiles, "who laboured more abundantly than they all;" he, who "had been caught up to the third heaven, and heard unspeakable words which it was not lawful for him to utter" amongst sinful men; he, who "counted all things but dung, that he might win Christ;" he, who was "ready, not only to be bound, but also to die for the name of the Lord Jesus;" this chosen vessel of mercy, full of zeal and full of love, and under the immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, so groaned under the burden of the original corruption of his nature, "the law of sin warring in his members," that he was compelled to cry out, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" And from the time of Paul there has never been a real Christian, who has not often felt himself constrained to adopt his language, and to say in the anguish of his soul, "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" The remedy, as is usual in Scripture, follows close upon the complaint: "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord."'

From her mathematical manuscript we extract the following method of proof of the total depravity of man. In speaking of the three modes of demonstration, Inference, Coincidence, and Reductio ad absurdum, she thus applies the last mode to the subject alluded to: "If man be not utterly depraved, he must be in one of these two states, either perfectly good, without any mixture of sin; or good, with some admixture of evil and imperfection. The first of these suppositions carries its own absurdity upon the face of it. The second is plausible, and more generally received. Yet it is not difficult to prove, that if man had any remaining good in him, that is, towards God, he could not possibly be the creature that he now is. There could not be that carelessness about his eternal welfare, that deadness to spiritual things, which we perceive in every individual, whose heart has not been renewed by Divine grace. Man would not love pleasure more than God. He would not prefer "the things which are seen and temporal" to "the things that are not seen and eternal." He would not trifle with sin. He would not sneer at holiness. He would not habitually neglect to pray.

'All these things are utterly incompatible with the hypothesis, that man is only partially fallen from God. The very least spark of innate godliness would imply a restless dissatisfaction in what is evil; an importunate longing to be freed from it. The man in whom such a spark of goodness existed would breathe after lost communion with his Maker. He would prefer God's will and pleasure to his own. "The honour that cometh from God only" would be dearer to him than the most splendid tribute of human applause. Is any thing like this to be found in man before his reception of Divine grace? No. He "lives without God in the world:" chooses his own will and pleasure, and seeks his own glory. He is utterly selfish; therefore he is utterly fallen.

'We find then that the doctrine of man's partial depravity involves absurd consequences. It leads to conclusions which are wholly at variance with fact. These reflections bring us back to the Scripture statement. We admit that the heart of man may yet be the seat of many noble and tender affections towards his fellow-man. But in regard to God, we declare his affections to be alienated, his understanding darkened, his will depraved. "There is none that understandeth; there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone aside; they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one."'

The utter helplessness of man she adduces with great clearness and power to prove, that the work of grace, from its earliest commencement to its final consummation, is "all of God."

'Grace will be given'—she observes—'to all who diligently seek for it. But, if we attend to the Scripture account of every man, woman, and child by nature, we shall find that this seeking also is the effect following upon grace received; not the cause producing it. By this I mean to say, that the very act of seeking grace proves that we have received grace already; and that the very ability to seek, is itself the free gift of God's sovereign grace. If "every thought of man's heart is evil, and that continually," surely it is not out of that heart that the first desire of any good thing can spring. If, by nature, "there is none that seeketh after God," whence can the first attempt to seek him arise, but from free grace drawing us contrary to nature? Freely must grace be given to enable us to seek at first; and freely must it be continued, to enable us to go on seeking. I know that none shall seek the Lord in vain; none who come shall be cast out; none who believe shall come short of everlasting life; none who choose the better part shall have it taken from them; but then none can seek the Lord, unless he first seek them. None can come, except it be given him of the Father; none can believe, save as many as are ordained to eternal life; none can choose Christ, except he first choose them. If again we consider the magnitude of the change which must take place in every sinner's heart before he can truly and earnestly seek God, we shall be convinced that no part of it is properly his own. He must "be born again;" must "become a new creature; old things must pass away, all things must become new;" he must "pass from death unto life;" "from darkness to light—from the power of Satan unto God;"—"from going about to establish his own righteousness, to submit himself to the righteousness of God;" and this, to a proud carnal heart, is the most difficult of all. And who is sufficient for these things? Who but He, that first formed us in the womb, can cause us to be born again of the Spirit?" Who but He, that originally created us, is able to "create us anew in Christ Jesus?" Who but the giver of natural life can give spiritual life; "and quicken those that were dead in trespasses and sins?"

'When the Lord of life stood by the grave of Lazarus, and said—"Lazarus, come forth;" and he that was dead, instantly came forth;" who would say, that this act of lifting himself up was the cause of his coming to life; and not rather, that his coming to life was the cause of his being able to lift himself up? It is thus, when Jesus by his word and Spirit says to the heart of a sinner—"Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." Instantly that dead soul arises, and its first act is seeking, or prayer; but this same act of seeking is the effect of spiritual life, not the cause. We pray because we are alive, not that we may live. We cannot quicken ourselves when dead in sin, any more than we can bring a dead body to life. But when Jesus has quickened us, we shall as surely perform all those actions, which demonstrate the soul to be spiritually alive, as a dead body when raised by divine power, will surely perform all the functions of a living person. Grace, great grace, must be infused, to enable us to seek at all; and he who first gave grace to seek, will give more grace in answer to that seeking, thus fulfilling that precious Scripture, which saith—"To him that hath, shall be given." We neither begin nor carry on the work of grace in our own hearts. "Jesus is the author and finisher," the Alpha and Omega "of our faith." From the first spark of grace that faintly glimmers upon us here, to the full blaze of glory which shall burst upon us in heaven; all, all is his doing; it is he that made us alive (spiritually,) not we ourselves. It is God who both begins the good work in us, and also will "perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ."'

Then after having confirmed her statement by the strong and unequivocal language of the Church, she proceeds to exhibit in connexion with it, the perfect freeness of Divine grace.

'It is absolutely necessary to a clear and full view of this doctrine, that we ascribe to the free, sovereign and unmerited grace of God, the first desire after him that ever arose in our hearts, as well as the fulfilling of that desire when expressed in prayer. We must be convinced that nothing in the work of salvation is our own, but only the gift of God's love to us in Christ Jesus. Christ died for us when we were enemies. The benefits of his death are applied to us, for the purpose of reconciling us, not in consequence of our making any advances towards being reconciled. He "died for the ungodly," for those "who were without strength," without strength to come to him; without strength to form so much as a wish to come to Him. The desire to come is given for his sake: the ability to come is given for His sake: the acceptance on coming is an acceptance for the beloved sake of this beloved Saviour, "without whom we can do nothing." Those who say—'Grace will be given if we ask; but then asking must precede or procure the given grace'—are in effect robbing God of much of the glory due unto his name. For the power and the inclination to ask are of themselves a part of the free gift of God's grace to us in Christ Jesus. They are the beginning of God's work in the heart; and to say, that we begin this work, is no other than to say that we can create ourselves anew in Christ Jesus. I will venture to affirm, that if God waited to give us his grace till we asked him for it of our own accord, we should go without it to all eternity.

'The great source of error on this head, even amongst serious people, is, that they cannot bring themselves to think they have nothing of their own in the work of salvation. Therefore it is, that, when constrained to acknowledge that the grace given them when they seek, is from God only; their self-righteousness betakes itself to another strong hold; and we find them laying claim to their asking and seeking, as if that at least was the effort of their own will, the spontaneous act of their own power. This is just as if one should take a dead person by the hand, breathe life into him, and lift him up upon his feet; and that person should make a show of acknowledgment to his benefactor, by allowing to that benefactor the praise of lifting him up after he was alive, and keeping him alive ever since, and yet should maintain, that the first breath of all came into him by his own spontaneous act, by the effort of his own unassisted power. The absurdity of such an assertion with regard to temporal life, would strike us at once; but we are not so struck with it in reference to spiritual life; and the reason is this,—when we speak of a corpse, we know what we speak about,—there it lies before our eyes, incapable of breathing, moving, speaking. We perfectly know what we mean, when we say that a dead body cannot raise itself to life. But when we speak of a soul "dead in trespasses and sins," we too often use the phrase, merely because we find it in the Scriptures; without the slightest conception of the awful reality expressed by it. Nor is it till we have ourselves in some measure "passed from death unto life," that we begin to perceive the dreadful and close analogy which really exists between the two states of natural and spiritual death. If God were to come to an unconverted person with the question—not—"Can these dry bones"—but Can these dead souls—"live!" he would be apt to reply—Why not? What should hinder them from raising themselves up, and breathing the breath of spiritnal life? But when God has quickened us from our own death in trespasses and sins, our eyes are opened to see what spiritual death really is, and then we learn with trembling awe to reply, "Lord, thou knowest." This is thy work. It is thou that must make us alive, and not we ourselves.

'Since then men are universally disposed to "go about establishing their own righteousness," how carefully ought we to close up every avenue through which this besetting sin might gain admittance, and rob us of our peace, by leading us to rob Christ of his praise! Many are the windings of our own treacherous hearts; many are the devices of Satan, by which he would tempt us to ascribe to our own strength what God has done for us of his mere mercy. Nor let us think that a mistake here can be of trifling importance. God is very jealous for his great name; and he has declared, that "if we will not lay it to heart, to give glory to his name, he will send a curse upon us, and will even curse our blessings." Many and glorious are the crowns which adorn the sacred head of Immanuel; let us not try to pluck thence the brightest and fairest of them all, for well does it become this King of kings. When we reach heaven, and receive the crown of glory, we shall be ready enough to cast that at his feet, and to say, Thou only art worthy. Let us do the same with the crown of grace here; for surely we have as little right to arrogate the one to ourselves as the other.'

These Scriptural statements of man's total corruption are well connected with the calls of the Gospel; not as implying man's natural free-will and power to turn to God; but as displaying the riches of Divine grace, as stamping the mark of guilt upon the moral inability of the sinner, and setting forth the means by which the Lord accomplishes the purposes of his everlasting love. In the valley of dry bones, to which Miss Graham has just alluded, the prophet was commanded to "call the things that be not, as though they were." The almighty power of God gave effect to the feeble voice of his servant. He fails not to manifest the same Divine power in the resurrection of souls under the ministration of his Gospel; while the sovereignty of his grace is not less apparent in "quickening whom he will."

Perhaps, however, Miss Graham may be considered somewhat defective in an exhibition of the free invitations of the Gospel. Many exclusive writers* deem it unnecessary to address the language of pleading love and urgent remonstrance, where the want of inclination opposes a moral barrier to its success. But this is to obscure the riches of the grace of God by the narrow and perverted reasoning of man. Our Lord's personal ministry was in no way restrained by his perfect knowledge of the Divine purpose or of human inability. Though the objects of electing love were individually known to him, yet his gracious offers were as general, as if no counsel had been fixed in the eternal mind, or as if he were unacquainted with its restricted object and end. Though he most decisively declared man's total inability to come to him irrespective of the sovereign application of Almighty power; yet "his bands of love" were "the cords of a man;" suited to "draw" him as a rational and responsible creature. The freeness of Divine mercy, not the secret decree of the Divine will, was the ground and rule of his patient procedure. He spoke the glad tidings to the unbelieving Jews, "that they might be saved." He complains of them most tenderly, that "they would not come to him, that they might have life." He connected his declaration of the purpose of God with a full and faithful invitation to sinners. He offered himself indefinitely to large and mixed assemblies as the provision for the salvation of the whole world. He extended the commission of his Gospel "to every creature," and closed the special reevlation of the future history of the church, with the same widely-extended embrace of inestimable mercy. Where then is the sinner that is excluded from the responsibility of believing the testimony? Or where is he that is shut out from the encouragement of its free and large invitations?

Turning from Miss Graham's writings to her correspondence, we find her views of the Gospel to be equally clear and encouraging.

The following letter gives a distinct view of the ground of our acceptance with God:

February 15, 1828.

'Dearest ——. Join with me in admiring the mercy of our God. "For if when we were enemies we were reconciled unto God by the death of his Son, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by His Life." "If we confess our sins, God is"—not merciful and compassionate, but "faithful and just to forgive us our sins." For since "Christ once suffered, the just for the unjust;" since He "bore our sins in his own body on the tree;" if we believe on Him, and lay hold on his salvation, justice itself cannot but acquit us. It cannot be, that Jesus should lay down His life, and that then God should require ours. It cannot be, that, when Jesus has paid the dreadful debt to the very uttermost farthing, we should be called upon to pay it once again. No. As God is a faithful God, He must fulfil the promises He has made, that not one of all those who come to Him through Jesus, shall ever

* Miss Graham, however, must not be confounded with writers of this class. If there was an omission in her statements, there was no defect in her system. Her private correspondence abounds with the most fervid appeals to the unconverted, and the most unrestricted offers of the Gospel. See the letters in Chapter v. adduced as illustrative of her 'compassionate concern for the unconverted.' perish. As He is a just God, He will not punish us and our Surety too; will not demand a twice-told reckoning. If indeed the atonement of Jesus were not perfect; if He had not suffered all, not paid all, we might tremble. But Almighty Justice declared itself satisfied, when our Surety was released from the prison of the tomb, when he sat down on the right hand of God, and took possession in our name of the inheritance He had purchased for us; and therefore it is said, that He "was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." By His death He laid down the price of our salvation; by His rising again He declared that the price was accepted, the salvation complete. And this seems to me the great display of God's wisdom in the cross of Christ, that the Just should be able to justify the ungodly without deviating one tittle from His justice; "that He should be just, and yet the Justifier of him which believeth on Jesus."

We extract an illustration of this subject from her manuscript, equally beautiful and just. In defining the principle of analysis to be, taking to pieces a train of argument, and examining the soundness of its component parts, she gives the following Scriptural example, '"Christ crucified, the wisdom of God, and the power of God."' (1 Cor. i. 23, 24.) What an overwhelming multitude of reflections crowd upon the serious mind at the bare mention of these words! But in proving the doctrine to unbelievers, how many concurrent circumstances must be separately and distinctly unfolded.' It is alleged to be incompatible both with "the wisdom and power of God," that he should be constrained to glorify one of his attributes at the expense of another. We must therefore consider each attribute apart from the rest, and show how each is glorified in the doctrine of the cross. Each part of the argument must be unfolded. Each link of the wondrous chain must be distinctly separated. We may offer them successively to the unbeliever, and challenge his strictest scrutiny to detect a single break. If only one link be imperfect, the whole chain must give way. All the hopes which hang upon it must perish. But the more closely we examine it, the more complete will be our satisfaction. I have adduced this doctrine in illustration of my meaning, because I know of none which involves a greater number of considerations. In Maclaurin's sermon on the Glory of the Cross, we have a most perfect specimen of this kind of analysis.'

But we find these two things inseparably united in Scripture, holiness and salvation, as I saw it well expressed in some little work I was reading the other day: 'No salvation by works; and yet no salvation without works.' "Christ hath God exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins." If then we follow and obey Him not as our Prince, He is as yet no Saviour to us. If He had not given us repentance, we must not suppose that he has given us remission. But, dear ——, let us bear in mind, that both are gifts. Repentance is as much a gift, and as little a merit, as pardon. I fear I have been very tedious; but the subject has led me farther than I intended. We are sinners seeking a common Saviour; and therefore I trust that nothing we can say of Him, can be wearisome.'

The practical view of this statement is more fully developed in a subsequent letter to the same correspondent; one of the last she ever wrote:

September, 1830.

'Far from thinking it presumption to write as you have done, my dear friend, I think we ought not to be ashamed of owning what God has done for our souls. We know that it is solely "by the grace of God," His free, unmerited favour, that we "are what we are;" and that in our lips, and above all, in our lives, we are bound to show, that "the grace of God was not bestowed upon us in vain."

'Dear ——, it has indeed pleased God to "call us to His kingdom and glory;" let us (in His strength) "walk worthy of the high vocation wherewith we are called." "Let us exhort one another daily, while it is called to-day; let us provoke one another to love and good works;" and above all, let us pray for one another, and that fervently and unceasingly. We have need not only to pray, but to "watch unto prayer;" for it is only as long as we maintain this watchful spirit, that we can hope to enjoy any of the comforts of religion. Let me intreat you, not as one whose freedom from these sins gives her a right to exhort others; but as one who has herself felt by mournful experience what "an evil and bitter thing it is" to depart from the God of our salvation; as a backslider, whose backslidings have been healed by the inexpressible mercy of a long-suffering God; let me most earnestly and affectionately entreat you to guard against the least declension from holiness; the least relaxation in that close and humble walking with God, which alone can keep you peaceful and happy. Works cannot justify us before God; but we are said to be justified by works in one part of scripture; that is, they are the only evidence of our justification that we can offer to our fellow-creatures. "Ye shall know them by their fruits." And what are "the fruits of the Spirit?" Forgive me, if I record them here. The description is so lovely, that we cannot remind one another of it too often: "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law. And they that are Christ's, have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." Let us examine ourselves by this, dearest ——. Let us see whether we bring forth this fruit, and whether we "bring forth much fruit, so shall we be His disciples." My course is perhaps almost ended. I have reason to hope, that it will not be very long, ere I enter into that rest which Jesus has purchased for me with His blood. Oh! that I had walked more to His glory, "who loved me, and gave Himself for me!" But your course (as a Christian) is but lately begun, and may, if the Lord please, be continued for many years. O then let it be indeed "the path of the just, which is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." "Be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in faith, in purity. Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. Be clothed with humility;" for as you are of an humble and "contrite spirit, and tremble at God's word," so will "the High and Lofty One who inhabiteth eternity," delight to dwell in your heart, to bless you with His refreshing and sanctifying presence. And now, dearest ——, "may the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God, your whole body, and soul, and spirit, be preserved blameless unto the coming of Jesus Christ." To Him may we with one heart and voice, give glory both now and for evermore! Amen.'

The following letter, however, carefully separates the fruit of faith from any ground of dependence. The application of the subject for Christian consolation will be interesting.

Stoke, Feb. 21, 1827.

'The chapter you mention, (Matt. xxv.) is particularly delightful as holding out a lovely picture of the people of Christ. But let us mark, that it is not the action, but the motive, which meets with such high commendation. It is not said—Ye fed the hungry, gave drink to the thirsty, &c., but "I was hungry, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it unto me." And this appears to be the grand difference between Christians and worldly people. The Christian does every thing as unto Christ—in His name, in His strength, and to His glory. The worldling may, and often does, out of natural benevolence or ostentation, feed the hungry, or clothe the naked; but he does it not unto Jesus, but to please himself, to gratify natural feeling, to appear well in the sight of others, to gain a stock of merit enough to buy heaven, or at least to help out what may be wanting in the merit of Christ. These are his best motives: Talk to him of doing good works, because you are saved, and not that you may be saved; and you are talking of a thing which never entered his narrow heart, and which never will enter it, till it is enlarged by the grace of Christ. But let us beg of God, to give us this motive, and right actions will naturally follow. It will, as some one expresses it, 'like the spring of a watch, soon set all the wheels of our souls a-going.' I cannot leave this chapter without sharing with you the comfort I have derived from it in another point of view. Does Jesus say—'I was hungry, and ye gave me meat?' &c. Is He then hungry, when we are hungry? Does He faint, when we are thirsty, and languish, when we are "sick and in prison." And think you, He will not much more sympathize with our spiritual necessities. When we hunger for the bread of life, and thirst for living water; when we are sensible that our guilty souls stand "naked" before him; when we feel ourselves "sick" of that worst disease, sin; and in bondage to Satan, that most hard master, will not He then sympathize with us? And his pity will not be a vain empty pity. He will not only sympathize, but relieve. He will feed, and nourish, and clothe, and heal, and deliver us. Nor will he be content with this. But the same pity he feels for us, he will teach us to feel for others; so that we shall be such characters as He describes the "blessed of the Father" to be. Only let us trust Him for all this, and continually importune him for it; for his promises are all addressed to those who trust, and ask, and seek, and knock.'

The freeness and fulness of the gospel are delightfully applied, to counteract the subtle influence of self-righteousness.

September 28, 1825.

'You tell me, my beloved friend, that you have lately suffered worldly thoughts to engross too much of your time, and that you have found little comfort in prayer. Will you let me tell you what seems to me to be the cause of this; at least as far as I can judge from my own experience?

'You want a more simple and entire dependence on what Christ has done for you; and will do in you: you want to be doing something yourself, when He has done all; you would repent and pray earnestly; and then you think Christ would forgive you. I do not know whether I am right with regard to your feelings; but this at least has sometimes been my own case; but in fact, my dear ——, it was for sinners who cannot repent, who cannot pray, that the Saviour came to die. Repentance is His gift—His free gift—as well as pardon; and it is only when we are willing to come to Him—poor, empty, and miserable as we are—that He delights in "filling us with good things." I think I have not clearly explained myself; but I will try to give you an instance of what I mean.

'I used to be often doubting whether I was one of Christ's people or not. Now this one text satisfied all my doubts.—"All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." From this it seems there is but one question—'Am I willing to come to Christ?' If so, then I am one of those whom "the Father hath given Him;" if so, then will he never, never cast me out; and if so, then is God the Father, then is God the Son, engaged by an immutable promise, by unchangeable faithfulness, to bring me—a feeble worm of the earth—a sinner by nature and practice—yes, even to bring me safe home to glory. Am I willing? O my dear friend, I doubt not your heart is answering to mine; Yes, Lord, thou knowest that I am willing to come unto thee. "To whom should I go?" for there is "none in Heaven or in earth that I desire beside thee!" Again, with regard to the love of the world,—that great enemy to the Christian life—I used to think, how shall I overcome it? Now, I look simply to Jesus, who has said "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." He has overcome it for us, and will overcome it in us. For how can we love that world, which crucified our Lord and Saviour.—How can we give way to that "love of the world," which will deprive us of "the love of the Father?" Believe me, my dear ——, there is not a sin, however deeply rooted in the heart, from which we may not be delivered by simply looking to Jesus, and pleading with him his precious promises. To this end, "let the word of Christ dwell richly in us with all wisdom;" let us "hide his word in our hearts," and we shall find it will preserve us from "sinning against him." "The love of the world," accompanied as it always must be by lukewarmness in heavenly things, is indeed a great sin, and will, as far as we indulge in it, be as a cloud between us and the Father; for, "know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God?" But then we need not be discouraged; for though we never can overcome it in our own strength, we have a promise that the "strength of the Lord Jesus shall be made perfect in our weakness." "Of his fulness, we receive grace for grace." Dost thou want grace every moment to keep thee from falling?—"My grace is sufficient for thee." Wouldest thou have wisdom? "Christ is made unto us wisdom." "God giveth to all liberally, and upbraideth not." Wouldest thou have peace? There is "peace and joy for thee in believing." Thy Saviour is "the Prince of Peace," Wouldest thou be preserved unto the end? "The Lord is faithful, who shall stablish you, and keep you from evil." Finally, do we seek for direction in every step of our path through life? Let us feed on those precious promises. Isa. xxx. 21, and xlviii. 17. Thus, my dear friend, we may go on, "with joy drawing water out of the wells of salvation;" and we are then constrained to cry out with Jeremiah "Thy words were found, and I did eat them; and thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine heart." I fear that I have already taken too much time upon this; but it has pleased God, in my afflictions, to make Christ, and the word of Christ, so unspeakably precious to me, that my heart will not rest, till I have called on my dear friend to live in consistency with her privileges as a child of God, and to "rejoice in the Lord always."'

And again,

September 17, 1827.

'I have read your letter again and again with deepest interest. I grieve to find, that you do not gain any sensible comfort in the path of religion. You seem to think yourself going backward, rather than forward. But may not this be, because you see daily more of the vanity and wickedness of your own heart, and of the wretchedness of your very best performances? If so, are you not making the best possible progress? And while perhaps in reality you are less conformed to the world, less bent upon earthly things than you were a few months ago; your more enlightened views of the spiritual nature of God's law, and the holy strictness of its requirements, may make you see more worldliness and sin in every thing you do, than you were capable of perceiving, when you first began the study of your own heart. For, believe me, the further we "come up from this wilderness, leaning upon our beloved," the more clearly we shall see, that not one step can be taken in our own strength; and every time we begin to think we are a little stronger, and may venture to stir a few steps alone, we shall be left to stumble and fall, till he again upholds us with his hand. We want to be something in ourselves, to have something that we can call our own, something to look at, and to rest upon as such: when, alas! we are nothing, have nothing; but what comes to us from the fulness of Jesus. As long as we look into our own hearts for any source of comfort, we must inevitably be disappointed. If we look at "our righteousness, they are but as filthy rags," "the covering is narrower than that a man can wrap himself in it." But if we cast these filthy rags from us and look to the righteousness of Jesus, then we have a spotless robe; an ample covering for our naked and defiled souls. I cannot help thinking, my beloved friend, that your sadness proceeds from thinking too much of yourself, and too little of Jesus. You brood upon your own sin and misery, till you forget "The Lord your righteousness." You are deeply sensible of your own weakness, but dwell too little on the sweet assurance, that you "can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth you." You lament your own folly; but is not Jesus made wisdom to you? your own insufficiency; but "in Jesus dwells" there not "all the fulness of the Godhead bodily?" and may not you be "complete in him?" Yet let us not cease to look at ourselves to make us humble; but let us look to Jesus to make us happy; and when we look at him, let us remember, that he is our Jesus, our Saviour, and that will make us more happy. Let me give you a text, which I have sometimes found to be a sovereign remedy against all those fears, which a view of our own sinfulness is apt to excite: "The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it, and is safe." Here is comfort; here is safety. My dear friend, I have as much sin and weakness and folly, to lament as you can possibly have; and if it does not make me as miserable as it does you, it is simply because, whenever I am frightened and tormented by the accusations of conscience, I "run into this strong tower, and am safe." You too are safe, for have you not taken refuge there? Why then will you not open your eyes, and behold how "the name of the Lord, as a strong tower," compasses you on every side, so that you are quite out of the reach of every enemy; Jesus is our "hiding place and our shield." If we fear Satan, he will soon "bruise Satan under our feet." If we fear the world, Jesus "has overcome the world." If we fear the treachery of our own deceitful hearts let us put those hearts into the hands of Jesus; he shall turn them "as the rivers of water, whithersoever he will. Nor is he only thus strong to defend us, but rich to supply all our need. If we want repentance, Jesus is exalted to give repentance. If we want faith, "it is given us on the behalf of Christ to believe." If we want holiness, "Jesus is made of God sanctification unto us." If we want peace, "the peace of God shall keep our hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." In short, let our sins, and fears, and wants be ever so great, they need not drive us to despair, as long as Jesus lives and "is able to save to the uttermost." We are complete in him. Well then might David say, "They that know thy name will put their trust in thee;" well might Solomon say: "Thy name is as ointment poured forth;" and Isaiah: "His name shall be called Wonderful." But, my dear friend, we have an interest in this precious name; we may draw near to the Father of mercies in this name, and he will deny us nothing. Then shall we give way to gloomy doubts and forebodings any more? Alas! I know how little all these reflections weigh with us, unless the Spirit of God bring them home with light and power to our hearts. Even while I am talking to you, my own heart is so little affected, that I am ashamed to go on; but I speak rather as I would feel, than as I do feel.'

The above statements of Divine truth will be generally admitted to be of a Scriptural and decided character. Her exhibition of the humbling doctrines of the Gospel brings no occasion for despondency; while it commends to the awakened sinner the simple glory of a free salvation. Nor does her view of gratuitous acceptance lose a particle of its evangelical clearness by the connected display of its fruitfulness. The man thoroughly humbled by the doctrines of the grace of God, will delight in holiness as the track of communion with his God, and the path-way to heaven; while his sense of continued defilement will preserve him from self-righteousness, deepen his self-abasement, and establish his faith in the simplicity of Christ.

Her connected apprehensions of what are called the higher doctrines of the gospel with the whole system, are well stated by the beloved brother, whose high previlege it was to attend her during her last illness.

'She had received,' he observes, 'the Gospel as a dispensation of pure grace. She delighted to speak in a holy manner of God's electing love. She "knew her election," and rejoiced in a sense of her high privilege. The reception of this blessed doctrine produced in her soul deep humility, gratitude, and love. She well knew, that it was God "who had made her to differ" from a "world that lieth in wickedness;" and she could say from her heart: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy and for thy truth's sake." She was so deeply convinced from the word of God, from all around her, and from her own heart, of the deep depravity of human nature, of the utter helplessness of man to do, think, or say any thing that is spiritually good, that she saw no other method, whereby a sinful creature could be saved, but from the combined offices of the Holy Trinity; from the election of the Father, the redemption of the Son, and the sanctification of the Spirit.'

A single extract from her publication will fully corroborate this testimony. The beauty of her language will justify the length of the quotation.

'Thus it is, that while the doctrine of predestination is death to those who weary themselves in presumptuous disputings and reasonings about it, there always have been and will be a happy few, who, humbly and sincerely feeding upon it, receiving all that the Scripture tells them concerning it, and desiring to know no further, find it health and peace to their souls. It lays them very low at the feet of their Redeemer; brings down the high swelling of their pride and self-esteem, pulls away from under them all those broken reeds upon which they had been used to lean, self-righteousness, self-will, self-dependence: and leaves to them no one prop on which to lean for support: whilst "coming up out of this wilderness," but the arm of, "their Beloved;" that everlasting arm, which will surely conduct them to glory. When that arm becomes shortened that it cannot save, or weak that it cannot support; when the arm of Jesus fails and is weary; then they will begin to look around for some other stay, but not till then. Or when they can discover in themselves one single good thing which Jesus did not put there: one reason why he should visit them with such amazing love; then they will conclude that his love took its rise from theirs; not theirs from His. But they never will discover one such thing, so long as the Spirit of God illumines their heart, and brings to light its immense depravity and worthlessness. Therefore as God's love could not have been excited by any thing in them, they believe it to be an eternal love: that they were called in time, because they were chosen from eternity; and that the name of Jesus is now engraven as a seal upon their hearts, because their names were written on his heart before ever the world was. And when their thoughts stretched forward to the end of this pilgrimage, and they rejoice in the view of the mansions prepared for them in their Father's house, the crown of that rejoicing is this: "We got not the land in possession by our own strength, neither did our own arm save us; but thy right hand, and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour unto us." "Thus they rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh;" for "God is the glory of their strength; and in his favour their horn is exalted."

'I cannot pretend to meet the objections, or to refute the cavils commonly raised, when this doctrine of election is made the subject of discussion; for I did not learn it in the way of carnal reasonings, but by simply taking the Scriptures as I found them, and as the Spirit of God enabled me to receive them. If St. Paul, after descanting on this subject, breaks off in an extacy of admiration, exclaiming—"How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" we need not wonder, if our shallow understandings are incapable of fathoming, our limited capacities of comprehending, our low minds of reaching them. We must be satisfied with believing that it is even so, because "so it seemed good in our Father's sight," whatever it may appear to us. That is reason, which appeared satisfactory to our Saviour, may surely satisfy us; or if not, he has vouchsafed an assurance, which may well serve to repress present inquiry into things too high for us—"What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

'That these things are so, I believe, because I find them amongst the "revealed things, which belong to us and our children forever." How or why they are so, I desire not too closely to inquire, lest I should intrude into the "secret things, which belong unto the Lord our God." O that he would give unto every one of us that humble and teachable Spirit, with which a little ignorant child is content to receive his father's lessons, without rudely commenting upon his father's ways, or rashly intruding into his father's secrets! This one thing we know; and with this we may be satisfied; that "the Judge of all the earth cannot but do right." But it were preposterous to expect that he should always do that which is right in our eyes, so long as our notions of right and wrong are so utterly confused and perverted as they have been ever since the fall. He himself tells us that "the Lord seeth not as man seeth:" and that "that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God." It cannot be, so long as "his ways are equal, and ours unequal," that his righteous dealings should be in exact accordance with our unrighteous views and sentiments. Instead then of wearying ourselves with impotent attempts to bring down his will and counsel to the level of our ideas, our far wiser way will be to submit our thoughts and ideas to his will, assured that it is holy, just, and good.' She then proceeds to defend the doctrine at some length, and with considerable ability, from the usual objections of charging God with injustice, and of encouraging licentiousness, arrogance, and despondency in man.

The writer has indulged himself with this large extent of quotation, as the best means of introducing Miss Graham's work from the comparative obscurity of an anonymous publication, into that more general acceptance, which, in his own, and, he presumes he may add, in his reader's judgment, it well deserves. It would be too much to anticipate a universal concurrence in all her statements. Yet from the peculiar unction and richness of her theology, and its entire freedom from speculation and controversy, they cannot be read by the serious reader without spiritual profit. The more mysterious doctrines (as will be seen from the last quotation) are handled in a holy, practical spirit, eminently calculated to soften prejudice, to prostrate the soul in humble thankfulness, and to enlarge the Christian's joy in God. It is indeed one of the many painful results from the harsh, crude, and abstract statements too often given of these doctrines; that they have contributed unjustly to discredit the more sober Scriptural declarations, which, when cast, like Miss Graham's, into the mould of our Seventeenth Article, are justly pronounced by our Church to be 'full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons.'

On such deep and humbling subjects, the writer would not presume to set up his judgment as the rule of faith for the Church. Yet he has felt a caution necessary for his own mind, which he ventures therefore to suggest to his brethren. Let us take care, lest the irreconcilableness of these doctrines with our apprehensions of the Divine character, rather than a defect of their Scriptural evidence, should influence our rejection of them. Is there no danger, lest a predisposing bias in the search for this evidence, should obscure that singleness of eye, which is the only medium for the reception of heavenly light? The admission of these doctrines, indeed, as the result of disputation or argument, could only issue in a fearful proportion of that "knowledge which puffeth up," combined with a total absence of the "love that edifieth." But the child-like reception of them as revealed in the Holy Scriptures, will be (as we have just hinted), eminently fruitful in humiliation, love, privilege, and devotedness. After all, however, we must remember—"A man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven." This sacred aphorism lays the only substantial basis of the true faith of the Gospel, while the light reflected upon the steady course of Christian consistency, though it will not clear up every difficulty, will enlarge our discovery of the Divine goodness to man, and assure to our minds the unchangeableness of God, as the ground of that "strong consolation," which "the heirs of promise" are fully warranted to enjoy.

2. On subjects of Theological Discussion.

The first question is closely connected with some of the subjects of the last section. It states her views of the consistency of conditional promises with a free salvation.

'As to the promises'—Miss Graham observes—'I do not say, that they are unconditional either; but I do say, that the conditions on which they depend are such as guilty man is altogether incapable of performing. I do say that Jesus as our Surety, has performed all these for us, and by his Spirit will perform them all in us. Through his perfect atonement we escape the threatenings; through his unspotted obedience we become "heirs of the promises"—heirs of eternal life. For if the blame of our sins has been imputed to Him, then has the merit of His righteousness been imputed to us. "If he has been made sin for us, then have we been made the righteousness of God in him." And because the promises are ours for his sake, therefore the conditions of them are worked in us by his free Spirit; "for it is not we who live the life of faith, but Christ that liveth in us."

'One of the sweetest promises, upon which the mind of every Christian rests with unspeakable delight, runs thus: "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." Here is a condition, "Him that cometh;" and a promise—"I will not cast out." But who are those that come to Jesus? "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me, draw him." "No man can come to me, except it were given to him of my Father." How distinctly are we here told, that the same free mercy, which promises to receive us when we come, must be put forth to make us come; or we never should come! The promise will surely be fulfilled to all who obey the condition; but none can obey the condition, save those to whom it is given.'

'Every condition necessary to salvation'—she remarks—'is fulfilled in us, not by any efforts of our own, but by our "receiving" continually "grace for grace out of the fulness of Jesus."' In confirmation of her argument, she adduces the Christian graces (repentance, faith, love,) as required of us, but yet wrought in us. Thus she concludes the discussion—'The great question then about the promises seems to be, not so much whether they are conditional, as whether God looks to Christ, or to us, for the performance of those conditions. If to Christ, the burden is laid upon "one that is mighty:" if to us, then we are undone; 'for the condition of man after the fall is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and good works, to faith and calling upon God: wherefore we have no power to do good works pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us, when we have that good will.'

This statement is confessedly strong and uncompromising; yet it is in the writer's apprehension, neither unguarded, unscriptural, or discouraging. It assumes with our church the Scriptural point, not of the weakness, but of the utter helplessness of man. It connects the freeness of the Gospel with the sovereign purpose and Almighty grace of God. Thus man and God are each in his proper place; man in the dust; God on the throne. The humble and intelligent believer will acknowledge of every act of faith and obedience to the end of his course—"Thou also hast wrought all our works in us." Nor will he hesitate to trace all these works to the "good pleasure" of his God as the first cause.

The opposite statement may be easily proved to be most discouraging. The free invitations of the Gospel are unconnected with an entire dependence upon Divine grace to enable the sinner to accept them. Conscious inability is therefore left without any power to act upon it. The sinner is either blinded in self-delusion, or hardened in despondency. On the other hand his helplessness is taught to depend upon the Sovereign pleasure of a God of love; and he "works out his salvation with fear and trembling," indeed, but with confident hope of perseverance.

The unscriptural use of the term condition with many theologians—as if man could of himself perform the work of his salvation—has brought it into disrepute. Yet in Miss Graham's view conditional promises ultimately resolve themselves into absolute unconditional love. The duties of Christian obedience—the Divinely appointed means of enjoying the promises—do not depend upon any thing to be fulfilled by us. They constitute a part of the engagements of the Evangelical covenant, by which the Lord fulfils the demands of his law by the Almighty power of his grace. Miss Graham with many excellent men would altogether abolish the use of the term, at least as applied to us. But it has been allowed by many of our most orthodox Divines, whose statements cannot justly be accused of infringing upon the freeness of the Gospel. It would be difficult to substitute any other theological term, that would express the sense of many important declarations of Scripture with equal precision and appropriateness. Let it be understood to imply—not what is meritorious, but what is necessary in the economy of the Gospel—not an efficient cause, but an indispensable requisite. Is it not then needless scrupulosity to exchange a convenient term of explication for feeble circumlocution? And may there not be some danger, lest in our anxiety to preserve the freeness of Scriptural statement, we unconsciously become fettered in the bonds of human systems?

Her letter upon the nature and degree of explicit faith necessary for acceptance with God is highly interesting.

'The question you propose about prayer, does not appear to me to admit of a doubt. Ought there not to be in every prayer a reference to the intercession of Christ? Will the earnestness and sincerity of a prayer avail without it? Doubtless, my dear friend, there ought to be this reference: nor can a believer in Jesus imagine a prayer without it. But when an unbeliever first begins to long after the knowledge of God, the intercession of Christ may be a part of that knowledge, respecting which he is in utter darkness. Shall the earnest and sincere petition which he offers under such circumstances be disregarded? Is not the intercession of Christ going on for him as surely as if he knew of it? And is not this poor ignorant prayer the first fruits of this intercession? And will not the Father accept it for the sake of his beloved Son, though the sinner as yet knows not how to offer it in his name? Certain I am, that the person who thus begins to seek after the Lord with his whole heart, will ere long have Jesus revealed in his soul; and then he will seek in the name of Jesus. The most signal answer I ever received to prayer, was at a time when I was so bewildered in the labyrinth of infidelity, that I actually should have feared to have been guilty of blasphemy, had I prayed in the name of Jesus. In sincerity and earnestness I prayed to be taught, whether Jesus Christ was an impostor or not; and for the sake of that precious Saviour, whom I thus insultingly doubted, my prayer was answered.

But our experience is of little value, unless it agrees with Scripture. I think the Bible is very clear upon this head, and therefore I venture to speak so confidently. I will mention two or three texts. "He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Is not this a description of the degree of faith and knowledge, which is necessary before a person can come and pray to God in an acceptable manner? And is not this the sum of it, that he must believe that there is a God, and that, if he diligently seeks this God, he shall be rewarded by finding the object of his search? There is not a word about, 'He that cometh to God must believe and pray through the intercession of Christ;' though no doubt the person who believes so far as is mentioned in the text, will soon believe God in Christ, as he is revealed in the Gospel. So then, if a Pagan or Mahomedan in the darkest corner of the earth, or an infidel in this country, were to begin to seek God diligently, from the mere "belief that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him," upon the warrant of this text I should have no doubt of his acceptance.* Again, "If any man will (or wishes to) do the will of God, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." Here is the case supposed of a man, who, so far from praying in the name of Jesus, is not yet convinced,

* This text may, doubtless, be accommodated for intelligent and warranted encouragement in the case here presented to us. Yet it may be questioned whether Miss Graham's exposition includes the whole substance of the Apostle's mind. The faith of Cain in bringing his offering probably admitted the naked belief of the existence of God, and of his bounty to those that inquired after him. The Apostle's definition, however, stands in immediate connexion with the faith of Abel and Enoch, (ver. 4, 5.) which implied access to God, and communion with him through an acceptable medium. Indeed, the true faith in God's existence seems necessarily to suppose some relation to him. See Gen. xvii. 1. Exod. iii. 14. The very expectation of reward to sinners deserving condemnation, must, in a righteous government, be grounded upon some apprehension, however obscure, of a way of favourable acceptance. The desire and act of seeking also supposes some rule to direct our path and warrant our hope; a rule founded upon some new relation between God and his creatures, by which merited judgment is averted, and "mercy rejoiceth against judgment."
